WOMAN SUFFRAGE.—A meeting of the State Board of Control of the Incorporated Society, Woman Suffragists, will be held at the new place of business, Room 14, at 118 Post street, on Wednesday, the 18th inst. at 1 o'clock P. M. Mrs. McKoom, the President of the Board, is desirous of having a full attendance.

What has become of Fannie Allyn? We have received repeated letters at this office, inviting her to visit Eureka, Humboldt county, and offering fair remuneration. All expenses of travel paid; free hall, and kind friends, with satisfactory payments in cash. We have forwarded letters to her, but without any reply.

Mrs. Jencken, (formerly Kate Fox), and her child, are now on a visit to this country. They arrived in New York last week from England.

KATIE KING.

The London Spiritualist, referring to the alleged manifestations of Katie King in America, says:

"Mr. Robert Dale Owen and others have written accounts of some marvelous manifestations they have witnessed in America, through the mediumship of Mr. and Mrs. Holmes, under strict test conditions, which in this case, were necessary, the mediums not being trustworthy persons. A spirit calling herself 'Katie King' manifested, and claimed to be the same Katie King who recently made so great a sensation in this country. A careful examination of the different statements she makes tends to prove that this is not the case, or that the difficulties spirits have in communicating through mediums tend to destroy nearly all evidence of their own identity."

The Spiritualist then gives facts on which it bases the opinion that the spirit is not identical with the one which manifested through Miss Cook. Its reasons are all good, with one exception. It seems that Mr. Crookes once subjected the Holmes to some severe tests in London, and earned their ill will by his stringent course. The Spiritualist says: "The antagonistic feelings of the Holmes towards Mr. Crookes was fully expressed in the utterances of Katie." This is true, but it does not prove that the spirit was not Katie King. It only shows that spirits are influenced more or less by the medium through whom they manifest. This is a law of mediumship. It is perhaps to be regretted, but it cannot be helped. The only way to have reliable communications is to have reliable mediums. Finally, the Spiritualist says: "The original Katie communicates on rare occasions, though she does not show herself, and she emphatically denies that she is the spirit who communicated with Mr. Dale Owen in Philadelphia."

We are under obligations to Dr. N. B. Wolfe, of Cincinnati, for a number of copies of his valuable work on Spiritualism, noticed in Common Sense a few weeks since. The Doctor paid a brief visit to California this fall, but remained too short a time to make many acquaintances, or even to see much of our beautiful country. If a cheaper edition of his book could be published, (Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism) it would have a very large sale, and be the means of doing much good. There are nothing like facts to give hope of continued life, and whoever assists in spreading them is a public benefactor.

We neglected to notice last week the return of Brother J. L. York from Humboldt county, where he has been giving a highly successful course of lectures, awaking great public interest in the subject of Spiritualism. Mr. York is an excellent speaker, and would be a benefit to any society. We are not informed as to his future engagements, but any one desiring to hear from him can address him at San Jose, where he will remain a short time. Since writing the foregoing we have been informed that Mr. York will speak before the Spiritualists' Union at 911 Market street, to-morrow afternoon and evening. Give him a good house. He is an active worker in the cause, and deserves encouragement.

COL. FURLONG'S BOOK.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—Your excellent paper of October 24th contained a paragraph about Col. Furlong, a thorough-going Christian; how he went from England to India, and aspired to convert the Hindoos to Christianity. But the learned pundits, with whom he mingled, having the long arm of the ratio-theologic lever converted him. Whereupon, in due time, the Englishman returns home with two volumes in M.S.—a heretical treatise on "The Rivers of Life, or the Sources and Streams of the Faiths of Man in All Lands," ready for publication.

This made an interesting note for the page of "Signs of the Times." But by some mishap the nib of the thing was broken off. The Christian Union, however, held to the nib, and thereby did more of a tale unfold; for after the title, "The Rivers of Life, or the Sources and Streams of the Faiths of Man in all Lands," it continues, "which originally sprung from phallic worship, and which will doubtless confirm the truth of Christianity." Surely Col. Furlong must verify the utterance of the little book, "The Masculine Cross, and Ancient Sex Worship," and become not merely an ally but a leader. Is it too much to ask the Christian Union to explain the puzzle how such books "confirm the truth of Christianity?" Now let us cry; then laugh if he explains it. You know farce follows tragedy. Oakland, Nov. 5, 1874. A. S. H.

J. J. Morse, who is said by the London Spiritualist, to be the best professional trance medium for public speaking ever developed in England, recently took public leave of his friends, preparatory to a lecturing tour in the United States. In his address on this occasion he said his visit to America was conceived by his spirit guides. He had not the pecuniary means for the journey, but it was provided for him by friends, together with means for the support of his family during his absence. Although a very successful speaker, he has not been able to save money in England, the reward for such work there not being large. We hope he may reap a rich harvest in America. He is now speaking in Baltimore.

The address of Dr. Dean Clarke, at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union, on Sunday evening last, was very interesting and instructive. It was a plain, common sense talk about what we know of the after life. He assumed that by means of the Spiritual vision (for so it may be called) of clairvoyants, we have as reliable means of information as we now have of certain countries in this world which are seldom visited by travelers. The accounts do not all agree, and may not all be reliable, but they are worth attention. His discourse was mainly on the philosophy of spirit intercourse, and to prove the reasonableness of the claim that seers are able to perceive the nature of spiritual life and ascertain the laws that govern it. He asserted that the other life is just as real as this, just as objective, and that in fact it is a material world, though called spiritual to distinguish it from our mundane life. He said there is no pure spirit, unless it be God, that all spirits are more or less material.

LYCEUM FOR SELF CULTURE.

The meeting last Sunday afternoon was of unusual interest. Dr. Gibbons opened with an address on the best means of Self Culture. He said the main object of every one should be to get control of himself. Mastery over self is the first duty. Self-culture properly includes the proper care, attention and exercise of all our faculties and powers, whether of body or mind. There cannot be a sound and vigorous mind without a sound and robust frame. All the faculties of our nature are good, proper to be exercised, and true objects of culture. In the Lyceum we generally have reference more particularly to the culture of the mind. But it is not well to forget that unseemly habits are among the things that every person who aims at improvement, should sedulously endeavor to lay aside. There are many men, calling themselves gentlemen too, who render themselves utterly repugnant to people of refinement, and especially to ladies, by the filthy use of tobacco. Propriety of dress is also a question of importance in this connection. -It should be wholesome, neat, tasty but not gaudy, and always appropriate to the general style and ability of the wearer. It is ridiculous to see any woman sweep the sidewalk with costly silk; but it is utterly repugnant to common sense, if we reflect that her husband has to work perhaps at the anvil to pay for it. Even in the culture of mind it is always possible, as in everything else, to go backward instead of forward. The study of nature is always a pleasant source of improvement. The contemplation of ourselves, what we have been, and what we may be when wisely directed, is a means of great good, and interchange of thought on these useful topics can never fail to lead to beneficial results. He again referred to the necessity of controlling our habits and passions, that we may rule supreme over self, and related a circumstance known to him, where a man by much effort broke away from the habit of swearing, and encouraged by his success in that direction, stopped drinking whisky also.

The Doctor's time having expired, he took his seat, but by request of the audience resumed his remarks. He said that so far, he had made no assertions which any one would care to dispute. He would now see if he could not give matter for discussion, if not food for reflection. He then proceeded to say that in our day many things are set out as means of improvement which have no such tendency, but rather lead downward, and sometimes annihilate the mind itself. Modern Spiritualism is, he believes, among these. People sit in circles, he said, in direct violation of all the laws of hygiene, exercising their imagination by the hour at a time, until there is not a healthy brain among them. The silent sitting at a table, waiting, expecting, hoping for something, we know not what, has a direct tendency to insanity, and the statistics of our lunatic asylums all over the land, show that the expected result has followed. The Doctor's discourse was listened to with attention, and loudly cheered at its conclusion.

Pat. J. Healy followed, in a very able and amusing speech, somewhat extravagant, but quite as truthful as the latter portion of the Doctor's remarks. He said he had intended to speak to the question, but the Doctor's allusion to Spiritualism had thrown him from the track. The Doctor, in his speech, had turned to the table and, placing his hands upon it, stared into vacancy, illustrative of the idiotic performances of sitters at seances, so Mr. Healy, to show that the shrieking and bellowing at prayer meetings is quite as likely to result in insanity, placed his hands on the table and his knees on the floor, and gave vent to some impassioned howlings, and made some outlandish grimaces, in his calls upon the "unseen" for help. It was very absurd, but not a bit more so than Healy intended, and his demand to know which performance looked most like insanity, certainly required no answer. Mr. Healy closed with a few words on Self-culture, saying that society must be reconstructed before the majority will command the means for Self-culture. The drudge of society, the man or woman who labors ten or twelve hours a day, has no vitality left for the improvement of the mind, all the force being exhausted in manual labor.

Dr. Allen made some well timed remarks, mainly in favor of the culture of the judgment concerning the practical duties of life. The question is by what means can we increase our mental power? The exercise of the mind is limited by the amount of nervous force required to produce brain action. If this force is always expended on the muscles, little improvement of mind can be expected.

Mr. Lundy spoke favorably of the Bible as a means of self-culture, and after referring to the abuse which some dealt out to that holy book, inquired why they did not abuse Baron Munchausen. [Perhaps they would if any one made it a standard of religion.]

Mr. Watson spoke briefly in defence of Spiritualism, denying the statements of Dr. Gibbons.

Mr. Knight said that Spiritualists have never yet set out the reports of their wonderful doings with that accuracy of detail, that fullness of fact, and certified to them in such a manner as to command the attention of any man of learning, or any judge of evidence. And as to the inspirational speakers, not one had ever vindicated their claim to inspiration by teachings one jot higher than persons of common sense attain by their natural faculties. All the prophets and pretended prophets of the world, have failed to furnish mankind with one useful truth. Philosophy alone is the path to real knowledge.

After a few remarks by John Farrell, Dr. Gibbons was permitted to make another long speech, the third and last. In it, he reiterated all his statements about the insanity of Spiritualists, in a calm and rather humorous manner. He spoke like a man who, having made up his mind to falsify, does so coolly and deliberately.

After he had resumed his seat, W. N. Slocum stated that he had recently had occasion to examine the reports of lunatic asylums, to ascertain the causes of insanity, and had found that the leading cause is intemperance, the next is self-abuse, the third ill health, the fourth domestic troubles, fifth, religious excitement, and that Spiritualism as a cause of insanity is scarcely mentioned, many reports making no mention of it whatever. He defied Dr. Gibbons to sustain his statements by statistical proofs.

The same subject, "Self Culture," not Spiritualism, is to be discussed again to-morrow afternoon. The Hall is at 39 Fourth street.

LETTER FROM MRS. HUTCHISON.

Mrs. Hutchison is quite too happy, just now, to write philosophical letters. Her son is visiting her, a young man she has not seen before for many years. Friend Mackie sends the editor a note, in which he says:

"Find enclosed a letter from L. H., which will be interesting to those who are anticipating her contributions. Every mother, aye and every son who knows what it is to be separated from his mother, will freely excuse the natural affection which, for the present, supersedes philosophy. I would cast aside all the philosophies of all the ages, to look on the mother's face I have not seen for nearly twenty years. Love is the essence of all philosophy as well as religion, and I know of no love like a mother's."

J. W. MACKIE.

BISHOP CREEK, INYO COUNTY, CAL., NOV. 2, 1874.

FRIEND MACKIE:—My philosophical thoughts have been scattered to the four winds by the unexpected arrival of my only son, from whom I have been separated for twenty-two years! I now realize "that it is only when the affections are not satisfied that they seek the intellect with their over abounding life," and their full tide is now flowing back upon my heart. I hope to remain and fill its desolate chambers with gladness, even if my intellect shall become dormant by reason of the change of vital forces. Agreeable to your suggestions, I have chosen the subject of Mind for my first letter, but cannot say when I shall have it written. I am too happy for deep thought, and too taken up with external life in the present to think of its origin or destiny. I find, like the old adage, "when poverty comes in at the door love flies out of the window;" that as love comes in so philosophy goes out; and I feel now more in the mood to write love letters than ethical essays. I had rather ride out on my saddle-horse than a winged Pegasus. Yours bye and bye,

L. HUTCHISON.

President Lincoln, as was well known to his intimates, was a "Free Thinker" and spiritualist, yet as his goodness cannot be questioned, as his character cannot be traduced, as was the case with Paine, the Christians do what they can to hide the truth, and make people believe him a Christian. The last strong suit they played in this game was at the unavailing of the Lincoln statue, when they induced President Grant to indorse Lincoln's soundness. Grant, in his extremely awkward way, thus testified to the orthodoxy of the Martyr President: "His faith in an allwise Providence, directing our aims, was the faith of the Christian that his Redeemer liveth, amidst obloquy, personal abuse, and hate undisguised, and which was given vent to without restraint through the press, upon the stamp, and in private circles."

The most important condition for the young girl approaching maturity is to have her thoughts turned from herself to wide and large interests, and to have both mind and body healthily and regularly occupied.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN.

The following are extracts from a private letter recently written by this erratic genius in answer to inquiries concerning himself.

HE IS NOT A CHRISTIAN.

I never drink, smoke, swear, lie, cheat, steal, fornicate: never back-bite, make pastoral visits, or wish I was dead: never introduced "nest-hiding" into the Christian fold, and have always observed all the noble precepts taught by all good men; have read the Bible from my youth upwards, only to despise its prophets, David, Solomon and Lot; do not believe it possible by any act of mine that I could injure my fellow-man; am always happy; never discontented—living in the perpetual sunshine of an eternal present. Yet I am not a Christian.

NOT AN INFIDEL.

I rejoice in the brains and intellectuality of Voltaire, Rousseau, Hume, Gibbon, Paine, while I do not understand their everlasting reference to "God," "Deity," Providence," "Almighty." The infidels and Atheists were bold thinkers in their age, but seem only to have been put up by the Christians to be knocked down, for where there is no Devil there can be no God. Yet I am not an infidel.

NOT A PAGAN.

I like Democritus, Lucretius, Euripides, Epictetus, Alciades, Aristotle, Plato, and Pliny, but as I do not believe in immortality, I am not a Pagan.

NOT A SCIENTIST.

I like Newton, Davy, Bacon, Cuvier, Comte, Spinola, Herschell, Mill, Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, but it disgusts me to see them all cater to a "Deity,"—a "God,"—a "Ghost,"—paying the toll to hypocrisy in their cowardice—afraid to pop their faces above the pulpit's parapet for fear that some minie rifle-ball of Christian public opinion will blow the top of their heads off. I am not a Scientist.

NOT A SPIRITUALIST.

I admire the morals of Confucius, Bhudha, Moses, Christ, Zoroaster, Mahomet, Calvin, Luther, Swedenborg, and other ancient and modern Spiritualists. I can memorize the faces, forms and characters of departed relatives and friends. I can respect the money-making attributes of Andrew Jackson Davis, Wilson, Mansfield, Dake, Peebles, Slade, Foster, Hume and the Eddies; can imagine some grand, undeveloped power lying beneath all this slate-writing, mind-reading, table-turning, spirit-acting that agitates the public. Yet I am not a Spiritualist. All these show what I am not. What I am all the world will soon know.

HIGH ART CONCERTS.—The sixth and last of Prof. Mulder Fabbri's "High Art Concerts," took place on Thursday evening last. The entertainment consisted mainly of Mozart's Recital, in which all the vocalists took part. Miss Wandesforde gained new laurels, and Anna Elzer, who is to have a benefit at Platt's Hall on the 19th inst., sang La Bouquetiere in costume, and took advantage of the part to scatter bouquets among the audience, to which were attached cards of invitation to the "Extra High Art Benefit Concert," to be given on the 19th. These very successful concerts have been under the business management of Mr. Charles Schultze, assisted by Fred Thal, and have been a success in every respect.

EXTRAORDINARY MANIFESTATIONS.

The remarkable statements made by Geo. Robert Tapp, Mildmay Park, London, have not attracted much attention in America, although they describe manifestations, which are, in some respects, quite as wonderful as the Katy King manifestations. The facts are vouched for by several reliable witnesses. The medium is a young lady of 17 years, and of excellent family, being the daughter of Colonel Showers, of the British army in India, and niece of General Showers, one of the heroes of the India rebellion. The manifestations took place at the residence of Mr. Luxmoore, 16 Gloucester Square. Mr. Tapp says:

The back drawing room was made a "cabinet," by half-closing the folding doors and hanging a curtain over the space left open. Mr. Luxmoore then locked all the other doors, and placed the medium in an easy chair inside the back room close to the curtain. Miss Showers was dressed in a high black silk gown, with white lace round the sleeves and throat, and having seen her comfortably seated, we went into the outer room and sat just outside the curtain. The large solar lamp was burning brightly, and there was a blazing fire in the grate. There was excellent light during the whole of the seance which followed. Almost directly we sat down, the plaintive voice of the spirit Florence was heard. On asking her if conditions were good, she said they were, and stepped out at once before us. She was dressed in the usual flowing white robes, with a long veil over her head and shoulders, but not over her face. She had a small white covering over her head, but no hair was visible, except just across the forehead (Miss Showers wears her hair long, and it comes below her shoulders.) There was the usual resemblance in features to her medium, which, however, became less perceptible as the seance progressed. The eyes of the spirit were larger, and remained opened and fixed. After greeting us all, Florence went back to her cabinet, and an amusing and voluble discussion took place between her and the spirit inside. Peter evidently wished to show himself, but at length, after some comical grumbling, gave way to Florence, who then came out again, and in answer to Mr. Luxmoore, said that shortly we should see her and her medium together. Mrs. Showers then went to the piano and played a slow march, to which Florence and Peter sang together, and in alternate bars. The voices were very fine, and harmonized beautifully. We then resumed our seats, and Florence, raising the curtain, asked me to go inside and look at her medium, at the same time directing me to hold up the curtain to let in the light. I did so, and stood just before Miss Showers, who was lying back entranced in her easy chair, in her black dress, with the white lace round the sleeves and throat. Florence, in her white robes, stood close to my left hand, in the full light from the outer room, that came in as I stood with the curtain raised in my right hand. I asked that I might throw the curtain quite back, so that I might distinctly see the medium's features. Florence said it would be dangerous to do so then, but that at a future seance I should be allowed to bring a lamp or candle into the cabinet with me for that purpose. I carefully looked at the medium and Florence, and satisfied myself, beyond a doubt, as to their separate identity. After scrutinizing both for about five minutes, Florence took my left arm with her right, and raising with her left hand the left arm of Miss Showers from her lap, touched my hand against that of the medium, and held them together for about six seconds. The medium then gave a slight start and moaned. Florence told me to go outside, and I did so and resumed my seat.

During the whole time I was in the cabinet I held back the curtain to admit as much light as was permitted. Florence and Peter repeatedly spoke to me. Peter was not visible, but his deep voice appeared to come from behind the medium, some distance above her.

Mr. Luxmoore then went into the cabinet for about three minutes, and wishes me to state that his experiences were similar to mine. A like promise as to future seances was also given to him, and he was instructed what kind of lamp to procure for further experiments. "We were then told to go and sit on the sofa at the other side of the room. We did so, Florence walking out after us. She expressed great delight at the size of the room, and said she felt quite at home. I walked up to her, and was permitted to kiss her hand. She then started on a tour of inspection round the room, examining the furniture, pictures, and the albums and books on the tables. She took a cup of tea from the side table and put it to her lips, saying that it was "cold and very nasty." Finally, she came and sat down on the sofa by the side of Mr. Luxmoore, but complained of our staring too fixedly at her, and said we were to turn away our gaze. Florence then told us to lower the lamp a little and place it on the piano, and she played with great feeling and exquisite touch some music that was strange to me. It is no disparagement to say that Miss Showers, who is a fair pianiste, is completely surpassed by her wonderful familiar. Florence then made a further tour round the room, and at last retired to the curtain, where, at my request, she stood to be measured against the folding door. Her height exceeded that of the medium by fully three inches. She seemed loath to leave, but said she must, at length, as the power was fast diminishing. We thanked her and Peter (who, during the whole seance, had joined in the conversation, and expressed his opinions very freely); and Florence, wishing us all adieu, walked behind the curtain. After an interval of five or six minutes the medium awoke and came out of the cabinet. She said she had been asleep the whole time, and was quite unconscious of what had taken place. This excellent seance lasted one hour and ten minutes.

The Friends of Progress, holding weekly meetings in this city, are occasionally treated to essays in prose and verse. At the last meeting a number of "Machine Rhymes," were read, of which the following are specimens:

The nation has wealth and plenty to spare
To let all the poor have their coveted share.
Let those who have lands they never will till
Be obliged to disgorge to the poor man who will.

There are thousands of acres, the best in the land,
And thousands of men these acres demand,
And women and children are hungry and poor,
Who pine for the comforts these lands would secure.

Arise from your slumbers! To battle, ye toilers!
Too long in your weakness you've bowed to the spoilers;
Let Freedom and Right be your motto forever,
For freedom once gained shall be wrung from you never.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Tappan says if God were to kill the devil he would be under the necessity of slaying ninety-nine one-hundredths of the human family.

The faculties of the mind are generally treated much in this fashion: those that the individual finds the most useful in the way of money-getting he develops assiduously by exercise; and the other faculties, whose exercise would embarrass and impede the increase of his wealth, he leaves to die out in disuse. Thus it is that we find so many fragments of men and so few men.

SELF CULTURE.

One of the best writers for the Index (Boston) is A. W. Stevens, the associate editor, whose articles are always instructive, interesting and full of pithy sentences which contain useful lessons, food for reflection. The following are extracts from an article entitled "Selfhood, not Selfishness:"

There are too many men and women who misapprehend the just rights and claims of selfhood; who depreciate that primary regard which Nature expects them to have for themselves.

Nature deals with man just as she does with the apple, the berry, the corn in the field; she gives the germ, the seed, and then expects the full-grown fruit as a recompense.

The first and the best gift which Nature makes to man is himself. And the first as well as the last and best return which Nature expects man to make her is that of himself—his ripened, matured and perfected self.

The first duty, then, which a man owes, is to himself—since himself improved upon is the debt which he has to pay back to the universe. He has nothing at all to bestow on anybody else until he first has accumulated something in his own being. A beggar only is he until he has acquired something to give.

There are multitudes of people who are actually squandering their natures in trying to be good and kind to others; whose individualities literally are being ground to powder under a mistaken sense of duty. It is pathetic to stand by while this is transpiring; for, though one cannot but admire the motive that prompts to it, one must as inevitably deplore the result.

Physically, intellectually, and spiritually, man's first concern is necessarily for himself. He must grow, ripen and mature. His nature must become full of richness, sweetness, strength and beauty. Self-culture is his duty and his privilege. To make the most of himself is his highest possible art. To render his being full-orbed is his completest attainment. Otherwise he cheats Nature; otherwise he defrauds the world.

THE Massachusetts Young Men's Christian Associations have just held their eighth annual convention. The Boston Association alone reported a membership of 2,300, "about 900 of them active." What they are "active" about is perhaps explained in part by the following resolution, one of a series reported by the committee on resolutions:

"Resolved, That we recommend to the convention not to divorce religion from politics, but in every political canvass to conscientiously and prayerfully use their influence in sustaining such men and measures as will, in their opinion, best serve the interests of morality and temperance." This smooth phraseology means in plain English, ("morality" being inseparable from "faith") that only Evangelical Christians should be elected to public office; and to secure this result is undoubtedly one of the chief objects of the Young Men's Christian Association. In all political questions involving the interests of Evangelical Christianity, (and they are multiplying daily) a compact, well-organized body of practical workers stand ready for active exertions in support of "such men and measures" as shall promote them. No wonder that it is such an herculean task to unloose the Church's grip from the State! Protestantism is drilling its Jesuits for the coming struggle, and means to be prepared. But what is Liberty doing?—The Index.

BRIEF EXTRACTS.

Who knows if the love which in this world draws with mutual and irresistible attraction two kindred and predestinated hearts be not an unconscious renewal of an old pre-natal bond?

Goodness ought not to be a matter of conscience only, but the outcome of inspiration as well. When it is the former alone, it is not only juiceless, unrelishing and unlovely, but is absolutely killing,—as the letter without the spirit always is.

Laboring men are not thereby qualified to speak of the remedy for the present evils connected with labor. They can tell what work is, but not the remedy. The man who never did a day's work with his hands may be the man who has got the solution of the question.—E. D. Linton.

Thinking people look back with horror upon the blood-tracks left in history by all credal religions, most especially by that one of them called Christianity. The very name of it is a falsehood. Christ is a Hindu god, grafted on the Nazarene, Jesus. Really, the whole of the world's faiths are but modifications of the star-worship of the Chaldeans. To all thinking minds all the deities and their families, all the celestial courts and their angels and demons, are absurd follies.

Oh man! fear not for thy affections, and feel no dread lest life should efface them. There is neither to-day nor yesterday in the powerful echoes of memory; there is only always. He who no longer feels, has never felt. There are two memories—the memory of the senses, which wears out with the senses, and in which perishable things decay; and the memory of the soul, for which time does not exist, and lives out at the same instant every moment of its love. Fear not, ye who love. Time has power over hours, none over the soul.—Lamertine.

Certain laborers in Spain annually produced a certain number of bottles of wine. These productions were sold by my father and his partners, who kept nine-tenths, or thereabout, of the price themselves, and gave one-tenth, or thereabout, to the laborers. In which state of "mutual beneficence" my father and his partners naturally became rich, and the laborers as naturally remained poor. Then my good father gave all his money to me (who never did a stroke of work worth my salt, not to mention my dinner).—Ruskin.

Neither Materialism nor Spiritualism are scientific terms, and one need have no concern with them in a scientific inquiry, which, if it be true to its spirit, is bound to have regard only to what is within its powers and to the truth of its results. It would seem to be full time that vague and barren disputations concerning Materialism and Spiritualism should end, and that instead of continuing such fruitless and unprofitable discussion, men should apply themselves diligently to discover, by direct interrogation of Nature, how much matter can do without spiritual help. Let each investigator pursue the method of research which most suits the bent of his genius, and here, as in other departments of Science, let each system be judged by its fruits, which cannot fail in the end to be the best sponsors and sureties of its truth. But the physiological inquirer into mind may, if he cares to do so, justly protest against the easy confidence with which some metaphysical psychologists disdain physiological inquiry, and ignore its results, without ever having been at the pains to make themselves acquainted with what these results are, and with the steps by which they have been reached.—Henry Maudsley, M. D.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO

FAUST—What seek ye, mighty, gentle tones,
Sweet heavenly notes, my purpose daunting?
Sound somewhere else where softer manhood groans,
Your message tho' I hear my faith is wanting.
For miracle is young faith's dearest child;
Up towards those spheres I do not dare to struggle,
Whence the sweet story thrills in accents mild;
But to these strains accustomed from a child,
They call me back now to this world of trouble.
Ere on my head fell heaven's rich holy kiss
Of love divine in sacred Sabbath stillness;
Then pealed with such sweet presage bell tones fullness,
And prayer too was a sort of holy bliss.
A noble longing, felt but unexpressed,
Then drove we thro' the wood and mead,
And whilst hot tears fell on my breast
I felt a world arisen indeed.
These were the notes that once my boyhood's game
The free joy of spring holidays announced;
Remembrance holds me now, with childish shame,
The last sad, serious step well nigh renounced.
Oh! sing once more, ye sweet, strong, heavenly voices!
My tears flow fast, and earth once more my choice is.

CHORUS OF DISCIPLES—Hath now our buried one,
Perfect when living,
Here below worried one,
Come up to heaven;
Is he in growing joy,
Near to us blessing all?
We yet in grief's alloy
Here linger, missing all;
Thou Lord, hast left us here
Drooping behind thee,
Master we drop the tear
Till we may find thee.

CHORUS OF ANGELS—Christ has arisen!
Out of mortality,
Out of your prison,
Tear yourselves gladly free,
To all who've praised his name,
Shown love to all, the same,
Traveled to spread his fame,
Supping together came,
Helped all the blind and lame,
To such the master's near,
To such he's here!

BEFORE THE TOWN.

[Strollers of all descriptions come out of it.]

SOME JOURNEMEN—Why do you seek along that road your goal?

OTHERS—We are going up to the old shooting box.*

THE FIRST—But we would rather towards the old mill stroll.

ONE—I would suggest the Lake House near the rocks.

ANOTHER—The path that leads there is by no means pretty.

THE SECOND PARTY—And what say you?

A THIRD—I shall go with the others.

FOURTH—Come up to Burgdorf, leave the seething city,

For there you'll find, I warrant you my brothers,

The prettiest maidens, and the strongest beer,

And rows of the first class.

FIFTH—You roystering blade,

Itches your hide again, have you no fear?

I want go with you there, for I'm afraid.

SERVANT GIRL—No, no! I shall go back again to town.

OTHERS—We're safe to find him near those poplars there.

FIRST—And if we should I do not care,

He's always pinned fast to your gown,

With you alone he walks or dances.

Why should I fret about your fancies?

OTHERS—To-day he's surely not alone.

He said that curly wig would with him come.

STUDENT—Gad! how you sturdy damsel's stride?

Come brothers, come, we must keep by their side;

Strong heady beer, a well filled coloring meerschaum;

And a nice well rigged wench, there's my diversion!

YOUNG LADIES—Ah! only see those handsome fellows,

What execrable taste they show;

They might have decent company as well as

Good fun, yet after those coarse servants go.

SECOND STUDENT TO FIRST—Nay, not so fast, behind come tripping two

Not badly dressed—by Jove, two lovely girls;

I think I twig my pretty neighbor's curls;

I have a penchant for the girl, not new;

They seem demure, look shyly on the ground,

And yet they'll take us with them, I'll be bound.

FIRST—No, brother no, that's not my little game,

Look sharp, let us not lose you late flushed covey;

The hand that sweeps on Saturday, the same

On Sunday will be most disposed to love ye.

TOWNSMAN—No, the new Burgomaster's not my sort;

Since he's installed he bears a cheeky port,

And for our town what is he doing?

It seems to be his every day's endeavor,

To make us yield, far more than ever,

And pay—why, man 'tis utter ruin!

BEGGAR SINGS—Good gentlemen, and lovely ladies

With gay attire, and cheeks of rose.

Deign to assist me, for my trade is

A poor one, as you may suppose.

Let me not bide here, vainly singing,

He only's glad, who gives away,

A day which joy to all is bringing

Should be for me a harvest day.

OTHER OTHERS—No sort of chat on these days suits me better
Than Sunday tales of war and war's alarms,
When, far away from us, the hostile swarms
Out one another's throats in Turkey. Calmly set, or Around the window standing, then my friends
We drain our glasses, watch the white sails gliding
Down the big river; in blessed place confiding.
Contented home, in blessed place confiding.
THIRD OTHERS—Yes, neighbor, yes, that's just my mind about it;
The fools may split each other's stupid scones,
Turn all things upside down, the foreign dunces,
So we have peace, and feel no cause to doubt it.

OLD WOMAN (To the Young Ladies.)—Ah! what sweet toilets, beautiful young doves,
Who that's once seen could ere again forget you?
But why so proud my dears? All right, my loves,
What you would like, I'm the old girl could get you!

LADY—Agatha, go! be off! I'll take good heed
Ne'er with such witches on the street to be;
Why, on Saint Andrew's night, she showed, indeed
She did, my future lover bodily to me!

ANOTHER—To me she showed him once, a soldier stout
In a round crystal, with more heroes there,
I look around, I seek him everywhere,
Yet can I never find my darling out.

SOLDIERS—Castles with lofty Turrets, deep ditches;
Maidens as haughty,
Scornful as witches;
There are our riches,
Hard to win each is,
Battle or play.
And the harsh trumpet
Woes with shrill duetion.
Gaily to pleasure,
As to destruction;
Rush to the breaches,
Life's joys fall on us,
Castles and wench
Must yield their honors.
Such are our riches,
Hard to win each is,
And the brave soldier
Marches away!

THE THREE-FOLD CORD.

Have hope! Though clouds environ round,
And gladness hides her face in scorn,
Put thou the shadow from thy brow,
No night but hath its morn.

Have faith! Where'er thy bark is driven—
The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this: God rules the hosts of heaven,
The inhabitants of earth.

Have love! Not love alone for one,
But man, as man, thy brother call;
And scatter, like the circling sun,
Thy charities on all.

Signs of the Times.

Seventy thousand men are now said to be out of work in New York.

Under Grant the number of Federal office-holders has increased from 54,207 to 86,660.

A daughter of Joseph Arch, the champion of English agricultural laborers, has appeared as a lecturer in the English provinces.

By a recent order of the Austrian Government Prussian school books and Prussian teachers are excluded from Austrian schools.

The German astronomer, Vogel, proposes a new classification of stars, to be made on the principle that the phase of development of the star is mirrored in its spectrum.

The rich men of New York each winter sustain soup houses for the poor. If society was established on just principles there would be few so poor as to need this kind of aid.

England is just now agitated by the discussion of religious subjects. Gladstone fears the inroads of Catholicism, and all sects are trembling at the developments of modern spiritualism.

The Beecher Tilton trouble has led to the issue of a new portrait of Beecher—a line engraving in the highest style of the art. It is said to have an immense sale—meantime Beecher charges $1000 a night for his lectures.

The loss in the publication of such a paper as The Republic, recently started in New York, must be immense. Its income cannot be large, while its expenses evidently foot up hundreds of thousands of dollars per annum.

The Boston Herald says of a medium in Boston: "The writer of this has not only seen the piano dance while the lady sat playing on it, but rise upon two of its legs while the medium stood at the opposite end with her hands upon the top." The Banner of Light says the piano is raised while five or six men are sitting on it.

Mr. Lister, one of the wealthiest English manufacturers of velvet, worked his way to success by experiments with silk rags. After sinking over $1,500,000, he discovered a process of manufacture which enabled him to make large profits. His factory cost $3,000,000, and he employs over 4,000 men.

Mrs. Flynt's patent straps, buckles and buttons, the foundation of her reform dress, are rejected by most women who have tried them. There is too much machinery about the apparatus. What women want is to get rid of most of the paraphernalia they already have. She needs to discard half of the notions of fashion, and dress to suit herself.

The rearing of the Angora goat is attracting attention in Australia.

A wordy conflict between the Church and Government is under headway in Chili.

An encouraging feature of the times is the increase in the number of scientific lectures, and the advance made in scientific literature.

The respect with which the secular press now refer to spiritualism and the space given to details of phenomena are obvious signs of the times.

The defeat of the Republican party teaches a good lesson, while it also proves that the people are not corrupt, and will never sustain corruption in political leaders.

The total amount of untaxed property in New York City, is about $150,000,000, one third of which is church property and another third belongs to various public institutions.

It is again stated that the electrical light invented by a Russian savant is a great success. Its cost is a mere trifle, while its convenience, and the beauty of the light is very great.

Col. Henry S. Olcott, who recently wrote an account of the Eddy family manifestations for the New York Sun, is preparing for publication a volume on the subject of Spiritual phenomena.

Sothorn is playing Dundreary to crowded houses in London, where he has heretofore acted the part three thousand times. It is a foolish thing, but people admire folly, because they know how to appreciate it.

The Lompoc ranch, near Santa Barbara, which was recently purchased by various persons on speculation, for $500,000, sold at auction for over $1,500,000 exclusive of a large number of lots reserved for a town site.

A man named Harness, living in London, invented a system of machinery for moving tables, and producing an appearance like a materialized spirit, and this he calls an expose of Spiritualism. He has simply exposed his own ignorance. He might as well have invented an ingenious lie to prove that no one can tell the truth.

The spirits which materialize at the house of the Eddy family frequently speak three or four languages during a seance. As the Eddies are uneducated, this fact is a staggerer to the skeptics, but they manage to hint at a possible cause when they say, "Well, some one in the audience understands, and it comes from the minds of the spectators. How it comes they cannot tell; but that they may not admit the truth they imagine a cause which is as great a mystery and requires quite as much credulity as a belief in materialization.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.—NO. 2.

REPLY TO REV. MR. PLATT, BY E. VOGEL.

Rev. Mr. Platt insists much on the merit of religion for having fostered and promoted the science of architecture and astronomy, although it appears from his statements that religion did so little for science that the church remained for 1400 years under the radical errors which it had allowed the pagan Ptolemy to impress upon it before correcting them. If religion has deserved credit for the protection of some sciences, it must justly be called to account, and to answer for having opposed and opposing other sciences. Why shall mankind be allowed to establish the principles of architecture, astronomy, chemistry and mechanics on the basis of the natural laws, and not likewise the principles of cosmogony, physiology and the establishment of proper relations between men? Why shall the divine and eternal laws of nature be repudiated and despised in special departments; why the law of cause and effect cease to be applicable as soon as the investigation reaches that period of history, when the question of the cause or foundation of the assertions concerning religious revelations, presents itself? If the patience of the world is to be sorely tried, it will be by such arbitrary assumptions of religion, not by science maintaining the natural order of things.

The revelation of God to man, in the language of the phenomena of nature, is continuous above all misapprehension, universal. It is effected through the instrumentality of our organisms, the laws of which are beyond our reach. In virtue of these laws our organization is fitted and adapted to the circumstances of life on earth. We are, by means of our senses, in a necessary and definite manner, connected with the rest of the universe, and from this connection result the laws of our being. It is the same for all organic creatures—the law of evolution, or slow and gradual development, under the influences and impulses of life. The development of our bodies, of our intellectual and moral faculties, of our energy of action, they are all inseparably connected, dependent on each other and on the impulses of life. Sensation is the great agent of organic nature, by means of which life is evolved from life. It is a state of the organism dependent on nutrition, and presides over nutrition, being in such relation to it as to express, by the feeling of well being or pain, the different states of nutrition bearing on the welfare and preservation of the organism, states which nutrition necessarily and naturally undergoes through the influences of life. Sensation, in addition to being the reporter of the states of well being or suffering of the organism, is the master power of all involuntary or reflex, as well of all voluntary, action. Corresponding to these two functions there are two modifications of sensation, the general sensations, the feeling of pain and pleasure, expressive of the internal states of the body, its natural wants, instincts, desires; they are at the bottom of our emotions, affections and passions, and furnish the immediate impulses of action. Second, the sensations expressive of the modification of the general feeling by means of the impressions through the senses. They give rise to our ideas, and by development under the influences of life, fill the blank of our consciousness with the contents of the experience of an outer world. They constitute our intellect and the guiding and directing power of our nature. In virtue of the law of our organization we are attracted towards the sources of impressions of pleasure and well being as conducive to preservation and prosperity, and repelled from all that produces pain as destructive to our being. This property is the foundation of our capacity to distinguish, to compare, to judge; it embraces the elements of our reasoning power. Displacement of the weaker by the stronger impressions, prevailing of the more over the less attractive or painful, is the principle or essence of our will, whose energy is determined by the acuteness of feeling and the intensity of impressions.

By means of sensation, its perfectibility and reaction on the structure of the component parts of our organisms, is life the condition of life and of human progress and happiness. Abundance of food, and other necessities of life, produce growth, maturity, strength and well being. To obtain food and the other means of subsistence, our exertions have to come into play; in the strife for existence we gain experience, our intelligence is developed, our senses are formed and refined; with the increase of the wants the means of gratification increase in proportion; a higher civilization discloses new sources of enjoyment, excites new desires, which impel to greater exertions and so on, ad infinitum, to unknown phases of life and development. The moral law of nature, the attraction between the sexes, and the increase of happiness in proportion to the development and progress of mankind, are the natural foundations of the institution of families, societies and States. Their establishment has to encounter the selfish instincts and passions of human nature, and the conflict of interests arising from the law of the struggle for existence, which is owing to the higher rate of increase of organic beings in proportion to the rate of increase of the means of subsistence.

The life of a collective body, a corporation, must depend essentially on the same conditions as that of the natural body. It can have no other object than the happiness of each member, no other means than the co-operation of all, no other chance of existence but its success. The law of evolution, gradual development and progress by means of the impulses of life, self development through self exertion, must apply to corporate as to individual bodies. The good will of individuals and their capacity to accomplish common good, reacting on each other in such a manner that the steps of result, obtained by the first combined efforts, will produce corresponding steps of stronger desire for more perfect union and more gratifying achievements, and this process of mutual reaction between desire and success repeating itself again and again, the most complete physical perfection will at last be obtained, and customs and habits established—that is, unwritten, but living laws productive of the most perfect harmony, the most enlightened experience and the most energetic enthusiasm for the cause of the general welfare. Such will be the moral law of nature. It will render the strong passions of human nature subservient to the great objects of society, by means of the overwhelming influence that man is capable of exercising over his fellow beings. Self love, self gratification, self esteem—ennobled or restrained by public opinion, respect, honor, acknowledgment; benevolence, kindness and friendship—strengthening the bonds of union; honesty and justice—establishing confidence and security; skill, knowledge, temperance, economy, industry—productive of health and prosperity, and the enjoyment, contentment and happiness derived from organization and general improvement; that is civilization, creating at last an energy, courage and enthusiasm for the commonwealth, ready to lay down life itself in its defense.

ASTROLOGY.

MR. EDITOR:—In your last there is a call for more light on Astrology from Prof. Chaney. I hope the Professor will be obedient to the celestial call, and I will agree to be one to back the call with those inducements which even clergymen cannot resist. Much has been written against Astrology, both in modern and ancient times, but I have not seen anything written against it by one who thoroughly understands it. Cicero has been claimed by some to have been a believer in Astrology, but the following objections to Astrology by Cicero, prove him to have had but a very limited knowledge of its first principles:

“For, as according to the Chaldeans, the birth of infants is regulated by the moon, and as they observe and take notice of the natal stars with which the moon happens to be in conjunction at the moment of a nativity, they are founding their judgment on the most fallacious evidence of their eyes, as to matters which they ought to behold by reason and intellect. For the science of Mathematics, with which they ought to be acquainted, should teach them the comparative proximity of the moon to the earth, and its relative remoteness from the planets Venus and Mercury, and especially from the Sun, whose light it is supposed to borrow. And the other three intervals, those, namely, which separate the Sun from Mars, from Jupiter and from Saturn, and the distance also between that and the heaven, which is the bound and limit of our universe, are infinite and immense. What influence, then, can such distant orbs transmit to the moon, or rather to the earth? * * * If, then, the condition of the atmosphere is affected by the energy and virtue of the stars, sometimes in one way and sometimes in another, how can those children who are born at the same time in different climates be subject to the same starry influences in various quarters of the globe? For instance, in the country in which we Romans inhabit, the dog-star rises some days after the summer solstice, while among the Troglodytes, a people of Africa, it is said to rise before it. So that if I were to grant that the heavenly influences have an effect upon all the children who are born upon the earth, it would follow that all who are born at the same time in different regions of the earth, must be born not with the same, but with different inclinations according to the different conditions of climate; which, however, they by no means admit. For they persist in maintaining that all children who are born at the same period, have at their nativity the same astrological destinies allotted to them, whatever their native country may be. * * * For though some pretend that the Chaldean astrologers have verified the nativity of children by calculations and experiments in the cases of all the children who have been born for 470,000 years, this is a mistake. For had they been in the habit of doing so, they would never have given up the practice. But, as it is, no author remains who knows of such a thing being done now, or ever having been done.”—Cicero on Divination.

Much more might be quoted, but enough has been given to show that Cicero was not an astrologer, and like many at the present day denounced it without knowledge. However I leave him to the tender mercies of Prof. Chaney. Another famous modern writer gives another objection as follows:

“The great misfortune of astrologers is, that the heavens have changed since the rules of the art were laid down. The sun, which at the equinox was in the Ram in the time of the Argonauts, is now in the Bull; and astrologers, most unfortunately for their art, now attribute to one house of the Sun that which visibly belongs to another. Still, this is not a demonstrative argument against Astrology. The masters of the art are mistaken; but it is not proved that the art cannot exist.”—Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary. Art. Astrology.

Claudius Ptolemy, a millenium and a half before Voltaire was born, provided for this very objection, and was as well acquainted with the doctrine of the precession of the equinoxes as Voltaire; and his work “Tetrabiblos” is the great text book of Astrology. Voltaire is also left to the tender mercies of the Professor. And he will be most tender, for Cicero and Voltaire are two of the canonized saints of Liberalism. Now if the Professor will lay down clearly the laws of Astrology, as astrologers interpret them, perhaps some one might be found who would object to Astrology without misrepresenting it.

Yours for enlightenment, VOX STELLARUM.

I really wonder at so much confusion on the subject. It seems to me only the building of a babel—a feeling in the dark.”

WAS PRESIDENT LINCOLN A SPIRITUALIST?

I often see it stated in public print that the martyr President was a Spiritualist, but do not remember having ever seen any evidence whatever upon the subject. Evidence is what is needed, and although I possess only a little, still I am ready to contribute it, hoping that it may be the means of inducing others, who possess far more, to lay it before the public. At the risk of being tedious, I shall detail the circumstances, giving names and dates, so as to afford an opportunity for contradiction, in case I make false statements.

In the autumn of 1865, among my fellow boarders at a hotel on Fulton street, New York, were Prof. Greenough, author of "Greek Fire," inventor of a method for deodorizing and rendering non-explosive the various coal oils, so called, and one of the best living chemists; also Prof. Lindsley, formerly Principal of the Kentucky Military College, then engaged in constructing a gigantic steam drill for tunnelling through rock, a man possessing rare scientific abilities, and finally, Col. Miller, an uneducated man, but possessed of a splendid intellect. He was the inventor of "Miller's Steam Condenser," wherein he demonstrated that hot water would condense steam more rapidly than cold water.

All these men were devout Spiritualists, were acquainted in Washington, knew that Lincoln was a Spiritualist, and during an acquaintance of more than a year, they often spoke of the circumstance, relating anecdotes connected with Mr. Lincoln's investigations of the spiritual phenomena.

Col. Miller had married Isabelle Laurie, of Washington City. Mr. Laurie had held a clerkship in the Post Office Department in Washington more than thirty years, and was consequently well known to members of Congress. Mr. Laurie possessed a fine intellect, and though not highly educated, he was a most accomplished gentleman, appearing to far better advantage than the average Congressman. Col. Miller informed me that President Lincoln often sent for his wife, "Belle," as she was generally called, in order that he might consult with the spirits of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, etc., touching the vital interests of the country, for Belle possessed wonderful medium powers, inherited from both parents. During the winter of 1865-6, Belle Miller obtained a divorce from the Colonel, and Judge Cartter, who granted the decree, also decreed to her and her children all the right, title and interest of Col. Miller in and to the patent for the Steam Condenser. Prior to this decree I had entered into a written agreement to act as agent for the Condenser, and had a prospect of getting it started in New York. But this decree, although illegal, cast a shadow upon the Colonel's title, and in the spring I went to Washington for the purpose of arranging matters with his late wife, having previously opened a correspondence with her.

Belle met me at the hotel, and after concluding our business, I alluded to her medium powers, saying that I had never seen the spirits tip a piano, and requesting her to gratify me in this particular, she consented to do so if I would accompany her to her father's house. But I objected on the ground that if I did I should always afterwards have a suspicion that it was only a clever trick, whereas, if it could be done in the public parlor, at the hotel, I should not think it was done by mechanical contrivance. Reluctantly she consented. We found some thirty or forty ladies and gentlemen in the parlor, knotted in groups, and so busily engaged in conversation that our entrance was not noted. Belle said she was ashamed to play before so many, because out of practice. Besides it always caused excitement whenever the piano began to tip. The phenomenon was never produced except during the playing of one tune, a piece of martial music. To guard against attracting attention, she first played an ordinary air. When the playing had ceased to attract notice, save an occasional scowl, she whispered to me, for I was at her side, that she would now play the martial tune. The moment she struck the first note the whole piano seemed instinctive with life. It rocked like a cradle, save that it would continually make short motions between the longer ones, so that the noise of the feet kept time with the music, like the beating of a drum. This was in broad daylight, and I saw distinctly that there was no contact whatever, between her and the piano, except her fingers striking the keys.

Belle informed me that the spirit who tipped the piano was that of a soldier, who lost his life in defense of the old flag. She also told me that President Lincoln always enjoyed witnessing the phenomenon, seeming never to tire of it. He always consulted the spirits, through her, whenever important matters were under consideration, and as an evidence of his confidence in the invisibles, she told me of several occasions when he followed their advice instead of listening to his Cabinet, which advised to the exact contrary. Hence the difference between the President and his advisers, of which we so often heard vague hints.

All these statements were confirmed to me by Belle's parents, in addition to which Mrs. Laurie exhibited to me scores of notes in Mr. Lincoln's own hand writing, addressed to her, the substance of each being something as follows: "Come to the White House and bring your daughter with you this evening at 9 o'clock." Some of these notes were written upon letter paper, some on blank envelopes, and one on the margin of a piece of newspaper, all showing great haste and no ceremony. The critical reader may say that all this is mere heresay, and not testimony. I grant it, and it is with the hope of provoking others to speak, who have personal knowledge, (for I have no doubt that there are hundreds of such living) that I have made this statement.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION.

REPLY TO GEO. W. LEWIS.

MY FRIEND:—You, in a kind and respectful manner, express the opinion that if women are left free in their love relations, and protected from all compelling influences from men, they will lead a "promiscuous" sexual life. On the sexual nature of the human race I am considered one of the most radical—offensively radical—writers in America. That is found in my little book. But you carry the thing farther than I can. I doubt if you are careful in the use of the word "promiscuous." If I understand the meaning of the word, it would not be true of my wife, my mother or my sister. No more would your wife, mother or sisters lead such a life in freedom. Many animals and birds do not. Some are monogamic. I do not here hint that one order is more pure or higher than the other, but I am sure I could prove that woman would not be promiscuous. I think she would be less so than she is now often forced to be. I shall not here argue that point; but if it were true that woman is naturally promiscuous, I would still refuse to compel or control her on such matters. I could not think it wise to force the highest and purest species of female (woman) against her nature on so vital a point in her being. So far as I know what men call worship, I worship nature, or its God—if it has a God. To-day we know nothing in nature more perfect than man—male and female. I am sure the time is near when a man, or a company of men, who should propose to control woman on such matters by his laws (made alone, at first, to protect his sexual claims, as if woman was like a piece of land or a horse,) will be considered inhuman. I write this in no disrespect for Mr. Lewis. I write prophecy. I think I see it clearly with my mental eyes, though I do not claim to have grown to a full realization of it myself. Yet I confess I am to-day more or less in sympathy with Mr. Lewis in his dread of so great a change. In many things woman takes more than her rights now, but if the sexual freedom of woman does not finally ultimate in the improvement of our race, then our race must prove to be a failure. In many respects I deplore the condition and the conduct of both sexes. I do not think women better than men; I only insist that woman should control in some matters and men in others.

AUSTIN KENT.

Stockholm, New York, Nov, 6, 1874.

P. S.—I think woman man's equal in sin and folly, as well as in goodness and wisdom. They are not alike. One sex is better where the other is worse. Woman's folly and waste, in time and means, in her vain dressing, in view of all its consequences, is not less bad—less ruinous for our country—than man's drinking. It causes the death of twice—thrice as many persons. She is, in this, growing worse. This will lessen the number of marriages in the future ten times more than free love. I deplore this. If conjugally freed she will act very unwisely. It will be a terribly severe school. The patient is in a bad condition and growing worse. The medicine that will cure will first make more sick. I would faithfully instruct and counsel all youth on such matters—caution both sexes. For the time I advise most persons to marry. I caution all maidens not to rush impulsively and thoughtlessly into transient and sexual relations. I tell the young man to count the cost. He cannot do a meaner or more unjust thing than to neglect to meet his obligation as a father to his child and its mother. A woman should not accept the embraces of a man whom she does not think has love and principle enough to do this. Nothing can be more sacred in this life than such relations.

A. K.

THE JEFFERSON LEAGUE AND THE COMMUNE.

It has been said there is no difference between the Commune and the Jefferson League. There is this difference: While we both seek the same result, so far as the more equal distribution of the necessities, comforts and labor of life are in question, yet there is a vast difference in the mode of arriving at it. While the Communists believe there is no way to accomplish the object but by a bloody slaughter of all opposition, and are preparing for the work, we say: "Hold a little; let us try the ballot fairly, test its power thoroughly, and then, if it fails, we will admit there is no other way, and the consequences must fall upon those who have sown the Dragon's teeth." We claim that we can, by a fair use of the ballot, so change the constitutions and laws of the land as to limit the ownership of land, and adopt a graduated tax law that will reverse the present order of things, and compel the drones of society to pay, what they in justice should do, nearly all the expenses of government, and relieve the poor of a burden they now bear almost exclusively. By this course the rich would become poorer, and the poor would become richer, which will have a tendency to equalize conditions without any convulsion of society or breaking up of government. Then we say to both parties, capital and labor: "It is better for you to sustain the Jefferson League, and thereby prevent the necessity of the Commune." So far, the drones, or non-producers, of all ages, have found efficient means of punishment to compel obedience to their unjust decrees. By fire and faggot, rack and gibbet, shooting and starving, they have succeeded in bringing the laboring many into subjection and slavery. But times are changing; and so sure as rising vapor brings rain, so sure continued poverty and oppression will produce "Communism." Nearly all law, and expense of government, is made to protect capital and monopoly. Then let capital pay the cost by a graduated tax, decreasing about one-half per cent. on every thousand dollars below twenty, leaving all above twenty thousand to pay the same per cent, which is no more than their just proportion of the expenses of government incurred for their special benefit. At least then all persons owning less than twenty thousand dollars, should support the Jefferson League, as their taxes would be less than they now are, if their ideas are carried out. If all voters owning less than twenty thousand will vote with us, and for their own interest, we can carry every election in the State, three to one.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, NOV. 21, 1874.

DR. P. B. RANDOLPH, the noted seer and orator, a brilliant speaker and a man of rare abilities as a writer, will be in California in a few weeks for the purpose of giving a course of lectures in our principal towns.

NELLIE S. DAVIS, who was expected to give a course of lectures before the Spiritualists' Union, in this city, in December, has written that she cannot come. It is probable that Miss Augusta Whiting will occupy the platform during that month.

The spiritualists of Santa Barbara are about to organize a society. We hope they may be successful. They need Bro. York down there. He gets all the Free Thought element into his organization, and Spiritualism is not hurt a bit by it.

The New York Graphic recently published a letter from one Dr. Beard, denouncing the Eddy family manifestations as humbug. He says a few dollars worth of drapery would be enough to enable him, Beard, to produce all the so-called spirit figures. The letter bears the marks of untruth on its face, and it was immediately answered most effectually by another writer in the Graphic of the following day, yet the Evening Post of this city copies it with editorial commendation, and conveniently ignores the reply.

MRS. LAURA CUPPY SMITH, who has so many warm friends in California, has arrived in San Francisco with her family, and it is said will remain here permanently, or at least during the winter. Aside from a cold contracted on the journey, she is in good health. The experience of the last few years has added much to her power as a public speaker and her influence as a social reformer. Admirable as she was at the time Californians knew her years ago, she is even more so now, being more mature in judgment, more profound in thought and more susceptible to spirit influences of a high order. She is to speak to-morrow afternoon and evening in the hall of the Spiritualists' Union, 911 Market street.

WE NEED A STATESMAN!

This is the cry all over the country. The third term is dead. If Grant ever entertained the idea he has abandoned it. If he had not, the people would have abandoned him. In this hour of encroachment and aggrandizement the people naturally think of old usages. The best Presidents we have ever had have never sought a third term, and at this time it would be an innovation not to be tolerated. Unfortunately we have no prominent man who seems to pre-eminently deserve the place, or to whom the people may look with confidence to fill it with honor. It is certain that Grant is not such a man. He has been derelict in his duty. He has permitted corruption to crawl all around him, and never in any case has given it a public rebuke. He has never pointed out the slippery path of fraud to the people, nor has he set his face against those who have traveled in that path. Fraud and extravagance have thriven under his administration, and he has never raised his voice or wielded his power to arrest their progress.

Equally in vain do we look in either house of Congress for the man to fill the Presidential chair. Though there are some intelligent, unselfish and patriotic men in Congress, there is not one that commands the public confidence. There is no great leader. Formerly Statesmen made public opinion. Now the journals of the country mould the public mind, and even decide who shall be the prominent public men. This change is not perhaps to be deprecated, yet the results, as we see them manifested to-day, are not matters for congratulation. Scheming politicians and venal journalists have joined hands, and between the two the people have been deceived, and deprived of their just rights. Corrupt legislation has gradually brought the country into troubles not dreamed of by the fathers of the Republic. The nation is to-day a giant in bonds, and there are no means of escape short of a violent overthrow of those through whose acts the wrongs have come. We are giving millions annually to our great bankers out of the public purse by a false and pernicious system of finance. We have multiplied offices and increased salaries till the public burden has become intolerable. We have given the public lands in a manner to favor great land lords against the interests of the people. We have made fraudulent appropriations through bribed congressmen, till the treasury is depleted near to bankruptcy. And for years fraud and venality have so prevailed that the Republic is disgraced in our own eyes, and before all the world.

It is a matter for congratulation that our Pacific coast Congressmen are far better than the average. Sargent is an able and an honest man. Clayton is incorruptible, and the others are also men of good intentions. Next year Booth will take his seat in the Senate. He comes fresh from the people, under the influence of the cry for reform. He will probably act in Congress with the opposition. Should he redeem his pledges and fulfill the hopes of his constituents, he will, in this day of small fry politicians, be a prominent man, and fortune may give him the Presidential chair.

Jones, of Nevada, has thus far made an excellent record. Though a man of wealth, he is a true friend of the people. His speeches have been able, and his votes generally right. His name has been mentioned in connection with the second place on the Republican ticket, but with the present aspect of the political horizon, it is not to be presumed that he would seek such a position. If the opposition are united the Republican party cannot succeed at the next election.

COMMON SENSE is not attached to any political party. It is the friend of reform, no matter under what name. It takes little interest in politics, beyond its interest in the welfare of the people and of the nation, and refers to these facts not in a partisan spirit, but as an observer of current events. Let the right prevail.

COMMON SENSE STOCK.

We desire to sell immediately enough of the stock of the "Common Sense Publishing Company" to enable us to make the first payment for a Job Printing Office, a branch of the business the profits from which will sustain the paper until it becomes self-supporting, and this will be the case as soon as there are two thousand names on our subscription list. Some of our friends do not wish their names mentioned, but we feel at liberty to acknowledge the receipt of thirty dollars from Los Angeles. Mr. R. Montague, who writes, inclosing the money, says Mr. R. M. Hawkins and himself intended to send $10 each, but he adds: "Being an old man of 74 years, and at all times ready to pass over, I concluded to double my ten, hoping it will do you more good than it can me, and I wish you to issue my stock equally to Brother and Sister Dean Clarke." He closes his letter as follows: "Wishing you success in battling for the rights, advancement and happiness of humanity, and hoping that you will live to see the spiritual philosophy established upon a higher plane, the delight of the world," etc. Now these are the kind of friends that our enterprise needs to sustain it in its infancy. By-and-by, it will be beyond the need of such help, and instead of desiring to sell the stock at one-fifth its value, to obtain means for the payment of current expenses, we shall be earning a profit over all expenditures, and be able at the same time to publish a better paper and more of it. Then the stock will be worth at least five dollars per share, and will pay good interest on that sum.

The friends of Prof. W. H. Chaney will be glad to learn that he has returned to this city, and will probably remain here during the winter. He is to be found at 314 Bush street, Room 35. Read his card, at the head of the last column, on the last page. We are glad to announce that Prof. Chaney will write a series of articles for COMMON SENSE on the subject of Astrology, in which he will explain the causes of the disturbed condition of this planet to occur in 1881-2.

INDIVIDUALITY.

This was the subject of a lecture by Brother J. L. York, before the Spiritualists' Union, on Sunday evening last. He commenced by saying that it is a beautiful order in nature that everything has a distinct organization and character of its own. Individuality is something to be cultivated. Marked individuality of character is the crowning glory of man. Fashion is the deadly enemy of individualism. He here gave some hard hits at the follies of fashion—not merely fashions in dress, but in social customs. The habit of young men of drinking, smoking, etc., just because other people do so, is ruinous. Do not ape anybody. Be yourself. Not to be yourself is next to being nothing. The speaker had often been remonstrated with for some peculiarities of speech or manner, and it is true, he said, he might tone himself down, become very staid and circumspect, and possibly some people would like that style better, but meantime what would become of York? Why, he would be sunk out of sight. He wouldn't be anywhere. No, said he, I can't do that. There is room in the world for one York, just one and no more. There may not be as much of him as one could wish, but such as he is that he will be. If he grows naturally, all right; but he will not assume to be what he is not. Not to utter one's best thought is suicide to the soul. What the world needs is deeper private thought and a more perfect individualism. He spoke very briefly of Spiritualism, saying in reference to Tyndall's address, that Spiritualists do not believe the spirit is without form and void. Spirit bodies are of matter, and Spiritualists of all religionists have the least to fear from such investigators as Tyndall, or rather they have the most to hope from them. A creed, to be of any use in developing individuality, should be expansive in its nature. It should be as broad as the universe, and should not be closed against any truth, whether new or old. Spiritualism, he said, might be a power in the land, if it would. It might have an influential press and eloquent advocates on the rostrum, but it could not have these without doing something to sustain them. We have, he said, a spiritual journal, the only paper on this coast that will not misrepresent our faith, but it is not supported as it should be. It is not large, but it is healthy, and bids fair to grow into a grand representative of our glorious philosophy, if only given a chance. He said Jennie Leys lectured here two months, and, notwithstanding her eloquence, the secular press ignored her presence in the city, giving no reports whatever of her lectures. [Brother York might have added also that Miss Jennie Leys herself ignored the only journal that did notice her lectures—COMMON SENSE. Probably she did not think of it. The time may come when we shall not need such aid, but we shall never see the day when a just acknowledgment from friends of the cause will not be kindly appreciated. We are all dependent, more or less, upon one another, and every child has to be helped before it can walk. COMMON SENSE will soon be able to stand alone, but it will always warmly remember its early friends.

THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH.

The Heathens of the Heath will be hailed with a hearty welcome by the thousands who have read Exeter Hall with pleasure and profit. It is, like Exeter Hall, anti-christian, and is humanitarian in letter and spirit. The opening chapters are perhaps too philosophical or anti-theological to be very palatable to the average novel reader, who dislikes dry reading; but to the thinker they will not be dry, as they contain many startling and suggestive ideas. They will probably form an excellent forerunner of the forthcoming work by Dr. Draper: "History of the Conflict between Science and Religion." The brief, interesting sketch given by Mr. McDonnell of the persecuting spirit of the church, in its endeavor to suppress free thought and enlightened investigation, must give his readers a desire for more.

The staid, steady philosopher will object to having his valuable time dissipated in reading a novel. What has he to do with fiction and idle fancies? Everything. The pathway to Truth leads through fields of fiction. We approximate Truth only through errors and falsehoods. New ideas must be imparted by parable, metaphor or fable till the mind becomes fitted to receive the idea itself without guise. Try a child; can you impress its mind with an important truth in any other way than by allegory based on child experience? The best of us are only rising from one fiction to another while earnestly searching for Truth. The novel and the newspaper are the popular mediums for instruction and amusement, and should be utilized in the interest of free thought. In this Mr. McDonnell has done a service for Liberalism, the value of which can hardly be over estimated. Those who have lived a life of ease amid home comforts may think his picture of British heathen somewhat overdrawn, but those who have traveled through the British isles will testify that a tithe of their miserable condition has not been told. The Staffordshire potteries, and the brickyards in the suburbs of Manchester and other large cities, will more than furnish examples enough. Indeed they can be found in San Francisco, though it is only a quarter of a century old.

He is terribly severe on the pernicious priestly rule in England and Ireland, both Catholic and Protestant. Orangemen will not be thankful for his vivid description of the Belfast Riots. In all of his pen pictures he displays at once the taste of the poet and the artist. Nor is Spiritualism forgotten, though only incidentally introduced. His medium Zingari, an old gypsy, is a skeptic in regard to immortality and a Hindoo in religion. Her prophecies are all singularly fulfilled. Many Liberals will deem this the one defect of the work, that, while it destroys one superstition it gives birth to another; that, while it destroys confidence in priests and the Bible, it provides a reverence for gypsy lore and divination. She causes lovers to see their future affinity in a mirror, fathers their absent sons, etc. We are as yet too ignorant of the philosophy of prophecy to criticise it justly. We know one on whose word we can place implicit reliance, and who, like Zingari, is skeptical regarding immortality, declares that he had a vision of his wife before he had seen her. These things, instead of being cried down as superstition, should be investigated till the governing law is better understood. Of conservative Materialists he says:

"Such people, you know, talk confidently of the immutability of the Laws of Nature, but when they see what is deemed a violation of those laws in their very presence, they still doubt and pronounce the thing impossible. Galileo could not convince the priests that the world moved; he was even forced to deny the theory himself, yet still the earth revolved as before; and though Materialists deny that matter can be affected by what is called spiritual agency, yet objects are still moved by the same unexplained influences, and still many of such skeptics remain as positive as ever."

Considerable space is devoted to the consideration of Hindooism, and must renew a decided interest in the teachings of the benevolent Christna, and increase the demand for such works as "The Bible in India." As a novel it is exceedingly interesting, apart from its philosophical purpose, and recommends itself to the lover of romance as well as philosophy.

On Sunday last, after Dr. Cox, the street preacher, had left his dry goods box on Sacramento street, and was driving away in his buggy, Elder Hopkins, an Adventist, and S. Stetson, a Free Thinker, began to talk to the crowd, when Cox turned his horse back to the spot, and began to ask questions. Hopkins and Stetson asked him to go away, saying they had not disturbed his meeting. Cox persisted, and Stetson told him he ought to be in jail for disturbing the meeting, whereupon a policeman arrested not Cox, but Stetson, and took him to the calaboose. Hopkins called Cox a political preacher and mountebank, and was also arrested. Then Cox took the box again, and harangued the crowd, amidst much confusion. One Patrick McSwegan, taking advantage of a lull, advised Cox to get a pick and shovel and go to work, when lo, a policeman arrested McSwegan. This is nothing more than might be expected of the police, but it was a little more than was expected when, on the following day, the Police Judge imposed a fine of five dollars each on Hopkins and Stetson, and thirty dollars on McSwegan, while the cause of all the trouble, Cox, was commended for his forbearance! That Judge has received the last vote he'll ever get from at least one person we know of.

J. L. YORK.—This gentleman is to speak in Sacramento to-morrow, the next Sunday in Woodland; from there he goes to Stockton, thence to Petaluma and Napa. Friends of progress in these places will be doing a good work by making preparation in advance, so as to secure large audiences. It is as yet uncertain on what day Mr. York will be at each of these places, but friends will be informed in time, and if there are other towns in the vicinity where arrangements can be made for lectures, he will probably accept invitations. Letters for Mr. York sent to this office will be forwarded without delay.

LYCEUM FOR SELF CULTURE.

The meeting last Sunday was well attended. Dr. J. H. Swain opened the discussion on The Best Means of Self Culture by a scholarly essay, which gave evidence of careful thought and a comprehensive mind. He said self culture is learning, and applying the laws of self to self, in order to more fully utilize one's inherent powers. The best means are all means. Man is a microcosm. He can know only so much of himself as he perceives is related to things external. So that to know himself he must know all phenomena. There are the generic and individual laws of self culture. All men develop by the self-relating of their faculties to that which nourishes them. Each has its appetite. The desire of the eye to observe is its hunger. The growth of each is measured by the perfection of adaptation of food to its needs. This desire, common to the faculties, is love. The faculties are of different degrees of vigor to which their demands correspond, and require an intelligent will to harmoniously relate them. We must know how to relate all our functions with the world of things. Man has the power of generalizing laws. He conceives of them as perfect relations, and for bodies having the capacity they would be, but for others with less capacity they would produce discord. Principles are one thing, their application another. The teacher is most successful who aids the pupil by hints how to use his faculties. Weak organs cannot act like strong ones. The law must be modified and applied to existing states, not to what ought to be. The habits of our ancestors for millions of years are ingrained in our fibres. We cannot pluck them up like weeds. We are soil and plant. Each must be modified with reference to each other, and through each other. Hence the folly of attempting to legislate reforms into society, or change habits at once that are the result of ages of growth. The first and essential quality is self-reliance—respect for our own thought and judgment; to discard all authority but that of our own reason. All other judgments must be passed upon by ours. We need to become individualized. The more varieties the more wealth, power, refinement. The entire history of man is that of abject slavery. No one is free who depends on another for bread, and as society is to-day no one can be free. All that we are is inherited, so that our opinions are prejudices. The boy becomes a man only when he throws aside all opinions, and begins at the roots of his existence; questions every step up; becomes loyal to himself. Being unlike anyone else in the universe, his endowments must be to use according to the law of his nature. The experience of each is for himself. His well being depends upon how vigorously he exacts from all things the proper food for every faculty. No organization can hold such a man, for he contains them all, and makes use of them as his judgment dictates. The great man is he who makes his own rules—makes laws for others. Systems are strategic nets, made to catch minnows. It is singular that they who achieve success by removing the limitations others have imposed, reduce others to servitude by imposing their methods as limitations. They do not see that others should refuse to be governed by their methods as they refused to be ruled by any but their own. We must understand and be true to ourselves, and be able to measure our capacity so as not to waste time in fruitless effort. The Doctor then considered reading as a means of self culture, but no report can do justice to papers of this nature. They are to be considered as a whole.

The other speakers did not pretend to controvert what the Doctor said. Some of them were inclined to add to the means suggested in the address. It was generally conceded that a sound body must be sought, as well as a sound mind. The spiritualistic speakers vindicated themselves against the charge of insanity. There was a very general inclination to speak, and those who had assailed the spiritualistic ideas having spoken once on the same question, were shut out. One gentleman thought there is a means of self culture which had been entirely ignored. He said it is known that the human heart is depraved and desperately wicked, and there is but one means potent enough to reach it with saving grace. The fear of God, and the teachings of his word, are all that can reach the seat of the disease, or even produce a radical change. Another speaker said he did not see the case in that light. On the contrary, fear is a demoralizer; it never could be a source of happiness or content. As to that book, the Bible, its teachings are well calculated to deprave whoever listens to its counsels. David, the man after God's own heart, according to it, was a pretty specimen of self culture, and the entire book is replete with that which tends to lower the character of God and degrade humanity. One of the first objects of self culture must be to throw off all slavish fear and superstition, and give the mind scope to think for itself, and take for its facts not the teachings of that book, but of nature—

"To find in starry sky and verdant sod,
Leaves of that boundless book, writ by the hand of God."

The exercises closed with excellent music by Mrs. Morgan. The subject seemed so absorbing that it was adjourned for consideration to-morrow (Sunday) afternoon, when Mr. Battersby will open the discussion.

These meetings are carried on with great spirit, though with good nature and good order. Ladies take part in the debates. Mrs. Hughes spoke to the question with great force and clear judgment. She said, "Think for yourselves, and you become at once self culturists."

The "AD INTERIM CLUB" met at 11 o'clock A. M., last Sunday, as usual, at Social Hall, 39 Fourth street. Mrs. M. Lockwood read a very able and interesting paper on the question, "Is Jesus Christ the only Hope of Salvation?" After remarks by Dr. Pilkington, and Mrs. E. Hughes, Mr. Vincent recited an original poem, "The Emperor Dollar." The exercises concluded with music. Another meeting to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Twenty-five cents admission is hereafter to be charged for admission to the Sunday evening seances at Charter Oak, to all not members of the society, who pay ten cents only. The object is probably three-fold—first to increase the receipts, second to prevent such crowds as usually attend, and third to increase the membership of the society;

"THE ANCIENT BAND."—IS IT A VERITY?

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—It was said by an inspired person, long ago, that "a prophet is not honored in his own country." I confess that my anticipations were not realized in the Exhibition of the original pencil portraits of the ANCIENT BAND, in the Spirit Art Gallery collection. During four months in which the Gallery was open, at a small admission fee, not a spiritualist lecturer, except Prof. Denton, but few mediums, and no officer of our societies, or prominent spiritualist, felt sufficient interest in the advent (personally, so to speak) of these Ancient Spirits, or even curiosity, to look upon their likenesses. They received about the same kind and degree of recognition as was accorded to the Nazarine by the "respectable" people of his day.

Of course, I became financially depleted and embarrassed. When the sheriff "got" me, a month's effort among friends, (?) failed to realize $10, on ample security. One person of means and influence, a rapping medium, and President of a Spiritualist Society, generously proposed to redeem the Gallery on condition that I would place them on the wall of her parlors, irredeemable for six months: meantime, my only resource for small pittance of bread-and-butter cut off, I might starve or go to the almshouse. Another leading spiritualist, formerly a Unitarian clergyman, declared that Mr. Winchester's claim of antiquity for a portion of the BAND was "preposterous!"

It would be asking for more space than I am entitled to, either on the score of public interest in the matter, or your personal and unselfish friendship, Mr. Editor, to enter upon the proofs in regard to the existence, on earth, of the pre-historic personages of the ANCIENT BAND, or as to the accuracy of the portraits; yet these proofs are abundant, and such as should be satisfactory to all spiritualists who are ready to accept any statement from spirits as reliable. If the skeptics can await the evidences of identity that will silence all doubt, and forever establish the 'verity' of these Ancients, their humble agent and themselves can also exercise the requisite patience.

The following extracts from a ringing letter recently received from that clear-seeing, sympathetic and earnest laborer in the army of Progress—SAMUEL MAXWELL, M. D. of Chicago—are well calculated to strengthen the hands and heart of one sadly weary in the prolonged conflict:

"You may rest assured of my earnest sympathy with you in the work in which you are engaged. Last night I was in a seance with a most excellent clairvoyant and clairaudient. I felt an unusual and very powerful influence, and at once the medium said: 'There comes to you, Doctor, a very ancient spirit,'—here describing his peculiar dress, and band about his head with the symbol of the intertwined serpents; also the same symbol on his girdle, and on his sandals: a white flowing robe, with a border of royal purple. Also, a female spirit, very ancient, wearing a robe bordered with blue, and a glittering crown upon her head.

"My own vision was partially opened, so that I saw them imperfectly; but, oh, such a sense of the grandeur of character that they had! It seemed as though all modern spirits were the little hills, and these the grand old mountains with their heads high in the heavens. I never realized such a sense of greatness as belonging to any human being.

"Even now, my brother, as I write, they are with me, sending their glorious magnetisms shimmering through my being. How beautiful! Such power: such vastness of comprehension: for, as I come in sympathy with them, they seem to have unlimited intellect, and such grand moral purpose to do good—to make the world better.

"Yes, brother, THEIR EXISTENCE IS A VERITY: one of the beneficent facts that shall aid all of us toiling millions of earth up the steep of time, into the glories of the eternal. Let us thank the Divine Life, and take courage; pressing on in the work before us as best we may, resting assured that, though our efforts seem not to be appreciated, yet in the illimitable hereafter there will be found great rivers of influence whose springs are in those efforts.

"This Ancient spirit stated, by raps through another medium present, that he had been 4,300 years in spirit life, and that he was an Egyptian—one of the Magi. I now fully believe that he came ahead of your letter, I hope to form a further acquaintance with these ancient ones, for I am deeply impressed with their wisdom and power for good in this world."

From another letter, also recently received, I wish to make a few extracts. The writer is a lady (medium) now residing in Louisiana, through whom, at the Hope Circle in New Orleans, in 1864, an Ancient Spirit came, and commenced an auto-biographical history of an Age before the dawn of civilization; some half a dozen chapters of which my correspondent copied and sent to me. She writes:

"For all the obstacles and trials you meet with in the difficult and thankless labor you have chosen and been called upon to perform, will you accept the sincere sympathy of one who, during a long course of years, has labored among the brambles and briars of humanity, till her soul's clothing is sadly torn and worn, and she longs to array herself in the spiritual robes of a higher sphere.

"How much I thank you for those beautiful Photographs. Who can look upon those noble faces without receiving the conviction, doubly assured, of life immortal; as also its inseparable blessing—continued progression. Although, necessarily, they have assumed the look of earth, yet how each countenance radiates light from the spirit world.

"I have read the Biographical and Descriptive Catalogue with intense interest. As I become more familiar with this glorious BAND of Workers for the redemption of humanity, and contrast their efforts with every and all earthly mediums, I feel humbled, and at the same time exalted: humbled, that I with all the rest have done so little; exalted, that I am able to perceive our deficiencies.

"Impressions, clear as sunlight, crowd upon me, that the advent, personally, (by their portraits,) of these splendid types of ancient humanity is LIFTING THE LATCH OF THE DOOR which leads to new and higher life for struggling, degraded humanity. And, surely, my dear sir, were envy admissible, you, as door-keeper, would be envied.

Speaking of the Biographical Catalogue of the ANCIENT BAND, my correspondent utters these Prophetic Words:

"It appears to me that this Publication will form a more important link in connecting the Band with earthly mediums than anything else could have done in the Past, or can do in the Future. Very few there are whose Mediumship is entirely independent of external manifestations; and I feel strongly impressed that yourself and those associated with you, are OPENING THE FLOOD-GATE through which a Mighty Stream of information will flow—producing Changes in

Earth which the most abstruse Scientist, as also the most spiritually developed in this sphere, have not yet dreamed of.

The "mills of the gods grind slowly." Spirits that, in part, were of the controlling Band of Jesus—whose teachings through that grandly developed Medium laid deep and strong the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man—will, ere long, demand and receive the attention of the world. Their power will be felt in every vein and nerve of the public life. Their portraits will be "familiar as household words" in thousands of homes; and millions of sympathetic hearts will pulsate joyfully to the unfoldments of Knowledge, and the lessons of Wisdom, they have come to reveal and teach.

Yours, Fraternally,

J. WINCHESTER.

San Francisco, November 15, 1874.

WHAT IS SPIRITUALISM?—This was the question for consideration on Sunday afternoon last at Charter Oak Hall. Mr. Hoke was the first speaker, but our reporter arrived too late to hear what he said. Dean Clarke, being called for, made some excellent remarks, to the effect that Spiritualism is an exponent of the principles of nature, it reveals the condition of the soul after the departure from this life; it is a religion, and as religion should be scientific, so Spiritualism, when fully comprehended, will be found to be the science of true living, embodying all that we understand by religion. There are Atheistic Spiritualists, but as a general rule Spiritualists believe the universe to be an evolution of divine intelligence. He referred to Tyndall, Huxley and others as co-workers in the task of freeing men's minds from superstition. Every physical science is a branch of spiritual philosophy. The universe is a combination of spiritual forces. Spiritualism, properly understood, teaches us the value of the laws of our being, the grand philosophy of life here and hereafter, and the necessity of making a practical use of all our powers and opportunities. Mr. Butler followed, saying that science and Spiritualism do not travel well together. Brief remarks were made by Mrs. Logan, Mr. Wright, Mr. Lewis and others, but we have no space for an extended report. The same subject will be considered to-morrow, the opening remarks to be made by Mr. Lewis.

The sale of the Lick property, so far as it has proceeded, brought $1,959,925, not including the San Jose property, and exclusive also of Catalina Island, which will be disposed of at a future sale. The Lick House sold for $920,000, which is much less than its value, and the sale of this portion will not be confirmed. The property remaining will probably bring the entire proceeds to $4,000,000, which will leave a clear two millions to be divided between the two societies, the Pioneers and Academy of Sciences.

The Mediums' Seance at Charter Oak Hall on Tuesday evening, is spoken of as very pleasant and satisfactory. The tests were good, and the music delightful. After the public seance a "circle for development" was held, and a young man not heretofore subject to "influence" was controlled.

The London Spiritualist, from which we are glad to quote liberally, comes to this office regularly, and we are under obligations to the publisher for a file extending several months back.

Phil Roach, the old Democratic war horse, is spoken of as a probable candidate for Governor. The Republicans are not hopeful, so the Democrats are looking ahead for the high places.

CHRIST THE HOPE OF THE WORLD.

DEAR EDITORS:—In the sixteenth number of your Liberal journal I noticed the heading of an article "Christ the Hope of the World." I read it with avidity, hoping to find something in accordance with my views on the subject. Though Brother Mackie owned there are gems of truth and beauty interspersed in the history of Jesus, yet no complete and permanent system of salvation was the result of his advent into this world, but like other reforms, merely a stepping stone for humanity in ascending the spiral column of endless progression.

Christ I understand to be the divine element in fulness and fruition, with which Jesus of Nazareth was so largely endowed; and by reason of which he was called "Emanuel," God with us! It appears that in the world's history the time had come when it was possible to introduce a new and higher system of things to the world's inhabitants. "Love your enemies!" "Do good to them that hate you," etc. In looking over the domain of earth for a suitable instrument through which the dwellers of the second sphere could make the announcement, none was found sufficiently clean and pure. So great preparation was necessary to produce the desired organization. The person of Mary, the mother of Jesus, was found to possess elements suitable for a basis on which to erect the spiritual temple for the new dispensation. It was the work of God! Father and Mother in Deity! The divine element was concentrated and brought to bear on Mary through magnetism of the heavenly hosts who surrounded and kept her in a state of spiritual ecstasy from the incipient stage of her child's being till birth, and probably through his life. This human form, doubtless, had a human father—was the Son of Man, as he styled himself. The teachings of wise and elevated spirits, through Jesus, will, when accepted and carried out in practice, save everyone so doing—not from errors committed, but from committing more. For deeds already done, the Christ power in the patient must cleanse and purify by sorrow and repentance. The death of Jesus, or any other person, can save nobody. Jesus and other martyrs were killed because the truth had not gained sufficient strength in the world to protect them.

Another subject, nearly akin to this, is the "resurrection," not of the cast-off material body, but the spirit-body, which is at death attracted by the spirit from the perishing body, and goes to make up the spirit's body, which is sometimes called the soul. In the life that now is, this is the connecting link between the spirit and physical body, and is composed of all the fine essences and emanations of the system. The only use of the material body is to aid in building up and organizing the spirit. All spirits and angels, except God, were from the human races, and had a lodgement in a human body on this planet or some other.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO

[Faust and Wagner enter.]

FAUST—From their ice bonds unloosed are the stream and the rill,
By the gentle spring's loving and life-giving glance,
In the sweet vallies the bursting buds swell,
Hoary old winter lowers his lance,
Tottering with weakness returns to his hill.
Flying he launches some parthian showers
Of powerless, but bulletted ice on the flowers.
As they bud, the sun suffers no white to remain;
Forming and striving, all nature's sweet powers
Deck with bright colors the landscape again;
But since the chill plain is still wanting in bloom
She substitutes ladies in glowing costumes.
Turn round, my friend, and from this height
Regard yon town that lies in sight;
Out from the dark, dim, hollow gate
Press well dressed people, small and great;
Each seeks the sun, for by reflection
They honor God's son's resurrection;
Since they themselves have risen too
From the close dens in which they stew,
From artisans, and tradesfolk's cares,
From roofs and gables, dull, close lairs,
From the streets narrow, sunless night,
The churches dim, religious light,
Are they raised up to life anew.
Oh! see how actively the bustling troop
Thro' the gay gardens and green meadows glides;
While on yon river's bosom the trim sloop
And merry boat, jostling its neighbor, rides;
Laden so deeply one might fear 'twould sink,
The last light wherry pushes from the brink.
Even from yon mountain's shady alleys
Gay vesture with the sunlight dallies;
Afair I hear the peasants' shouting,
This people's heaven I do not doubt in;
Contented here I shout "te deum,"
Here I'm a man, here dare to be one!

WAGNER—With you, good doctor, thus to walk abroad,
Is a great honor, is improving too;
Alone I would not care to venture on this road,
I'm such an enemy to this ado;
This fiddling, shrieking, rolling bowls about,
To me as hateful as a Chinese gong;
The devil's own row makes the vulgar rout,
And calls it pleasure, dares to call it song.

PEASANTS UNDER THE LINDEN.

DANCE AND SONG—The shepherd by the day inspired,
In clothing gay his limbs attired,
Bright jacket, wreath and girdle;
The linden's shade the glad pairs fill,
And all were dancing with a will,
Juck-he-juck-he, juck-he-he-he-he, he,
Thus went the squeaking fiddle.

He pressed with haste into the throng,
And stopped a maiden in her song
By thrusting with his elbow;
The lively damsel turned about.
And cried "Look out, you stupid lout—
Juck-he, juck-he, juck-he-he-he-he—he—
Be careful, prithee fellow!"

Wildly the circle wheeled around,
Left, right, they chassed o'er the ground,
Up every coat tail well goes;
They grew quite red, they grew quite warm,
And rested panting arm in arm—
Juck-he-juck-he, juck-he-he-he, he—he—
Upon their hips their elbows.

Not so familiar, if you please,
How many a maid betrothed, by these
Free manners hath been diddled;
Flattering he drew her still aside,
And from the linden far and wide,
—Juck-he, juck-he, juck-he-he-he-he—he—
A lively tune was diddled.

OLD PEASANT—Good doctor, this is kind of you,
That on this day you don't despise us,
But—such a learned doctor too—
Come into all this crowd beside us;
Take then, good sir, our fairest mug,
Which we have filled with foaming beer;
I bring it, praying that this jug
Not alone quench your thirst, each tear—
Like drop, that in its foam pool plays,
Count one more added to your happy days.

FAUST—I drain this draught's refreshing wealth,
And give you thanks, and wish you health.

[The people gather round in a circle.]

OLD PEASANT—In sooth it is well done of you
To seek us on our day of glee,
Did you not ever kindly show
In days of woe, your charity;
Full many a sturdy fellow stands
Now living here, whom once your sire
Snatched from grim fever's murderous hands
Quenching with skill its withering fire;
And you too, then a fine young man,
You bravely sought each house of woe.
Many a stiff corpse was borne out then,
But you unsathed thro' each did go;

Many a hard trial did you share,
The helper helped that Helper there. (Points upwards.)
ALL—Health to this man, so brave, so tried,
May he, to help us, long abide!
FAUST—Thank we that helper, there in heaven,
Thro' whom alone true help is given.

LIFE IS WHAT WE MAKE IT.

BY H. WINCHESTER.

Life is ever what we make it:
As some nincompoop has said;
And, like physis, we must take it,
Till we're numbered with the dead,
And our spirits go a-kiting—
In an unknown land to tread:

So 'tis useless to be whining—
We had better take it cool:
Clouds have all a silver lining,
Said some hopeful, pious fool.
We, for one, have failed to "see" it—
Therefore don't indorse the rule.

It is sadder, far than funny,
How the world still jogs along;
Each one striving hard for money,
Both by sly deceit and wrong—
Like unto the heathen Chinese,
Bret made famous in his song.

But we've had our days of clover—
Now, alas, grown old and gray,
We shall soon be going over,
(So the truthful spirits say.)
Where we shall live on forever,
And have no "small bills" to pay!
Lower Lake, Cal.

What's more pleasant, spirits tell us,
When we do get "over there,"
Nary "mining sharp" will sell us,
(With an equal chance to share.)
"Feet" in richest ledge discovered,
In that country anywhere!

Experience teacher is of wisdom,
Said the bigamist of old:
But our wisdom has been purchased
By the paying out of gold:
For the lack of real knowledge,
We have, every time, been "sold!"

Thus for three score years and over
We have dabbled here and there:
Bought stocks of ye honest broker,
In grand castles built of air—
Which investments never panned out,
E'er a nickel to the share!

We should always be so happy,
With the things we have'n't got!
If Dame Fortune filled our coffers,
Other folks might "go to pot!"
All the world is dolving, fretting,
For a something—none know what!

LIFE.

Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant, and through cloudy weather.
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not Good Night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me Good Morning. —MRS. BARRAULD.

Signs of the Times.

Boston people are replacing the wooden Mansard roof with iron.

Bastian and Taylor, American mediums, are drawing large audiences in Holland, and much interest in Spiritualism has been excited there.

The Connecticut factory owners find that half-time demoralizes the operatives. The less they work the more they drink and gamble, and go to the bad generally.

The Evangelical sects favor prohibitory legislation with wonderful unanimity; and scarcely a convention is held by any of them without some resolution advocating it. The fact is significant.

The Dictator has come down a peg. Finding that he cannot himself get a nomination, he puts forward his friend Washburne. But Washburne, though a good man, is too late. Grant has killed his chance.

A landed proprietor named Korsnicki, according to a Posen paper, sent his carriage to Xions for his surgeon; but, the latter having given a ride to an excommunicated priest named Kubeczak, the owner burned the carriage and dismissed the surgeon.

At the Scientific School on Penekese Island, there are twenty-three male and twenty-two female students. During this term the ladies were the first to make original discoveries, and four or five had made actual contributions to science before any of the gentleman had hit upon a new fact.

Col. Ingersoll says, "Had such men as Robert Collyer and John Stuart Mill been present at the burning of Servetus, they would have extinguished the flames with their tears; but had the Presbytery of Chicago been there, they would have quietly turned their backs, solemnly divided their coat tails, and warmed themselves."

During the discussion of a bill for the abolition of capital punishment in Oregon one of the legislators said: "What society needs is the hanging of more criminals, to save the State the expense of feeding them." That man evidently got into the wrong seat when he took a chair in the State House. His place is in the school house.

Theodore Tilton has had more invitations to lecture this season than ever before, and in some instances he has been offered $500 for a single lecture. His invitations cover $20,000; but he has declined them all, thinking it would be in bad taste to set himself up on exhibition to coin money out of the curiosity and sympathy recent events have excited.

Professor J. H. Seelye, just elected to Congress in Massachusetts, is an ardent advocate of the Christian Amendment of the United States Constitution.

It is stated that the grave of Thomas Paine, near new Rochelle, which remained so long undisturbed, has been recently entirely obliterated by Simeon Lester, upon whose farm it was.

Miss Linda Gilbert is engaged in the good work of collecting libraries for prisons, and has already succeeded in establishing libraries of several thousand volumes each in the prisons of a half dozen western cities, also in the Tombs of New York.

A grand international congress is to be held in London to maintain the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, reassert the Pope's right to temporal as well as spiritual power, and declare it the bounden duty of all Christians to return to allegiance to Rome.

Over one thousand people listened to each of the lectures given by Cora L. V. Tappan, in Brighton, England. One thousand copies of the Medium, containing a full report of her lecture, were disposed of in Brighton, and the local press gave excellent reports. Spiritualism is becoming popular in England.

A Parsee, who recently lectured in the Eastern States on India said the missionary efforts made here are misdirected. What India needs is the light imported by modern science. She has superstition enough of her own. In fact, she is the parent of the very superstitions the christian churches are now so intent on sending back there.

A public convention is to be held in Boston, about the middle of December, in favor of the Christian Amendment. The favorers of this movement intend to present a petition to Congress in support of it, in 1876, signed by two millions of names. They reported 56,000 names, obtained in a few weeks, at their annual convention in Pittsburgh a year ago.

It is said that Mr. John Keely has discovered a new motive power that is destined to supersede steam. It is the result of twenty-five years' labor, and by its operation water is transformed by a mechanical process to vapor, without the application of heat, and yet the transformation produces a motor far more powerful than steam.

A combination ice and freezing house has been patented. The freezing apparatus is on the top of the ice-house, covered only by an awning. It consists mainly of a water-tank, from which the water flows in a thin stream down two inclined "cooling planes" into canvass boxes, in which it is left to freeze. The ice being solid, is removed from the boxes by the application of steam and deposited in the house beneath.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.—NO. 3.

REPLY TO REV. MR. PLATT, BY E. VOGEL.

CONCLUDED.

Unnatural religion is subversive, destructive of all human interests: First, The object of such religion is not the happiness of mankind, but the enjoyment of an imaginary future life. It is therefore in opposition to nature and science, and the conflict between the natural and the religious law has been, and must always be, the cause of a perpetual discord among men, and an unsurmountable obstacle to union. Second, Usurping the place of nature's law, and acting in the name of divine authority, unnatural religion has proved, and always must prove, the most potent and redoubtable despotism that could ever be invented for the tyrannisation of mankind.

The conflict between the spiritual and the temporal powers is almost as old as the church, and its magnitude is shaking the foundations of one of the mightiest empires of modern time. The terrors of religious persecutions and wars, of the inquisition, the command of belief under pain of excommunication and death, the affliction of nations under the assumption of divine rights by kings, they are all matters of history. Ignorance, superstition, corruption and demoralisation are necessary consequences of unnatural religion. This follows from its hostility to science and its teachings in opposition to the natural laws; such as the belief in wonders and in the effectiveness of prayer, the doctrine of the trinity, the salvation of mankind by the death of a God-man, the doctrine of the depravity of human nature. Human and religious interests not being identical, the powerful weight of the church will, in case of conflict, naturally be brought to bear for the protection of its interests at the cost of morality. This implies that religious moral laws are dead letters. The Christian nations are the most enlightened and civilized on earth, but their morality is the effect of the irrepressible laws of nature. Three qualities constitute the morality of an action: First, it must be spontaneous in accordance with the inner conviction of the actor. Second, it must spring from a higher motive, aiming at the welfare of fellow beings. Third, it must be conceived and executed with so much intelligence and enlightenment as to really achieve the good end proposed. The laws of religion are arbitrary, and cannot therefore be moral. They are not the result of the experience and convictions of life, but mere sounds and dead letters, carrying with them no vitality to inspire with and maintain the strong feelings which give confidence, self-abnegation, enthusiasm of purpose and energy of action. What virtuous deeds could be expected from him whose sense of virtue was derived from no other source than heresay?

Being direct commands, with promise of reward and threatening of punishment, the laws of religion imply the obedience of the child or the submission of the slave, leaving no opportunity for deserving praise, by shaping our actions for the benefit of our fellow beings; in other words excluding moral action. Being arbitrary they are impossible of execution, and paralyse human energy. "Love thy neighbor as thyself." Who could ever seriously entertain the idea of commanding love? and if love could be commanded, how could its indiscriminate practice remedy human depravity? Again, "Do unto others as you wish that they should do unto you." To be guided in our relations with fellow beings by our own feelings, would constitute us judges in our own cause, under circumstances when calm and deliberate judgment is impossible; that is, when we are acting under the excitement of passion, and when restraint would be most needed. These two fundamental laws of Christian ethics can therefore have no effect on the moral improvement of mankind; but by usurping the place of the natural law, they cannot but have a direct demoralizing effect. Development under the impulses of life is the condition of the prosperity of our physical, intellectual and moral nature, and the non-exercise of our moral faculties cannot result otherwise than in their feeble development, if not fatal loss. Human ingenuity and perseverance have achieved wonderful and highly gratifying results in rendering the elements of inorganic nature subservient to the happiness of man; very little progress, if any, has been made in the improvement of the relations between men. The progress has been in those departments of life the science of which has not been impeded by religion; the want of progress has been in the department of moral instruction which has been exclusively under the control and in the hands of the churches. Is this a mere coincident or is religion responsible, to a large extent at least, for the evils of our time: the infelicities of domestic life, the corruption of societies, the instability of governments, the wranglings and wars of nations? Let candid inquirers after truth, both of church and State, investigate impartially and seriously this subject, worthy their attention.

We have for sale at this office a few copies of Col. Ingersoll's Lectures, a splendid edition; printed in clear handsome type on tinted paper. The volume, 253 pages, contains "The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality" and "Heretics and Heresies." It is one of the soundest, and most radical works of the century. All Free Thinkers should read it.

HEATHENS OF THE HEATH.—Those who read the notice of this admirable work in last week's paper are informed that copies can be obtained at this office in paper covers for $1. each; cloth binding $1.50. They will be sent for this price post paid to any address.

The Golden Age referring to the fact that Mr. Tilton declines to lecture, says: "He does not need the artificial stimulants of public gatherings and the excitements of oratory to keep him from sinking in despair." That is a plain intimation that Mr. Beecher does need such stimulus.

IS JESUS CHRIST THE ONLY HOPE OF SALVATION IN THIS WORLD AND THE NEXT?

BY MRS. C. F. WINDLE.

"The vessels on which you read sacred emblems turn out to be common pottery, but the sense of the pictures is sacred, and you may still read them transferred to the walls of the world."—R. W. EMERSON.

In order to a solution of this question, two inquiries naturally arise: First, Are we in need of salvation in this world and the next? Second, Who was Jesus Christ, by whom it is claimed that such salvation can alone be obtained?

With regard to the former of these inquiries: namely, as to our need of salvation, in this world at least, we may answer in the affirmative. To extend the query, however, beyond the present existence, would involve a necessity of the assurance that we are destined to a next world at all—a point upon which we have no data whatever of conjecture, still less of certainty. But we do need to be saved here. It is only necessary to recur to the pain to which human life is continually subject—from the twinges of the cradle to the fell grasp of the last destroyer—to recognize this truth. In short, that we need to be saved from pain, and its dread premonitor, fear, requires not to be argued. It is attested by the whole history of the race. The institution of propitiatory offerings and sacrifices to avert this evil of the human condition, in its various shapes of attacks by the elements, war, pestilence and famine, mark its earliest annals, and much of the modern prayer is framed with a similar intent. Consequently, could any means be introduced which might remove the danger of pain from us, in the multiplicity of forms and directions in which it perpetually threatens us; or, failing in this, render us superior to its inflictions, we might well hail it as our only hope of salvation.

Let us now see who Jesus Christ was, that we may ascertain whether such a hope is afforded us in him, according to a claim set up for something less than two thousand years, and forming the nucleus of our phase of civilization. When we turn to legitimate history for information on this subject, we discover that it contains no mention of such a personage, save in one instance. Tacitus, writing about the year 120, in describing the burning of Rome, in the reign of Nero, eighty years previously, tells us that this emperor, in order to relieve himself of the imputation of commanding the atrocity, charged it upon the Christians, and adds: "The founder of that name was Christ, who suffered death, in the reign of Tiberius, under his procurator, Pontius Pilate." But this historian, it may be remarked, is not considered reliable—very many of his other statements being at variance with established facts, and penned evidently from heresay, without an investigation as to their truth. The single mention of Christ, therefore, by so careless a chronicler, between two and three generations after the event alleged, cannot be entitled to any greater weight than that of mere oral tradition. There is also, however, a passage in the Antiquities of Josephus which is frequently adduced as attesting the historical existence of Jesus Christ, and the miracle of his resurrection. But this is now utterly rejected by critics as a spurious interpolation of the Christian church. Accordingly, it appears that the only accepted records of Jesus Christ we possess, are the four gospels of the New Testament, originally written in Greek, and produced, as it has been determined by investigation, none of them earlier than a century and a half after the era assigned to the events of which they treat. These four narratives, moreover, may properly be reduced to two—since, from the frequency of verbatim passages in the first three of them, and other parallelisms too great to have been merely the result of co-incidence, it is clearly apparent they have been derived from one common original. Thus then, we have only two accounts of Jesus Christ—that of Matthew, Mark and Luke, regarded as the same, and that of John—these two, further, differing materially upon examination, yet both, however, exhibiting a narrative of the supernatural and miraculous such as cannot possibly be accepted literally in the enlightenment of the present day.

Still, if we have no historical record of Jesus Christ, we have reliable testimony to the existence of the sect called Christians, as early as the first and second centuries. The Epistles in the New Testament of Paul of Tarsus, to the Romans, Corinthians and Galatians, exhibiting him in the middle of the first century as an apostle of Christianity, are regarded as undoubtedly genuine. The odium attaching to the Christians and their persecutions under the Roman emperors, are, furthermore, sufficient matter of history. Lucian the historian, and the lighter heathen authors, Pliny, Juvenal, Martial and Marcus Aurelius, all refer to this sect in particular terms. Various undisputed writings of the earlier martyrs are, moreover, extant. Above all, the style of modern chronology both attests to the establishment of Christianity as an institution, and defines the epoch of its origin. We find therefore, beyond dispute, the phenomenon of Christianity appearing some eighteen hundred years ago in the Roman Empire, introduced seemingly by a few reformers of Jewish antecedents, who suffered persecution and martyrdom in its propagation and defence.

Now, as we have such meagre grounds for the recognition of Jesus Christ as a historical character, we must naturally ask: What was Christianity, as originally propounded and professed? For the appearance of the Christian sect, and the true meaning of the name, it is necessary to examine the spirit of the nation and period in which the denomination took its growth. For some five or six hundred years before the Christian era, the higher mind of the Jewish nation had manifested a tendency—as is evinced in the books of their prophets, and others of their writings—to disparage the old ceremonial of the law, and to indicate the dawning recognition of a higher law of God in the mind. It being also another new tendency of this period—derived probably from the Eastern associations of the captivity—to allegorize and personify mystical ideas, which could, indeed, find no other suitable mode of expression, this new evolution of the human consciousness was called the Wisdom of God. Hence, in writings bearing internal evidence of having appeared about that epoch, we are told of Solomon's asking of the Almighty the gift of wisdom, in preference to riches, honor or length of days. Later, this new Jewish conception, from a subsequent acquaintance with the notion of the divine Sophia or inner light of the Greek philosophy, transplanted to Alexandria the last few centuries of the ancient chronology, developed into the more definite idea of the Logos or Word. Philo, a learned Alexandrian Jew, who lived at the commencement of the Christian era, styled the Wisdom or Word of God in man, the Son of God; and, as indicating his conscious possession of it, designated himself by the latter appellation.

When the value of the spiritual faculty thus opening on the perception, not only in elevating, purifying and redeeming man, but also in sustaining him under affliction and sorrow, began to be thus actualized among the Jewish people, it was a natural step in the period of the mystical application of the scriptural allegories which produced the Cabala, to identify this Word with the Messiah of the prophecies, the Anointed One—the Christ, as it is in the Greek. The gist of the promises was newly rendered to indicate, not as hitherto, the advent of a national king, (and more readily so, as this hope was plainly becoming more and more futile) but the development of a new internal principal to govern the individual, bearing with it a Divine authority and sanctity beyond those of the written code. Hence, the Word became synonymous with the predicted Christ. Using it thus, Josephus, in his "Discourse to the Greeks on Hades," says: "For all men, the just as well as the unjust, shall be brought before God the Word; and he, in order to fulfill the will of his Father, shall come to judge, whom we call Christ." This is to say: The time is at hand when the human soul shall be evoked to be at once its own law and judge; the highest tribunal will be that of a supreme individualism or spiritual consciousness—the Father asserting himself in the Word, the divine coming to light in the human nature, the latter must be amendable to the former.

A further consequence was, that the Christ should finally come to be variously styled the Lord, the Redeemer, the Saviour of men, as well as the Word and the Son of God. Then, the allegory was extended to particulars. The new power in man was reported to the East by the rising of a star; the crafts of sorcery succumbing before the true potentialities of the realized soul were the Oriental Magi, led by the meteor, bringing their gifts to the feet of the infant Saviour; turning from pernicious ways by the inward law of grace was leprosy cured, a devil cast out, sin forgiven; the sudden perception of invisible harmonious relations throughout nature was the restoration of sight and hearing; the willing self-abnegation of love was triumph over death and the grave; and the calm exaltation resulting from a sense of peace and trust was an entrance into the kingdom of heaven, or the gift of eternal life.

Such symbolism being, of course, above the average mind, the myth of a divine incarnation in the person of an exceptional individual arose from it. That is to say, what the distinguished philologist of our time has characterized "a disease of language" took place; and thereupon, after the manner of previous mythology, followed all the legendry of the Gospels. Paul was evidently unacquainted with the supernatural nativity and miracles imputed to Jesus Christ in these narratives—a fact alone tending to show that they must have been produced after his day. His language in speaking of Christ, as well as of the "crucifixion" and "resurrection," is allegorical, embodying conceptions of a nature purely metaphysical and subjective. With that apostle, Christ was the "Power and Wisdom of God" incarnated in man, "to become his justification, sanctification and redemption;" the "crucifixion" was "death to sin with Jesus Christ," and the "resurrection" was becoming "alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." The "blood of Christ" and the "atonement," as he alludes to these, were other symbols, directed to the idea of the supposed efficacy of sacrifice among the Jews—laying bare the principle of the human constitution in which this superstition arose: namely, that self-surrender procures its own recompense; that every one who would save himself must lose himself; and that outward failure and contumely may be the necessary external conditions of an inward victory. In fact, Paul, in the fifth chapter of Romans, expressly explains that he personifies Christ as typical of a new spiritual order of humanity, which became developed at the historical epoch of his day, just as "Adam is the figure" of the previous order.

This is the original meaning, almost undoubtedly, in which "Jesus Christ" was declared to be "the only hope of salvation for this world and the next." It is, indeed, the sole rational manner of construing the expression. We are all of us sufficiently acquainted, however, with the very different interpretation which has been put upon it by theology. We know how the creeds of the churches have enforced upon society at large the acceptance, as literal facts, of the allegory of the historical development of man's subjective moral element, with the tissue of myths superimposed upon it, puerile and preposterous as such a rendering is, and only on a par with the vulgar beliefs among the ancients in their similar mythologies.

And therefore—in view of the wide-spread corruption from the original application of the declaration, that Jesus Christ is the only hope of our salvation—we must unhesitatingly conclude that it cannot be advisable any longer to retain this formula. It is true, no other principle can be recognized for the salvation of man than the spiritual faculty indicated in primitive Christianity. When, however, we perceive language to be diseased, it is high time for us to discard it. For the masses, the sense of the term Jesus Christ is that which has for so many centuries been affixed to it by theologians; and hence, to employ it now, although with the original meaning, can only be to perpetuate the error it has so long embodied, without a possibility of reviving generally the primitive signification. The two conceptions stand utterly opposed to one another; as idolatry and iconoclasm, loss and gain—the former representing self-coddling and stultification, the latter self-surrender and growth: and it is idle to suppose that the symbol which has been ignorantly transferred from the one to the other can ever again be restored. Besides, the phenomenon here referred to as a historical development of the human consciousness was not, in reality, confined to the rise of early Christianity. A general evolution of the spiritual perception, extending through different nations, seems to have taken place during the last century of ancient chronology. The Identity and Reaction theory of Plato was a previous statement of the doctrine of Logos; and the Greek philosopher gauged the quality of the minds of his day by their capacity of recognizing this truth—little minds being with him those that failed to perceive it; just as, in the New Testament, the same class are stigmatized as "lost" or "dead." Buddhism, which still earlier anticipated Christianity, was but another expression of the new born sense of an idealized life to supersede the purely physical one—the reconciliation of the natural with the spiritual man, as the conception was afterwards put by Paul. About contemporaneous with Buddhism was, too, the production of the Ta-hio or Great Doctrine, the Chinese classic of the reformer Kung-fu-tse, revealing the art of good government through self-dominion. Yet antecedently to all these, in the eighth century of ancient history, Zoroaster, among the Persians, announced as a newly discovered truth, that mankind are either the servants of Ormuzd (the principle of good) through virtue and wisdom, or those of Ahriman (the principle of evil) through folly and vice. Even in the wild Norse country we find, in the Scandinavian Eddas of a thousand years before the Christian era, a foreshadowing similar to that which marks the Hebrew prophecies, of the great redeeming principle about to be realized in humanity. The evening twilight of the gods; the grief of Odin and the rest of the Esir, conscious of their decay and their impending fall; the death of Balder, and the secret whispered by Odin in his ear on the funeral pile; the tragic end of the deities and of the world; the new world, devoid of the Giants, Dwarfs, and above all, of the Nornas or Fates; Odin's re-appearance in the more perfect shape of the free All-Father; and the resurrection of Balder—all these point to the recognition of the human will, "the belief in one's own power," as a newly-perceived source of man's future reconciliation with Nature. Thus, this mythology is no less significant than the legendry of Christianity, in expressing the sentiment of the latter: "My Father worketh hitherto; henceforth I work." In brief, the salvation proposed by the Alexandrian Jews through Jesus Christ was nearly simultaneously announced in other parts of the world under different styles and symbolisms. Wherefore, then, it may be asked, solely on this ground should we adhere especially to that particular designation of it?

Yet surely, it may be said, in conclusion, never has the saving principle at issue been more truly recognized by earnest philanthropists than at the present day. Nay, too, the practical modern mind has already framed for it a new title—one which is no longer mystical and symbolical. While theology has stamped the old symbol into a synonym for egotism, an enlightened humanity has translated it into the sacred watchword, INDIVIDUALISM, as "the only name under heaven, given among men, whereby they may be saved."

"FREE LOVE."

REPLY NUMBER TWO TO AUSTIN KENT BY GEO. W. LEWIS.

MY FRIEND:—In your first article you started out with the question "Free Love Defined." Upon that question I joined issue with you, hoping that you, the ablest advocate of that pernicious doctrine, would probe the subject to the core and present the matter in its true light. But, for some unaccountable reason, you have abandoned the subject and prefaced your reply with the "The Social Question." I propose, however, to traverse with you the original issue. And after you shall have fully and explicitly defined your position, after you shall have unequivocally stated what Free Love is, and what the doctrine proposes, I shall show you that the doctrine is repugnant to justice, to reason, to good morals and to every principle belonging to a noble, manly character. It is subversive of the dearest interests of humanity, and at war with civilization, and with the grandest possibilities of the race. But before entering into the arguments, let us have "Free Love Defined." In your first article you say: "The only essential meaning in free love is the sexual emancipation of women." You say that woman should have absolute freedom in her love relations. Your meaning is that woman should have absolute freedom in her sexual relations.

What is this freedom for which the advocates of this doctrine are clamoring? Is it a freedom from something? If so, what? Is it a freedom to do something? If so, what? Or is it a freedom from all restraints, and a freedom to do all things in the love or sexual relations?

In my answer to your first article, I said: "Free Love is but a synonym for Free Sexuality," and as you have not denied that statement, you probably accept it as a correct interpretation. In writing these articles in reply to you, I can assure you that I have no desire to misrepresent the advocates of "Free Love." My only purpose is to elicit from them, if possible, a definite and unequivocal statement of their fundamental principles upon that question. If, therefore, at any time, I misrepresent the expounders of that doctrine, I claim that in justice to the subject, in justice to myself, and in justice to me, you should make the correction, by giving unequivocally the true principles of your faith.

Now, my friend, let us come directly to the question at issue. You, who advocate that cause, make frequent use of the words free love, social freedom, sexual freedom, and at heart you all repudiate and curse "monogamic marriage." In your first article you say, "It is better to go through marriage to something wiser and better, than to go around it." The interpretation of "Free Love" then must be that "something better and wiser than marriage." This statement of affairs can only be attained by ignoring the marriage vow, or doing away with the marriage relations, with family and home, and their exalted and holy associations. A true manly character is the reward, alone, of untiring effort and sleepless vigilance. It can never be attained by floating at random, or by following the promptings of impulse and passion. I regret that you associate Free Love almost entirely with woman. For I hold that in love relations and in sexual relations man and woman are equal as to their rights and liberties. The one should have no more freedom in these matters than the other. And I hold that the highest interests of humanity demands a perpetuation of the monogamic marriage relations in its purity: that when married, man and wife should have all the freedom to love each other, and to love supremely. But from that moment, yes, from the moment of their engagement, neither should continue in love relations with any other being on earth. It is this freedom and looseness in the marriage relations that makes desolate hundreds and millions of homes, and sends millions of hearts in sorrow to the grave. The remedy should consist in checking the evil, not in making it universal. "Free Love" proposes to make it universal, and to that end proposes to do away with marriage, with homes and with family.

You say that under the libidinous sway of Free Love, your "wife," your "mother" and your "sister" would not become promiscuous, and you say that my wife and sisters would not become "promiscuous." The presumption is that they would. Your wife and sisters as well as my wife and sisters are of the same nature as other human beings. And if from infancy they were left to the promptings of impulse and passion, we have no more reason to expect more of them than of thousands of unfortunates who are daily treading the downward road to hell. It is easy to follow the promptings of impulse and passion. It is only with toil, vigilance and perseverance that we can follow the dictates of the intellect and reason.

BRIEF COMMENTS.

1—The Heading referred to was prefixed by the editor, with no other design than to have something appropriate. The true meaning of the term Free Love is entirely unobjectionable, but the popular idea of the phrase is such that we confess we are not as anxious to parade it before the public as Mr. Lewis seems to be. We prefer to use words which cannot be so easily misinterpreted.

2—This is not a just deduction. Mr. Kent and many others who believe in Free Love, have as high an estimate of the family and home as Mr. Lewis can have.

3—This is simply owing to the fact that man already assumes the right himself to that freedom he denies to woman. Women are even rendered outcast by acts which in man are not considered censurable. We do not wish woman to follow man's example: but we ask that the same judgment be passed upon both for the same act.

4—This is precisely the doctrine held by those Mr. Lewis calls Free Lovers, and if he is not careful he will render himself liable to the appellation.

5—It proposes nothing of the kind: on the contrary, it proposes to sanctify marriage, to make home worthy the name, and elevate family life. Mr. Lewis asks what Free Love is, and without waiting for a reply, puts forth his own idea, which is a vile one, and assumes that all who believe in freedom must necessarily hold to something as detestable as that which he has in his own mind.—Ed.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, NOV. 28, 1874.

TO SPIRITUALISTS AND FREE THINKERS.

It is now more than six months since the first issue of this paper, during which time we hoped to be able to obtain a paying list of subscribers. There has been a gradual increase, and we have every reason to hope that, in time, the circulation may be so extended as to pay the expense of publication; but candor compels us to avow that it is yet far from that point. To prevent the failure of the enterprise, the original proprietors were compelled to form a Joint Stock Association, by means of which the paper has been sustained; and if the friends of Free Thought will take an interest in extending our circulation, it can soon be placed not only beyond all danger of failure, but in a condition so prosperous that the paper may be enlarged and otherwise improved.

The need of such a Journal on this coast is beyond question. If liberal ideas on religious subjects could find expression in our daily press; if reports of lectures and discussions by Free Thinkers received as much attention as is accorded to the sermons of the "orthodox," there would be less occasion for a journal of this kind; but every reader knows that it is the interest of the secular press to ignore or misrepresent Spiritualism and what is called Infidelity. The advocates of Rational Religion can find no hearing except from their own platforms, and through their own press.

We again earnestly request our friends to aid us, not for our sakes, but for the sake of the cause we represent. Buy a little stock in the Company, even if it is no more than five dollars, and send us the names of new subscribers wherever they can be obtained. We cannot afford to send agents all over the State. What is wanted is an active worker for the cause in each county. If we had only one such friend in each county our success would be assured.

We desire also to obtain the address of persons to whom we can mail specimen numbers of the paper free of charge. Send us the names of those who are known to hold Liberal opinions, and who might possibly subscribe if they knew of the existence of such a journal. In this way more can be done in three months to extend a knowledge of the paper among the people than would be accomplished in a year of unaided effort by the publishers. Who will send us the first list? No matter if you send the names of some who are already subscribers. That will do no harm, while every additional name may do good.

Do not make the excuse that COMMON SENSE is not as large as the BANNER OF LIGHT. Of course it is not; it is yet in its infancy, but it fills a place on this coast that the BANNER cannot fill, and in time it may be as large and in every way as worthy of support. The BANNER, the RELIGIO, the INDEX, the INVESTIGATOR and the TRUTH SEEKER are all good, each in its place, but none of them occupy the field, nor can they fill the place, of this journal.

W. N. SLOCUM,
A. M. SLOCUM.

PREPAYMENT OF POSTAGE.—On the first of January next all publishers of newspapers are required to pay postage in advance, and we notice that the Banner of Light, the Religio, and nearly all others of our exchanges ask subscribers to pay the extra cost. The postage on COMMON SENSE, under the new law, will amount to fifteen cents per annum. As we are already publishing the paper at a loss, it may not be asking too much of our subscribers to reimburse the publishers for this extra expense, though no paper will be discontinued for lack of this extra payment.

It is reported that a medium for "materialization" has arrived in this city, from the East, and will give seances.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE CONVENTION.—It is proposed to hold a convention of the friends of Woman Suffrage in Mayfield, Santa Clara county, on Tuesday, December 29th, under the auspices of the State Women Suffrage Association, (Incorporated) of which Mrs. Wallis, of Mayfield, is President. The friends of the cause from this city will take the early train in the afternoon, and return on the following morning. It is hoped half-fare rates will be secured for those who attend the Convention. After supper, and a few short speeches, there will be a social and a dance. All the meetings of this kind heretofore held in Mayfield have proved highly successful and enjoyable, and it is believed that the proposed Convention will not be an exception. Good accommodations are promised at the hotel, at reasonable charges.

LYCEUM FOR SELF CULTURE.—The meeting of this Society on Sunday was largely attended and of unusual interest. It was the most successful session since the occupation of the present hall, yet the Post says only forty people were present. Mr. Battersby opened with an address on the "Best Means for Self Culture," extracts from which will be given next week. Brief speeches were made by Mr. Badlam, Senior, Mr. Kinney, Mrs. Hughes, Mr. Healy, Moody, Martin, and Lundi, and an excellent essay was read by Mrs. Farree.

MISS WANDERFORD.—This delightful vocalist is to have a benefit at Platt's Hall, on Thursday evening, of next week, December 3d. Mr. and Mrs. Fabbri, Mlle. Elzer, Mr. Makin and others will take part. We are informed by Fred Thal, who assists Charles Shutz in the management, that the programme will be very attractive and that the concert will undoubtedly prove highly successful.

The result of the Temperance Convention, held in this city on the 19th, was the formation of a Temperance Political Party—not a one-idea party, but a party of Reform, embracing among its objects not only high licenses and a new Local Option law, but labor schools, eight-hour law, etc. The platform favors Trades's Unions, the Patrons of Husbandry and other Labor organizations. The name of the new party is the "Temperance Reform Party."

Mrs. Addie L. Ballou has returned from Oregon in much better health than when she left California. She will pass the winter here, speaking in towns in the vicinity of San Francisco, though it is probable she would go to Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, San Diego and San Bernardino, if proper inducements were offered. She expects soon to visit Watsonville. Her permanent address is 605 Third street.

DR. PASCHAL B. RANDOLPH has arrived in California, and will spend about six weeks in the State. He will speak in in Sacramento, Stockton, Oakland, San Jose, and lastly in San Francisco.

MERRITT C. MOREY, formerly of Syracuse, New York, died in this city on Monday last, aged sixty-five years. He was a well known Spiritualist, the father of Mrs. Sproul. The funeral address was by Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith.

FRENCH COMMUNISTS.

The words "Communism," "Communist," have attached to them in the United States a widely different significance from that given them in France and Switzerland. To this fact may be attributed the periodical attacks of the English and American press on the very best and most intelligent class in the French nation, i. e., the real republicans. In this country the word Communism has reference to a state of society in which all the property is held in common, and the word Communist is applied to an imaginary class whose aim is to destroy all right in private property. In France the word Commune is equivalent to our word District, and contains about 1,000 inhabitants; a city, therefore, contains several communes. Now, while in this Republic each county elects its own officers—judge, attorney, treasurer, clerk, supervisors and all petty officers—while each district elects its own school board, each city its own mayor, aldermen, tax collector, etc., in France every one of these officers, down to the smallest functionary, are appointed by the supreme authority of the State; the people only voting for the representatives and president, and doing that under an immense pressure of church and prefecture. Now, what the members of the French Communes fight for, is the right to elect their own local officers, and in so doing to educate themselves in political affairs as we have been educated by the same experience. It is the want of this political education which leaves the French people always so at the mercy of their leaders. They cannot put up a hospital or a court house but the general government must interfere and permit and approve, or forbid; a school cannot be established unless with the sanction of the general government. This keeps the nation in a state of permanent pupillage—a condition against which the French Communists rebel. Then we listen to the slanders of English aristocrats, and revile those with whom we should be in most cordial sympathy.

HOME, FEMME HEROIC AND MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.—This is the title of a volume of verse by Jesse H. Butler, of San Francisco, published by Colby & Rich. The work consists of 236 pages, handsomely printed and elegantly bound in cloth. The author, in his preface, professes only to give "an expression of the common mind in unison with Nature, animate and inanimate, and of the universal Soul in its natural life, through all the common feelings and appreciations of the good, the true and the beautiful." The volume takes its name from the most lengthy poems, "Home," consisting of 188 stanzas and "Femme Heroic," a story in verse. The miscellaneous poems, however, contain many of the finer passages. The book has faults; it is not a work of genius, but it is unpretentious, challenging no criticism, but appealing in simple language to the higher and better feelings of our nature. It is full of spirituality, giving golden gleams of the summer land, and words of hope to those whose loved ones have gone before.

Copies may be obtained from the author, 650 Market street; also at this office. Price $1.50 plain, $2 gilt.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION in this city hold property valued at $120,000, on which is a mortgage for $60,000. The debt has been decreased during the year by contributions to the amount of $17,000. The Society receive $650 per month in rents, which is more than sufficient to pay the interest on the mortgage, leaving something over for Librarian, janitor, etc. The Churches and Christian Associations are all provided for; but no Liberal Society owns a Hall, nor is there any prospect that any of them will very soon. The Christians are a compactly organized power. The Liberals are all at loose ends—a vast mass of inert material. The respect accorded to Christianity is much less because of its supposed worth, than in consequence of its power politically, socially, and in business matters. Christians patronize Christians, therefore many who are not believers pretend to be, and the consequence is the country is full of hypocrites. The whole system is hollow, and the time will come when it will crumble like an egg shell. We have no fault to find with society for its shams. There is a cause for every effect, and we are content to accept whatever is, knowing that if it is not the best that might be, it certainly is as well as can be under existing circumstances. Time is the great modifier; and we who are sometimes impatient, might as well look at things philosophically, and accept what Fate has in store for us.

MRS. LAURA CUPPY SMITH. on Sunday last, gave two most excellent discourses in the hall of the Spiritualists' Union, a report of which had been prepared for this issue, but an accident which occurred too late for rectification, obliges us to defer the publication until next week. The lectures were just what many Spiritualists in this city need to hear; and as some never attend the meetings in that hall, we shall be glad to let them know what is said there. It will do them good. The subject of the morning lecture was "Stumbling Blocks," and Mrs. Smith showed clearly that bad as are the bars to human progress put up by the church, they are little worse than those some Spiritualists erect to stifle thought, retard the growth of liberal ideas and lessen the incentive to good deeds. Mrs. Smith is a radical thinker, and an admirable speaker, and no reformer should fail to hear her. She speaks again the same hall, 911 Market street, to-morrow afternoon and evening.

MEDIUMS' SEANCE.—The tests given at Charter Oak Hall on Tuesday evening were entirely satisfactory, while the vocal music by Mrs. Dean Clarke and Maud Richardson, assisted materially in producing the necessary harmony and good feeling. Mrs. Logan, who presides at the seances, is admirably adapted for the position, maintaining perfect order, and giving offence to none. She is also competent to direct the circle for development to which a portion of the evening is devoted. Another similar seance will be held at the same place on Tuesday evening.

The Conference at Charter Oak Hall to-morrow afternoon will be opened by Prof. Chaney, on the Prophecies. A very interesting discourse may be expected on Prophecy in the light of Astrology.

JACOB'S LADDER.

[For Common Sense.]

Jacob's idea of the ladder was not altogether visionary. I mean the Jacob who married into Laban's family. The ladder is as crowded as ever. We see the people above us and people below. We think those below a stupid set for being so tardy in seeing the point and coming at once to our position. We think those above are going too fast. A man has taken the first step on this ladder when he concludes that his priest or minister or rabbi does not know it all. The second step is to conclude to investigate and decide for himself. Concerning Spiritualism the first step is to pooh pooh it; denying the existence of phenomena of any kind. Second step is to admit their existence and attribute them to electricity. The next is to attribute the phenomena to unconscious cerebration or mesmerism, or slight of hand. By-and-by he gets past all these explanations. I need not say what the next step is. There are all grades of evidence, from the obscure handwriting on the paper, to Prof. Wallace's objective proof. We think that those who are on the same step of the ladder as ourselves or only a step lower or higher, are amongst the elect. But we thought likewise when at the foot. What then is the moral? It is plainly to exercise patience with our plodding neighbors, or the others whom we think are going too fast. Human progress is under the dominion of law, and any attempt to hasten salutary changes—all spasmodic fanatical efforts—beget a reaction and result in failure. Once on a time, while thus philosophizing to an acquaintance, and alluding to Spiritualism, said he: "One world at a time." Considering that we have many thousands or millions of years ahead, people are going up the ladder quite fast enough.

Touching spiritual persons and things I prefer one communication from an embodied spirit to any number from our more etherial neighbors. When I am as high on the ladder as they—when I am on an equal footing—I will deal with them. Meanwhile I do not propose to miss this world by too great anxiety respecting the next. I'll deal with the embodied spirits now, but decline to be controlled by spirits in or out of the "form." E. STEVENSON, M. D.

Virginia, Nev., Nov. 19, 1874.

While we agree with most that our correspondent writes, and with him prefer not to be "controlled by spirits in or out of the form," yet we are unable to perceive why Spiritualism cannot be earnestly investigated without in the least interfering with the practical duties of life. Spiritualism prepares us for the next life by teaching us how to live this. No doubt there are those who fulfil their duties very well without taking any interest in Spiritualism. The main doctrine of the spiritual philosophy is "make the most of this life that you can"—that is, the best and highest possible use of all your powers and opportunities. It is not well to become so engrossed in spiritual phenomena as to lose interest in ordinary pursuits, but our friend should remember that the people who devote themselves to phenomena solely, are not Spiritualists, but merely spiritists. Spiritualism embraces a much wider field of action than does spiritism. Unfortunately, while spiritists are numbered by millions, the true Spiritualists of this country, and of the world, are comparatively few. The mass of the people have not yet advanced to the plane of Spiritualism; they are too low on the ladder. It is the duty of those who are above to look down upon them kindly, to instruct and encourage them to come out of their low condition.

THE RATIONALE OF HEALING BY PASSES.

By cutting a nervous cord the part below becomes paralyzed. After some time the nervous ganglions will expand, radiate and after due growth meet to connect, when the former senseless part becomes restored again to sensation. This becomes more plainly illustrated in many surgical operations by transplanting a piece of skin, or flesh, from one part, or from one body, to another to cover a wound. It soon begins to grow, like the grafting of a tree, in its new position. After it is perfectly united there will be no feeling in it for some time, for the nerves have no connection. In time this newly attached part becomes alive to feeling, because the nerves have grown, and have branched themselves to connect with the dormant nerves, and send their electric spark, the vitalizing element, in the numbed direction, which thereby becomes reanimated.

Of the real nature of nervous power nothing certain is known. Many eminent physiologists consider the same to be identical with electricity. Many facts seem to establish this theory, though others seem to oppose it. Yet an electric current will perform the work of a nervous current in a like manner. After death, as is well known, the electric current can temporarily restore the functions of the body. The dead man, thus operated on, will open his mouth and eyes, move his limbs, etc. Contrary, the brain (the great nervous centre) may be so disposed of as to act as a galvanic battery, which will produce a real electric current, to be used for chemical decomposition, or for sending messages by telegraph.

Though the exact nature of nervous power is not understood, this is evident, that as the clouds discharge their electricity by lightning to equalize, so human beings distribute their nervous power to one another. The fully charged nerve fluid of one body may draw over to a defected body, urge on to new life and produce a healthier circulation.

A patient will often be very liberal in compensating drug medication, (which always is doubtful as to effects) and hardly appreciates, much less remunerates, the vitality of the healer, a quality which outweighs the value of any drug. But people do want to see in order to believe. This seems to be a natural proclivity. Yet the electric spark hurries along the telegraphic wire unseen, and is not doubted as to the effect. It is safe to predict that hereafter, when knowledge becomes more disseminated, magnetic treatment will become the standard remedy for the most serious classes of disease. G. L.

"The Ancient Band" are to be placed on exhibition in Boston, the Banner says.

ASTROLOGY—No 1.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

A few weeks since the editor of COMMON SENSE made such an allusion to Astrology as would have been sufficient to call forth a reply, had I not been so intensely occupied with other matters that I could not have done the subject justice. Again, on November 14th, a correspondent calls upon me for information touching the astral science, and having a little leisure I will employ it by giving a series of articles embodying such information as I conceive will prove acceptable to the general reader. As for teaching the science itself, I would no more attempt it in this way than I would attempt teaching a course of mathematics.

AN IMPOSTER EXPOSED.

But first I must dispose of the man who advertises himself as the "only living Astrologer." I called upon him on my arrival in San Francisco, more than a year ago, paid my two dollars and engaged a horoscope. It was the old story of fortune-telling—a pack of cards! Stifling my disgust under a pretense of being very deaf, I listened to his long list of generalities, a large majority of which would apply specifically to a large majority of men of my personal appearance. Herein, then, lay the secret of this mountebank's success. Keeping up my incognito, I asked several questions which would apply specially, and he made the most wretched blunders. For instance, he made me a good financier; skilled in music and rather forehanded or well off, if not rich, whereas I am an idiot in finance, unable to tell one tune from another, and always as poor as that historical bird known as "Job's Turkey." But the crowning test of his being an imposter in his business was in reply to my question whether I would ever become an infidel or Spiritualist. He assured me that it was simply impossible; that I was naturally a believer in the Christian religion, and that I would live and die in that faith. Now if there is a reader of COMMON SENSE who does not know me, either personally or by reputation, I will say to that person that I have been an infidel from my earliest recollection, except on two occasions, in my boyish years, when some ranting preachers magnetized and frightened me into "experiencing religion." Moreover, for nearly eighteen years I have been publicly known as a Spiritualist, have lectured in favor of Spiritualism and have been editor of a Spiritual paper, namely, the Spiritual Age, which was started by Prof. Brittain. So much for this charlatan who advertises himself as "the only living Astrologer."

ANTIQUITY OF ASTROLOGY.

Its great antiquity is proven by the fact that history is silent regarding its origin. Whenever Astrology is mentioned by the ancient historian it is always spoken of in as familiar a way as we speak of arithmetic, because every one was supposed to know what was meant. But Astrology is far older than any written language. Its symbols have been found graven upon Egyptian monuments, among the hieroglyphics, proving a puzzle to the savans, and even to Champollion himself, although readily interpreted by the Astrologer. Take for instance the following:

♈	♉	♊	♋
♌	♍	♎	♏

A person must be able to call these characters by name in order to understand the reading of them, which is as follows: Leo is ruled by the Sun; the Moon rules Cancer; Mercury rules Gemini and Virgo; Venus rules Taurus and Libra; Mars rules Aries and Scorpio; Jupiter rules Sagittarius and Pisces; Saturn rules Capricornus and Aquarius. It will be observed that the first character is Leo, and when we remember that both the Astronomers and Astrologers, in ancient times, commenced the list of the twelve zodiacal constellations with the one which occupied the point of the vernal equinox, we are made aware of the fact that the foregoing must have been engraved in Egypt not less than ten thousand, nor more than thirteen thousand, years ago. We arrive at this fact by calculating the "precession of the equinoxes," knowing the present point of colure, and knowing that the precession amounts to a fraction over sixty seconds of a degree of space per annum. Prof. O. M. Mitchell tested the accuracy of a calculation of this kind when he required his mathematicians to determine the exact day in the past when the Sun, Moon and Constellations of the Zodiac occupied a certain position, giving them the copy of a diagram taken from an Egyptian sarcophagus, whereon was a date pointing to the autumnal equinox, 1722 B. C. This date, however, he carefully concealed from the mathematicians. Their answer was, and their works proved it, October 7th, 1722 B. C. As Astronomers agree upon September 23 as the time of the autumnal equinox, it will be seen at a glance that the discrepancy for a period of nearly four thousand years, is only fourteen days. In the Astrological inscription which I have copied, the data is not full enough to determine the time of its construction with any degree of accuracy, for there is nothing to indicate whether it was at the time when Virgo had just left the point of the vernal equinox, or whether it was at the time when Leo was about to give place to Cancer, being a difference of 2,176 years, that is to say, this length of time is required for thirty degrees, or a whole constellation, to retrocess, or pass a given point.

A word more about this Astrological inscription. It corroborates "the zodiac of Dendera," which has so long been a puzzle to antiquarians, for there, too, we find Leo placed at the head of the Zodiacal Constellations. During the past year I have had a fac simile of this Zodiac made upon canvas, with a view of devoting a lecture to its explanation, but I am such a poor financier that at present I am unable to hire a hall and give the lecture. I will do so, however, should I recuperate, as I trust I may during the winter. But my sheet is full, and I must defer further explanations until the next number. I have now laid the foundation, and trust that the remaining numbers of this series will prove more interesting.

MARVELOUS SPIRIT MANIFESTATIONS.

The Evening Post, of this city, recently copied from the N. Y. Graphic an article written by one Dr. Beard, purporting to be an expose of the Eddy family. The following is a portion of a refutation which also appeared in the Graphic, but not in the Post: It was written by a Russian gentleman now residing in New York. He says:

Dozens of visitors have remained at the Eddy's for weeks, and even for months. Not a single seance has taken place but some of them realized the personal presence of a friend, a relative, a mother, father, or dear departed child. But lo! here comes Dr. Beard, stops less than two days, applies his powerful electrical battery, under which the spirit does not even wink or flinch, closely examines the cabinet (in which he finds nothing), and then turns his back and declares most emphatically "that he wishes it to be perfectly understood that if his scientific name ever appears in connection with the Eddy family, it must be only to expose them as the greatest frauds who cannot do even good trickery." * * * Didn't the learned doctor say to Colonel Olcott while at the Eddys' that three dollars worth of second hand drapery would be enough for him to show how to materialize all the spirits that visit the Eddy homestead? To this I reply, backed as I am by the testimony of hundreds of reliable witnesses, that all the wardrobe of Niblo's Theatre would not suffice to attire the numbers of spirits that emerge night after night from an empty little closet. Let Dr. Beard explain the following facts if he can: I remained fourteen days at the Eddy's. In that short period of time I saw and recognized fully, out of 119 apparitions, seven spirits. I admit that I was the only one to recognize them, the rest of the audience not having been with me in my numerous travels throughout the East, but their various dresses and costumes were plainly seen and closely examined by all.

The first was a Georgian boy, dressed in the historical Caucasian attire. I recognized and questioned him in Georgian upon circumstances known only to myself. I was understood and answered. Requested by me in his mother tongue (upon the whispered suggestion of Colonel Olcott) to play the "Lezguinka," a Circassian dance, he did so immediately upon the guitar.

Second.—A little old man appears. He is dressed as Persian merchants generally are. His dress is perfect as a national costume. Every thing is in its right place, down to the "babouches" that are off his feet, he stepping out in his stockings. He speaks his name in a loud whisper. It is "Hassan Aga," an old man whom I and my family have known for twenty years at Tiflis. He says, half in Georgian and half in Persian, that he has got a "big secret to tell me," and comes at three different times, vainly seeking to finish his sentence.

Third.—A man of gigantic stature emerges forth, dressed in the picturesque attire of the warriors of Kurdistan. He does not speak but bows in the Oriental fashion, and lifts up his spear ornamented with bright-colored feathers, shaking it in token of welcome. I recognize him immediately as Saffar Ali Bek, a young chief of a tribe of Kurds, who used to accompany me in my trips around Ararat in Armenia on horseback, and who on one occasion saved my life. More, he bends to the ground as though picking up a handful of mould and scattering it around, presses his hand to his bosom—a gesture familiar only to the tribes of the Kurdistan.

Fourth.—A Circassian comes out. I can imagine myself at Tiflis, so perfect is his costume of "nouker" (a man who either runs before or behind one on horseback). This one speaks. More, he corrects his name, which I pronounced wrong on recognizing him, and when I repeat it he bows, smiling, and says in the purest guttural Tartar, which sounds so familiar to my ear, "Tehoch yachtchi" (all right), and goes away.

Fifth.—An old woman appears with a Russian headgear. She comes out and addresses me in Russian, calling me by an endearing term that she used in my childhood. I recognize an old servant of my family, a nurse of my sister.

Sixth.—A large, powerful negro next appears on the platform. His head is ornamented with a wonderful coiffure something like horns wound about with white and gold. His looks are familiar to me, but I do not at first recollect where I have seen him. Very soon he begins to make some vivacious gestures, and his mimic helps me to recognize him. It is a conjurer from Central Africa. He grins and disappears.

Seventh and Last.—A large, gray-haired gentleman comes out attired in the conventional suit of black. The Russian decoration of Saint Ann hangs suspended by a large red moire ribbon with two black stripes—a ribbon, as every Russian will know, belonging to said decoration. This ribbon is worn around his neck. I feel faint, for I think of recognizing my father. But the latter was a great deal taller. In my excitement I address him in English, and ask him: "Are you my father?" He shakes his head in the negative, and answers as plainly as any mortal man can speak, and in Russian, "No; I am your uncle." The word "diadia" has been heard and remembered by all the audience. It means "uncle."

But what of that? Dr. Beard knows it to be but a pitiful trick, and we must submit in silence. People that know me, know that I am far from being credulous. Though a Spiritualist of many years' standing, I am more skeptical in receiving evidence from paid mediums than many unbelievers. But when I receive such evidence as I received at the Eddy's, I feel bound on my honor and under the penalty of confessing myself a moral coward, to defend the mediums as well the thousands of my brother and sister Spiritualists, against the conceit and slander of one man who has nothing and no one to back him in his assertions. I now hereby finally and publicly challenge Dr. Beard to the amount of $500 to produce before a public audience and under the same conditions the manifestations herein attested; or, failing this, to bear the ignominious consequences of his proposed expose. H. P. BLAVATSKY.

124 East Sixteenth St., Oct. 27.

Our Esteemed Friend, Laura Cuppy Smith, who never fails to speak eloquent words of sympathy to the oppressed in all conditions of life, has left for San Francisco by the overland route. Her God is the Humanity which she always recognizes in her brothers and sisters wherever she may be. We wish to express our thanks for the many kind words spoken and noble acts of disinterested benevolence rendered to the prisoner and convict. We hope to hear from her soon after her arrival, as she will probably visit the prisons, giving an account of the discipline in the different places. Success and our best wishes attend her wherever she may rest or roam.—Prisoners' Friend.

The "Ad Interim Literary Club" held their meeting, as usual, on Sunday at 11 o'clock A. M. at Social Hall, 39 Fourth street. Dr. Pilkington read an interesting paper on "God, Heaven, Hell, and the Devil." Prof. Chaney followed in some well-timed remarks concerning the origin of those words. The Club will meet again at the same hour and place to-morrow morning.

IGNORING THE EVIDENCE.

Recently in Lurline Hall, Boston, a piano, on which sat six heavy men, was lifted from the floor, and floated in the air, only the hands of a medium being laid on it. Mr. Seaver, editor of the Investigator, who was present, says:

While freely admitting that the piano did move at Lurline Hall, we are not satisfied that the movers were spirits. We doubt the existence of spirits "out of the form," and cannot therefore believe they are movers. It seems that spirits cannot manage without human agency, yet we can go through our work without any spiritual aid. We print our paper by human means altogether, but if spirits were to throw our press out of the window, they would be compelled to "concentrate" their power with that of human beings in order to do the deed. That, however, would spoil, for us, the spirituality of the act, as we should conclude when we saw men at work destroying the press, that spirits had no part or lot in the matter.

The illustrative supposed by the Investigator is not to the point. Because he "doubts the existence of spirits," he may reasonably refuse to concede that they moved the piano; but to set the actual proof aside, as he does, and suppose a case which might happen, is an evasion of the facts which actually did happen. How does he know that his press could not be thrown out of the window without the aid of human beings? Judging from the moving of the piano, this could be done, and judging by the unfairness of the Investigator, it should be done. When a public journal is afraid to follow wherever the truth leads, it has no right to the name of Investigator. The Princeton Word answers Mr. Seaver as follows:

The piano must have been lifted by some invisible force, acting through the medium. Is the fact that Mr. Seaver does not know what that force is good ground for him to deny the presence or existence of any invisible force at all? We think not. Pianos and six men are not lifted by nothing? or by a lady's passive hand alone. The case of his press being thrown out of the window by men whom he sees do it is not in point. If the press, while the men were sitting on it and a lady's hand only touching it, rose and floated out of the window, it would be analogous.

For Mr. Seaver to deny the existence of intelligent spiritual force because he "doubts the existence of spirits 'out of the form'" is equally unphilosophical. Because I cannot see electricity and "doubt its existence" is the electric telegraph therefore a hoax, and the belief that electricity propels messages over wires a "delusion"? Because the origin of life is yet inexplicable, is it therefore reasonable to "doubt the existence" of any spiritual force which produces animal and vegetable manifestations of life? Mr. Seaver asks to be "permitted to see the piano move when no hands are upon it." Will he show us where steam drives a mill without intervening wheels and belts. Because telegrams cannot be sent without the aid of batteries and wires does "doubting the existence" of electrical agency prove one a philosopher? Until I am able to give some plausible explanation of the spiritual phenomena my denial of the spiritualistic theory of their origin and nature tends to show my own lack of wit rather than ignorant credulity in those who have advanced a reasonable theory for explaining these phenomena. It is as foolish for free-thinkers to label spiritualism "delusion" as it is for Christians to say it is of the devil.

FOR FREE SPEECH.

ED'S. COMMON SENSE:—In your issue of Oct. 24th, you state that a subscriber stopped his paper because you reported the lectures of Jenny Leys. Now, although I have so many papers that I cannot find leisure to read one half of their contents, and notwithstanding the time for which I subscribed has expired, I will continue to patronise COMMON SENSE for the very reason that you not only report the lectures of the most liberal and radical speakers, but also allow such an equal chance with others to be heard through your columns, which some of your best patrons were fearful at the outset, you would not do. And inasmuch as you have now proved that you possess the moral courage to pursue such a fair, liberal and honorable course, I hope and trust that truly liberal subscribers will not only continue to patronise your enterprise, but also use their influence to induce their friends to do so. Social freedom being one of the most interesting subjects for discussion for one, I hope to often have the pleasure of reading the thoughts of those two of your most able and interesting correspondents upon that question.—Austin Kent and P. J. Healy. Yours for truth, lead where it may,
Colfax, Cal. Nov. 20th 1874. I. A. H.

MR. EDITOR:—How is it that the daily press can never even approach the truth in reporting heretical meetings? The Post of Monday morning last speaks of a meeting of the Lyceum for Self Culture, in which there is only malicious slander and grotesque misrepresentation. It is true that much of the ridiculous and absurd may be seen at those meetings, for those who have eyes for that sort of thing, but there is also well spent effort and earnest purpose to accomplish good. Why is it that the Post never sees anything ridiculous or funny in a Catholic institution? While it has spared no educational or charitable institution, not Catholic, it has been kind and velvet pawed with Catholic enterprises. The Lyceum can be lampooned with impunity as it is neither influential nor wealthy. Yet, if all who sympathise with the Lyceum and its purpose, all who are interested in land reforms and other reforms for which the Post sometimes plays the Champion, were not to read the Post there would be a falling off in the subscription list. The Lyceum may congratulate itself that last Sunday there was at least one who had "brains, ears and hair."

Yours etc. J. W. MACKIE.

A MEDIUM WANTED.—A friend in Weaverville, Trinity county, writes to this office as follows: "In a conversation of a few moments with a prominent lawyer of this place, it was suggested by him that I should write this note, asking of you, or through you, to send us a "medium." I think we have been somewhat neglected in this isolated and benighted region. There are only a few believers in Spiritualism here, but good may be the result of the visit, and I think it would 'pay,' as our people are generous to a fault." Our correspondent does not say what kind of a medium is wanted, but those interested can obtain the necessary information by writing to B. F. Flinn, Douglas City, Trinity co., who is the most active reformer we know of in that county.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO

[Passes on with Wagner.]

WAGNER—Oh! what deep pleasure must you, noble man,
From the high reverence of this crowd derive;
Happy the man who from his talents can
Draw such advantage whilst he's yet alive.
The father points you out unto his boy,
All question, squeeze, and haste to catch a sight,
The fiddle stops, the dancer quits his joy,
You move—they separate to left and right,
His cap on high to some each peasant wight;
Scarce stop they short of kneeling down as well,
As tho' the Host were passing with its bell.

FAUST—A few steps further up to yon grey stone,
There will we rest from our long morning's ramble;
Here sat I oft, full many an hour alone,
Worrying myself with fasts and prayers most ample,
In hope how rich, in faith how firm!
With sighs, and tears, and hands wrung wildly,
I thought that fearful plague's last term
To wrest from heaven's God, listening mildly;
These people's vvas strike me now like scorn.
Oh! could you read on my crushed heart within
How little sire or son forlorn
Deserve such loud acclaim to win;
My father was an honest man, and grave,
Who about Nature, and her sacred round,—
In honor, yet to precedent a slave—
Worried his brains with thoughts more sage than sound;
Who in the company of sages
Locked in dark laboratories wrought, *
And guided by old cyphered pages
All opposites together brought.
There was a lion red, an eager lover,
In a warm bath paired with his lily bride,*
And both were next, "midst open flames allied,
Chased from one bridechamber into the other.
At length, when in gay hues they spied
The young Queen glowing in the glass,
That was their medicine; their patients died,
Yet no one questioned—who was saved, alas!
Thus have we both with ballish, vile receipts,
Upon these hills, and in the vales between,
Rivaled the pestilence in our sad feats;
I've given this trash to thousands well I ween;
They've passed away, and I must see the time
When people praise the murderer for his crime!

WAGNER—And yet why grieve about it now?
Can a brave man do more than this,
His art to ply as he did vow
With skill and conscientiousness?
If you, as youth, honor your father's age,
Gladly you'll cherish knowledge that he gives;
If you, as man, store knowledge still, a sage,
Your son may reach yet further whilst he lives.

FAUST—Oh! happy he, in whose heart hope infuses
Strength to strive upwards from this sea of error.
What one knows nothing of is what one uses,
Whilst what one knows, one can make use of never,
But this sweet hour of lovely calm no more
Let us becloud with such sad thoughts; Oh! see
How, in the golden sunset's shimmering glow,
Yon woodbine covered cottages repose.
The sun sinks westward, our sweet day is dead,
Thither he hastens new life to inspire;
Had I but wings to raise these limbs of lead,
And ever follow his retreating fire,
Then might I ever see in sunset's gleams
The quiet world beneath my feet lie sleeping,
The treetops tipped with fire, vales steeped in dreams,
The white cascade its golden tear drops weeping;
The wild hill then with deep ravines dark shaded
Might no more stay my winged, Godlike flight,
But ocean's robe, with soft, warm bays deep braided
Should spread blue prairies 'fore my raptured sight.
At length the Sun-god sinks beneath the horizon,
And this new fever wakes my slumbering sprite,
I hurry forth his glow to keep mine eyes on,
Bright day before, behind lugubrious night,
Blue heavens above me, and blue waves below;
Oh! beauteous dreams, too lovely whilst ye fade!
Alas! with spirit wings full well I know
No wings of feathers fellowship 'ere made.
Still 'tis inborn in everyone almost
To feel his spirit soar away above,
When overhead in deep blue ether lost
The skylark trills his sweet soft song of love,
When o'er the jagged pine clad height
The eagle sweeps with wings at rest,
And the crane wings his lonely flight
O'er swamps and lakes towards his nest.

* May not the lion red mean cinnabar, and the lily chloride of sodium; the preparation made by the process here figuratively described, being the hydrochloride or bichloride, both so constantly and deleteriously employed in allopathic practice? It is usually supposed, however, that whilst the former means native mercury, the latter signifies antimony, in which case some combination of these must be intended as the medicine so emphatically condemned by Goethe. Paracelsus, in his Tinctura Physicorum, uses almost the same terms in speaking of mercury and antimony. Calomel he also speaks of as the White Eagle. The Red Lion and the White Lily are generic, not specific, names for the ingredients; and although used by Paracelsus to refer to the above, may also be employed of other antagonistic ingredients of any preparation, since it was common with the alchemists to speak of this forced combination of opposites as a marriage. The expression here used then, would well apply to Calomel, at one time considered the sheet-anchor in all severe internal inflammations and fevers.

WAGNER—I've oft myself been troubled with ennui
Yet never felt that sort of ecstasy.
I find I soon grow tired of woods and fields,
For your doves' wing I never felt much longing;
What nobler joys one's library now yields,
The eager sage with books and parchments thronging,
Then winter nights grow beautiful and sweet,
A holy life pierces like fireglow thro' you,
And should you ope some tome of wisdom meet
A heaven entire descends in light unto you!

FAUST—Thou knowest only one desire as yet,
Oh! never learn the other to discover,
Two souls alas! within my breast are met,
The one strives ever to divorce the other.
The one clings fast in sturdy love of sense
To this fair world with stiffening grapnels cleaving,
The other tries as hard to rise from hence,
For realms of soul this dim, dull dungeon leaving;
Oh, spirits! if there be such in the air,
Who hover, ruling space, 'twixt earth and heaven,
Swoop hither downwards from your pure homes there,
And waft me to new life in a new heaven.
Oh! if a magic cloak were only mine,
And it could bear me off to strange new shores,
I would not sell it for those robes that shine
On monarch's shoulders in their gala hours!

WAGNER—Invoke not, pray, that well known ghastly band
Who stream in spreading flocks thro' ghostland's smother,
By whom all dangers for mankind are planned,
From one end of this earth unto the other.
From the harsh north, these spirits biting tooth
Gnashes upon thee o'er its barbed tongue,
From the dry east they rush withouten ruth,
To fatten on thy wasting, festering lung.
If the South sends them from its scorching waste
To heap their coals of fire upon thy crown,
So from the West their flies come hurrying fast,
To freshen field and meadow, then to drown.
They listen gladly, since they joy in evil
Obey us readily, glad to deceive;
They wear the garb of heaven, so bland and civil,
And lip like angels when they falsehoods weave.
Come let us hence—grey twilight wraps the world,
The air grows chill, damp mists are round us whirled;
At eve it is one values most one's home.
Why stand you thus as one astonished? Come!
What see you in the gloom your soul to trouble?

FAUST—See you, yon black dog scour thro' wheat and stubble?

WAGNER—I saw him long ago, he struck me not the least.

FAUST—Regard him well, for what d'you take the beast?

WAGNER—Why for some dog, who, after poodle fashion,
Worries himself his master's steps to trace.

FAUST—D'you notice how, instead at once to dash on,
He creeps in narrow circles towards this place,
And—or I err—a whirl of fire behind
Seems flashed from the gyrations of his tail.

WAGNER—Aught save a coal-black dog to see, I fail;
Hallucination that will prove you'll find.

FAUST—Meseems he draws there light and magic loops
To form a future snare about our feet.

WAGNER—I see him slow and timid in his swoops,
Lost strangers, not his master, he should meet.

FAUST—The circle narrows, see, he's reached this place.

WAGNER—A dog you see, no ghost is in the case.
He growls and hesitates, and crouches flat.

FAUST—He wags his tail—all dogs you know do that.

FAUST—Good dog! come here! Poor fellow then! Good beast!

WAGNER—The dog's a foolish animal at best,
If you stand still he looks up in your face,

You speak to him, towards your breast he'll spring,
If you lose aught, he'll find its hiding place;

Into the lake he'll leap your stick to bring.

FAUST—You're right in sooth, I do not find a grain in
The animal of ghost, it all was training.

WAGNER—E'en a wise man, in truth, hath often found,
His best friend in a clever, well trained hound;

Aye, he deserves that all should treat him kindly,
Who learns the tricks the students teach so blindly!

A Journal of Live Ideas.

SPIRITUALISM, ITS PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY, SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE, ETC.

VOL. 1.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1874.

No. 29.

Signs of the Times.

An anti-vaccinating society has been formed in London, for mutual protection against the law imposing compulsory vaccination.

American manufacturers now make nearly everything as well or better than the European, but many of them put on French and English labels to deceive customers.

The Golden Age says Spiritualism, with all its crudeness, is confirming the world's shaken faith in immortality, and diffusing a new faith and feeling respecting the future.

At seances lately held in London spirit forms have been seen repeatedly in the same room with the circle, and without the use of a cabinet. They appear and disappear in the presence of the sitters.

A. T. Stewart has not abandoned his plan of opening a hotel for women. The building is not yet completed, Mr. Stewart having refused to submit to the exactions of working-men's organizations.

A dress reform store for women has been opened in Boston, and it promises to be a success. Among the articles sold is an under garment that combines two or three articles of dress into one gracefully fitting piece of drapery. On this arrangement the outside clothing is fastened.

Gen. Sherman asks for an increase in the army. The people are opposed to any increase. It is too large already. We do not want anything more than the skeleton of an army. Volunteers make the best soldiers in time of need. The Navy too, should be reduced. It is of little use, and very expensive.

Sixty thousand working-men and working-women are said to be out of employment, in New York city, and in a condition of destitution, with a rigorous Winter in prospect. This is a "sign of the times," which seems to continue year after year. Is there no remedy?

Horatio Seymour has declined to be a candidate for the U. S. Senate, which with him is equivalent to consent. He declined the nomination for the Presidency once, and with tears in his eyes protested that it was too bad to force him to take it, so it was. Yet he took it and was—defeated.

Brown, the "mind-reader," who visited the Eddy family utterly incredulous, closes a report by saying: "All who saw were convinced that what they saw was no hallucination. Some, of course, who are Spiritualists, believe that the appearances were materializations of the dead. To many others the whole is a deep mystery, inexplicable as yet. Of the latter I am one."

It is proposed to abolish titles of nobility in Denmark. The Lower House favor while the Upper oppose the measure, but it is gaining strength.

It is asserted that Bismarck is endeavoring to bring on another conflict with France, and that he is hastening the crisis that France may not recover from her reverses before the attack.

The Shakers at Lebanon Springs, Watervliet, New York, are making unusual efforts to recruit their numbers, while the Oneida Community people daily refuse applications. What is this a sign of?

Five students of the Regent's Park Baptist College, London, who were about to graduate for the ministry, have announced themselves rationalists. Three have joined the Unitarians, and the other two have declined to enter the ministry.

W. F. Jamison says a little observation and thinking show that Christianity is going to pieces, so far as ideas are concerned. As an organization it is strong, but as a system of ethics it is dead. It has become mainly a fashionable juggernaut for grinding working people beneath its ponderous wheels.

The Secretary of the Indiana State Association of Spiritualists asks for contributions to carry on the legal contest with the distant heirs of Robert Barnes, who left three-quarters of a million of dollars for the benefit of orphan children of Liberalist parents in Indiana.

Dr. Holland, editor of Scribner's Monthly, last month intimated that all who believe Beecher and other clergymen guilty of crime are fools. In the November number he calls them sensualists. We are waiting anxiously to see what the month of December may prove them to be in the opinion of this astute editor.

A New York daily says: "This is called an unbelieving age, a skeptical age, a material age, a critical age. But, notwithstanding all the epithets launched at the age, in no period since the world began have religious questions absorbed more attention or been discussed with more ability, earnestness and power."

The new motor said to have been discovered by a Mr. Keeley of Philadelphia, it is asserted, will be able to draw a train of cars twice across the continent with less than two gallons of water, which is used over and over again, without material loss, and this without the aid of fire, chemicals or electricity. None but very small vessels for generating the power are necessary, because the pressure is said to be 7,000 pounds per square inch, a power which may be safely used in small vessels with thick walls.

CURE BY SPIRIT AID.

Through the kindness of Mr. B. Shrafl, we are permitted to publish the following letter, which contains matter of interest not only to the person addressed, but to all Spiritualist and inquirers after truth:

SAN FRANCISCO, NOV. 20th, 1874.

Prof. J. R. Buchanan:—Ever since the first issue of the Banner of Light I have been a reader of its valuable pages, and have so often read your well digested articles that I seem to know you somewhat. In the number for November 14 you ask psychometers and clairvoyants to inform you of their remarkable cures, etc., etc. Although I am neither, yet I have an experience which might be of some value to your collection.

In 1865 I lived in Rockland, Maine; I had an old lady 69 years of age as my housekeeper, whom I had known for ten years previous. She was struck with paralysis about two years before I made her acquaintance. As she was a poor woman I befriended her, and let her read the Banner and other spiritual literature. When she came to my house in 1866 I held frequent circles, and she often expressed the desire to become a medium. We sat for development for sixteen months, twice a week, regularly, and sometimes three times, but apparently neither she nor I developed any mediumistic power.

She could neither shut her hands fully nor straighten her fingers; neither could she raise her hands to her head. In order to dress herself she had to sit down, bend her head forward and put her elbows on her knees, and in that manner push up her hands so as to throw her clothes over her head. She had to do the same in combing her hair. One morning, in the fall of the year, she came out of her room telling me she did not sleep any all night, such a queer sensation ran through all her body under the skin, just as if bugs were crawling all over her. I thought it strange, yet I could not give her any explanation. The next morning she told me the same. The third morning I had overslept myself, and I called her to get up quickly, as it was late. It had always required one-half hour for her to dress. I went to the stables to take care of my horses, being gone about fifteen minutes, but on my return she was already dressed. She told me she had, during the night, had the same feeling previously described; that on coming into the kitchen, after dressing, she put out her hands to warm them at the stove, and was astonished to find that she could straighten her fingers. She then raised her arms to her head and found she could do it, and so she went through other motions, and to her delight she had complete control of her limbs. She also observed that bunches on her wrist and arms, the size of half a walnut, had disappeared. After she had told me this, all in the greatest astonishment, I remarked: "Well, Mrs. Garland, I cannot account for it on any other hypothesis than that you have been cured by spirits, who have taken advantage of the harmonious conditions we are having at our house, and have thereby been able to affect you." For eight years previously she had taken no medicine, neither had I nor anyone else magnetized her.

While I was saying it must be spirit cure, her right hand was lying on the table; the first finger commenced to tremble, then the second, and soon the whole hand made the motion, striking the table three times, confirming what I said. This was such a strange proceeding to herself that she kept continually assuring me, with an anxious look on her countenance, that she was not doing it herself. I told her she need not fear that I would think so. The hand then made the motion that it wanted to write, and after I had given her a paper and pencil she wrote mechanically a short message, and when I came home in the evening she had written a very good message.

A few weeks after this development she became clairaudient. She could hear two or more spirits' voices at the same time, and tell what their conversation was. She had been brought up in the family of a Congregationalist minister, who then was President of Dartmouth College, where she had to recite every day a chapter from the Bible, therefore she knew nearly every chapter and verse by heart. When this clairaudience came to her, her guardians would say: "Sister, arrange your work to-day so that you can sit down by 9 or 10 o'clock, and we will bring to you a large band of spirits that were Methodists or Baptists, or some other creeds, and who have not laid off yet their creeds; their earthlife's creeds still cling to them, and we want you to instruct them." When the appointed time came she would sit down. The guardian then would say to her: "Sister we have come, and I will introduce you to Brother Mr. so-and-so, who will be the main speaker, yet others will take part in the discussion." Sometimes the spirits would open with a verse or chapter from the Bible, and comment on it for ten or fifteen minutes, then she would reply; or she would open the discussion and they would reply. Sometimes she would hear two or three contradict her at a time, and not only would she discuss the Bible with them, but all kinds of subjects. These discussions were very interesting, and were carried on with great earnestness and warmth, sometimes for two or three hours at a time. These discussions lasted for nearly six months, until she passed over to the higher life herself, and many and hearty were the blessings she received from the invisibles that she had brought to light through her teachings. I, or whoever was present, could not hear the spirit voices, but one could tell by her answers what the subject was. Sometimes she spoke with great animation, and the "séances" were exceedingly interesting.

B. SHRAFL.

In a note to the editor, Mr. Shrafl says: "Before Mrs. Garland passed over to the other life (April 27, 1867) I had frequent conversations with her about the change, and requested that if she should find the spirit world a real natural world, and that we as individuals retain our identity, our loves, desires and aspirations, only realizing them there in a higher measure, that she should give me a communication to prove it to me without a shadow of doubt. She promised she would, and how well she kept her promise I can prove, if you permit me so much room, Mr. Editor, in another article."

[For Common Sense.]
THE PRESS—"COMMON SENSE."

There are but three modes of promulgating new ideas, or maintaining old ones, viz., the Press, Lecturers and Societies. While the two latter are well, our present civilization has placed the Press foremost. This is the age of newspapers—a reading age—yes, and a thinking one. Lecturers and Societies give ideas to the few, while the Press spread them to the many. Individuals and Societies have specialities, while the Press, though it may be special, yet attracts even unbelievers, as it can be the vehicle of your ideas as well as mine. There is a wisdom in all minds which lends an ear, at least to the Press, while to Lecturers and Societies a deaf one may be turned. Tyn-dall discoursed his celebrated address to a chosen few, but the Liberal Press scattered it to the millions. Think you that the chosen could have sown the scientific and rational seed in a lifetime, which the Liberal Press did in a day? All praise to the Liberal Press everywhere!

And now to the point. We, as men and women of the Pacific coast, who are seeking to enlarge the field of thought, have before us, as an expounder of "live ideas" and liberal thoughts, COMMON SENSE, which calls upon us to exercise our common sense in lending a hand with a will to advance its interest. Let every reader accept the labor, and render aid in thought, purse and goodwill to the best of each one's ability, and feeling that a Press on a strong financial basis has a power and influence in proportion to its financial strength as well as brains. The aiding in building up Liberal papers should be considered the first duty of every liberal thinking man and woman, for even while they are asleep labor and money is being expended for the scattering of those ideas which advance humanity in science, liberty, love and justice. Every man and woman who reads and thinks, knows what is in the air. And what weapon is mightier than the pen—what more potent than the Press? To your work my friends, and do your duty to humanity and yourselves. Yours, P.

At the close of his discourse on Money, last Sunday, Rev. Mr. Rexford spoke of the need of his society to build a church, and said:

"But if it is to be only a Church, and nothing more, let us have none of it. Every church should have some great practical charity connected with it. Churches are nothing of themselves, but only as they go hand in hand with some great practical benevolence that will uplift humanity and redeem it from poverty and vice. True Christianity should teach man not how to get safely out of this world into another, but how best to develop physically, mentally and morally so as to make the best of this life. If we act well one part on this earthly stage, the future will take care of itself."

That is the principal doctrine set forth in the meetings of Spiritualists. It is our faith that the way to prepare for the next life is to make a proper use of this.

A letter from Eureka to Mr. York states that Fannie Allyn is having large and delighted audiences there.

THE INFLUENCE OF MUSIC.

BY B. SHERAFI.

What is more deeply interwoven with the sympathies of human nature than music? What will more touchingly express the feelings of joy or sorrow, hope or melancholy? Music speaks with irresistible power to the feelings; it is the choicest language of the heart; it touches chords in the depths of the soul which lie beyond all other influences; it banishes cares and low thoughts, and gives us glimpses of heaven. See what power it exerts over the warrior when fatigued with forced marches under a scorching sun, or drenched with rain or cold, and possibly oppressed with hunger. Then, in the fierce battle, after struggling all day, fortunate to escape death or wounds, he is so tired as almost to drop to the ground, the command comes from the general to make another attack, and the band plays a stirring national air or march, then you can see the effect of that music—how it rouses men to deeds of valor and heroism, of which they would have been incapable without its inspiring strains.

Look at the criminal, no matter how low and depraved he is, when he hears a sweet, soft strain of music, how it touches his higher nature, and awakens better feelings in his soul towards his fellow-man, and brings back to his mind a mother's love and caresses, and the sweet little songs she used to sing for him. His innocent childhood days are recalled, and he is the better for it. Or go into a church or cathedral, and listen to the grand organ. What can inspire a more sincere and deeper feeling of religious devotion than to listen to the soft and, by degrees, swelling tones, as the melodious sounds burst forth from that wonderfully constructed instrument, with such a power and grandeur, as if coming from a thousand human throats, so as to fill every niche and corner of the building? Language is inadequate to express the feeling it gives, soothing the troubled soul, and lifting it up to the throne of the Infinite, there to worship him in spirit and in truth, giving us a foretaste of the human harmonies which our emancipated spirits shall enjoy after we lay off this mortal clay, and roam the blessed fields of the spirit world.

Nathan Burgess, the murderer of Joseph Robbins, confessed in open court, in Terre Haute, Indiana, that knowing Robbins had been paid his month's wages that day, he shot Robbins through his window. After waiting to see if the sound of the gun had aroused any one, he went to the house to rob the corpse, when he heard Robbins praying, and heard him say: "Oh God, have mercy on the one who did this. Spare him, for Jesus' sake." The Index says: "Let us pay a tribute of unfeigned reverence to such Christianity as transfigured the dying hour of this poor murdered man. The superstition of it is all lost in the glory of his great forgiveness, which was every whit as noble as that of his deified Master, and sprang from a fountain older than he, the human soul."

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

ASTROLOGY AND THE BIBLE.

It is claimed that our Bible is the oldest of all books, and although I grant it for the purpose of a consideration of this subject, still I hold myself in readiness to maintain against all comers that our Bible is chiefly a compilation from more ancient writings, wherein were veiled in riddles and allegories the mysteries of science, more especially that of Astronomy. But Astrology was thoroughly known and practiced thousands of years before the Bible was written. That both Astronomy and Astrology are older than the Bible, appears from the Bible itself. Take, for instance, the Book of Job, one of the oldest in the Bible, being from a Chaldean M.S., wherein the constellation Scorpio is personified and represented as a man. This must have been written about the time that Scorpio was projected from the summer to the winter regions, called also "the war in heaven," when the old serpent was cast out; and by calculating the precession we fix the time at least six thousand years ago.

It may be objected that a written language was unknown at so early a date. I reply that in a very interesting work published in London in 1868, by J. P. Lesley, an American, on the origin of man, Mr. Lesley proves conclusively that the Egyptians had a written language seven thousand years ago. Then why not a written language at Babylon, "the glory of the Chaldean empire," six thousand years ago? Because the Israelitish barbarians were unlettered at that date, is no evidence that their neighbors had not already achieved many of the triumphs of civilization. According to their own showing, the Israelites led nomadic lives, tending their flocks by day and pitching their tents at night, like the Modoc, always watching for a chance to steal or murder, at a time when the Babylonians and Egyptians were rearing those immense superstructures whose awful ruins still whisper of the glory of the illustrious past. No tongue can so speak as do the desert sands, sighing through the lone colonades that once guarded the Heliopolis of Egypt. The Israelites the authors of the oldest book! As well say that the Digger Indians were the authors of the Declaration of Independence! And who knows but this may not actually be the case, a thousand years hence, should some descendant of the Diggers then write a book? But to return from this digression. In the allegorical dialogue between God and Job, the former says:

"Can'st thou bind the sweet influence of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion? Can'st thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season? or can'st thou guide Arcturus with his sons?"—Job xxxviii: 31, 32.

The constellations here named, Pleiades and Orion, have been known in Astronomy by the same names for thousands of years, and are so known to the present day. The same may be said of Arcturus, the brightest star in the constellation Bootes, also called Adham, Adima, Adam; the common name is "the Celestial Herdsman," being personified in Genesis as the "first man," because in picturing the hieroglyphical character which we see at present on all celestial globes, this was the first man, as Virgo, (which comes to the meridian just before Bootes, and therefore leads him to his "fall," that is, to go down the western slope of the sky,) was the "first woman," baring the rib story.

"Can'st thou bind the sweet influence of Pleiades?" The ancient Astrologers taught that all the fixed stars falling within the zodiac exerted an influence in Nativities, notwithstanding the science deals almost exclusively with the signs of the zodiac, planets and luminaries. The influence of these stars was various, according as they were aspected by good or evil planets. Thus, if the Pleiades were aspected by Mars, storms, shipwrecks, etc., resulted; but when aspected by Jupiter or Venus, then the "influence" was harmonious. It was evidently in this light that the question was asked which is quoted at the beginning of this paragraph. Furthermore, this question establishes beyond controversy the fact that whoever wrote it held to the doctrine of "planetary influences," which is only another term for Astrology. If the Pleiades had no "influence," then the author stands convicted of blasphemy for having put an absurdity into the mouth of God himself.

In Greek and Roman Mythologies, which I rank the same as our Bible, Atlas had twelve daughters, seven of whom constituted the Pleiades, a constellation in the neck of Taurus, commonly called "the seven stars," or "seven sisters." Only six of these being visible to the naked eye, the other was said to have been lost; hence the poetic and allegorical lament for "The Lost Pleiad." The remaining five daughters of Atlas constitute the Hyades, a constellation in the face of Taurus in the shape of the letter V. Atlas himself was assigned to the position of holding up the heavens, lest they might fall, when "every one could catch larks." His name has been perpetuated by tradition by being applied to a representation of all the constellations, as an "atlas of the heavens." So, too, in Geography we apply his name to the maps.

Hence we discover in the Bible not only the same ideas advanced in the pagan Mythologies, but even the same names are preserved. To account for this coincidence we must accept of one of the following conclusions: First, Mythology was copied from the Bible. Second, The Bible was copied from Mythology. Third, Both the Bible and Mythology were derived from the same source, and therefore the coincidence is not surprising. The first of these conclusions cannot possibly be true, for the Greek and Roman Mythologies are derived from the Persian, Chaldean, Egyptian and East Indian Mythologies, where they had an existence in legend, in hieroglyphics, engraved upon monuments and written in the Sanscrit language for thousands of years before the Hebrew language was spoken; and of course the Bible worshipers dare not claim an antiquity for it greater than the language in which they claim that God gave its inspired truths to man. From these considerations it is evident that both the second and third conclusions may be true. That the third is true I have not a doubt.

The verses quoted from Job are sufficient to establish the fact that both Astronomy and Astrology were known before the Bible was written. But aside from this proof there are hundreds of passages confirming my statement—passages wherein the words Astrology, Astrologers, etc., occur. The “wise men” of the New Testament were Astrologers, and the term should have been translated magi instead of “wise men.” The ancient magi were the scholars and philosophers of the past, the term including Astrology just as much as the word “Science” now includes mathematics.

A LESSON FROM HISTORY.

In May, 1831, that distinguished author and accurate observer of men and things, Robert Dale Owen, furnished for the columns of the Free Inquirer (a paper then published in New York city) the following account of the workings of marriage and “placements” as they are found, side by side, among the Haytians. It refutes, as he claims, “one of the vulgar accusations against our species, that, but for the restraints of indissoluble marriage, the world would be a universal brothel.”

“Ever since the revolution which established the independence of the Haytian Republic, a custom has prevailed in the island which is not found elsewhere; and which has not, so far as I am aware, attracted that attention from the philosopher and the moralist which I conceive it most emphatically to deserve. I mean the custom which the inhabitants designate by the word placement. Those who choose to marry, are united as in other countries by a priest or magistrate. The difference between placement and marriage is, that the former is entered into without any prescribed form, the latter with the usual ceremonies; the former is dissoluble at a day’s warning, the latter is indissoluble, except by the vexatious and degrading formalities of divorce; the former is a tacit social compact, the latter a legal, compulsory one; in the former the woman gives up her name and her property; in the latter she retains both.

“Marriage and placement are in Hayti equally respectable; or, if there be a difference, it is in favor of placement; and, in effect, ten placements take effect in the island for one marriage. Petian, the Jefferson of Hayti, sanctioned the custom by his approval and example. Boyer, his successor, the present President, did the same; and by far the largest portion of the respectable inhabitants have imitated their Presidents and are placed, not married. The children of the placed have, in every particular, the same legal rights and the same standing as those born in wedlock.

“I imagine I hear from the clerical supporters of orthodoxy one general burst of indignation at this sample of national profligacy; at this contumacious of the laws of God and man. * * Learn that although there are ten times as many placed as married, yet there are actually fewer separations among the former than divorces among the latter. If constancy, then, is to be the criterion of morality, these same profligate unions—that is, unions unprayed for by the priest and unpaid for to him—are ten times as moral as the religion-sanctioned institution of marriage.

“But this is not all. It is a fact, notorious in Hayti, that libertinism is far more common among the married than among the placed. The explanatory cause is easily found. A placement secures to the consenting couple no legal right over one another. They remain together, as it were, on good behavior. Not only positive tyranny or downright viragoism, but petulant peevishness or selfish ill-humor are sufficient causes of separation. As such they are avoided with sedulous care. The natural consequence is, that the unions are usually happy, and that each being comfortable at home is not on the search for excitement abroad. In indissoluble marriage, on the contrary, if the parties happen to disagree, their first jarrings are unchecked by considerations of consequences. A husband may be as tyrannical as to him seems good; he remains a lord and master still. A wife may be as pettish as she pleases; she does not thereby forfeit the rights and privileges of a wife. Thus ill humor is encouraged by being legalized, and the natural results ensue—alienation of the heart and sundering of the affections. The wife seeks relief in fashionable dissipation; the husband, perhaps, in the brutalities of a brothel.

“But aside from all explanatory theories, the fact is as I have stated it, viz.: that (taking the proportion of each into account) there are ten legal separations of the married to one voluntary separation of the placed. What say you to that, my reverend friends? How consorts it with your favorite theory that man is a profligate animal, a desperately wicked creature? That, but for your prayers and blessings, the earth would be a scene of licentiousness and excess? That human beings remain together, only because you have helped to tie them? That there is no medium between priestly marriage and unseemly prostitution?

“Does this fact open your eyes a little on the real state of things to which we heterodox spirits venture to look forward? Does it assist in explaining to you how it is that we are so much more willing than you to entrust the most sacred duties to moral, rather than legal, keeping? You cannot imagine that a man and a woman, finding themselves suited to each other, shall agree, without your interference, to become companions; that he should remove to her home, or she to his, as they found it most convenient; that the connection should become known to their friends without the agency of banns, and be respected, even though not ostentatiously announced in a newspaper. Yet all this happens in Hayti without any breach of propriety, without any increase of vice; but, on the contrary, much to the benefit of morality and the discouragement of prostitution. It happens among the white as well as the colored population.

“Do you still ask me, accustomed as you are to consider virtue the offspring of restrictions—do you still ask me what the checks are that produce and preserve such a state of things? I reply, good feeling and public opinion. Continual change is held to be disreputable; and where sincere and well-founded affection exists, it is not desired; and as there is no pecuniary inducement in forming a placement, these voluntary unions are seldom ill-assorted.

“When our nature is blackened and abused, and when we are told that we are altogether vile and unclean until washed in the consecrated waters of theology, or purified by the searching influence of the law, let us appeal in its defense to facts like these.”

Frances Power Cobbe, in an address refers to Goldwin Smith’s article on Woman Suffrage, and calls Smith the “Knight of the Rueful Countenance” though he did not use a lance in his attack, but ran down the road, picking up mud to throw at the women. She said he had found out some immoral novels written by women; but, as a professor of History, it might have occurred to him, that, if women wrote immoral things, men acted them. She then considered his argument. First, that women should not vote, because they are too weak; and secondly, because they are too strong—strong enough to overturn all institutions. These, she characterized as Mr. Smith’s “Kilkenny cat arguments,” that devoured one another.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOOUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, DEC. 5, 1874.

DEFERRED ARTICLES.—We are again obliged to leave over a number of interesting articles, some of which are already in type, including "Self Culture," by Jas. Battersby; "We are a Million," by Satan Jr.; "Stumbling Blocks," a lecture by Laura Cuppy Smith; "Husband Catching," by Rustic; "Christ and Montezuma Expected Daily," by J. L. Hatch; "Spiritual Experiences," by Q. X.; an editorial article on The Conflict in Europe, another on "Materialization," and a half dozen poetical contributions.

The Tuesday evening seances at Charter Oak Hall are increasing in interest and attendance. The tests are excellent, and the developing circle at the close highly successful.

The friends of Laura Cuppy Smith will find her at 526 Chestnut steert, where she will doubtless be glad to see them without ceremony. She has no "reception days."

This evening, Saturday, Dec. 5th, Professor W. H. Chaney is to give a lecture on the Evils and Dangers of Romanism, at the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. Go and hear him.

Dr. P. B. Randolph has taken rooms at No 20 Montgomery street. He is to commence a series of lectures at Dashaway Hall on Sunday afternoon, and will undoubtedly have a large audience. His "flights of oratory" are something wonderful.

We received too late for publication this week a letter from S. B. Brittan, publisher of the Quarterly Journal of Spiritual Science, correcting an item in COMMON SENSE which stated that it is proposed to raise money for his aid. The error was merely typographical, the word "his" should have been its, meaning the Journal, not Mr. Brittan personally, as was evident from the context. We have on several occasions given unstinted praise to the Journal, as the most able exponent of the Spiritualistic Philosophy ever published, and have expressed much regret that the Spiritualists of America have failed to give it adequate support. Next week Mr. Brittan shall speak for himself.

J. L. YORK.—The people of the Southern part of the State will be glad to learn that this gentleman will spend several months in their section. He left on the steamer on Wednesday, for Santa Barbara, where he will remain during December, going from there to San Bernardino, and probably thence to San Diego. Mr. York's audiences in Stockton, and Sacramento, were very large, and his addresses gave great satisfaction.

POLITICAL PARTIES.

We hear of the formation of all kinds of political parties. There is one on Temperance, one on Finance, there are the old parties, the Grangers, the Railroad party and the Woman Suffragists. But there is no party for the laboring and middle classes. They are supine amid accumulating evils that threaten to ingulph them and the country in lasting ruin. We have now enjoyed political freedom for nearly a century. During that time we have had an unexampled national prosperity. The great breadth and richness of our national domain have increased our numbers, wealth and power to colossal proportions. We have invited the whole world to come here and help us develop the vast resources of our country. They have come—the representatives of all nations—white, black, brown, copper-colored, yellow, all who choose, and so far there has been ample space and opportunity for all. Fortunes have increased; millionaires have sprung up among us; our material progress has been unexampled; but what do we behold? As some us have become enormously rich, so others have become most abjectly poor. We have done nothing to solve that great question of adjustment between capital and labor, whose neglect has plunged the masses of the working people of the older countries into hopeless misery. The same evils are pressing at our doors. Our capitalists say, give us more cheap labor! Give us negroes, Chinamen, anybody who will work cheap, and enable us to pile up larger fortunes. And the laborers are supine and indifferent. Already every avenue is filled. Labor is unemployed. The poor suffer. They beg. They steal. Their daughters prostitute themselves for bread. Their children are ragged, dirty and unschooled. Their young men cannot, dare not, marry, for fear of want. Their young maidens are neglected and sliding childless to the grave. A million of our own race who should be born every year, are not, because circumstances will not permit. And still our rich cormorants call for cheap labor, cheap labor, cheap labor! They pay five thousand dollars to a foreign priest for a gorgeous marriage ceremony, and flourish their silks and diamonds before those of their own race who lack bread, and they will give none. They are acquiring the wealth and falling into the same folly, extravagance and heartless disregard of the poor that characterize the aristocrats of the old world. The poor are also gradually sinking into the same helpless poverty that degrades the poor of Europe. And yet no one proposes to stop this evil. There is no party proposing to prevent this wide difference in human condition. It is not strange that the rich do not seek a remedy. And yet it is. If the rich were wise, they would see to it that the poor are not utterly degraded. When the cottage is the abode of wretchedness and misery, the palace will hardly enjoy its luxuries in security. But it is not only strange, it is monstrous that the poor, the working men of California, pay no attention to these premonitory symptoms of their approaching degradation. Legal robbery gathers the wealth, leaving the mass of the people struggling in want.

Well, perhaps you say, What remedy is there? Is it for you to inquire, you, poor man. The rich man's daughter is loaded with presents of silks and diamonds, with a million dollars in gold to begin the world with. Your daughter cannot marry because you have nothing to give her, and her lover finds it difficult by honest work to obtain adequate support. The rich man's daughter will die childless perhaps, enervated by luxury. Yours will do the same, too poor to raise a child. And you do not even ask if there is no remedy for these evils. You do not propose to apply one if it could be found. You do not organize with your fellow working men, and say this shall not be any longer. You say nothing and you do nothing; and the whole world is amazed at your blindness and stupidity. The land of your country is being grasped by the few, while the many have no place to lay their heads, and you put no veto on the process, though your own children will shortly be homeless. There is a peaceful remedy for all this misery, present and to come. Let it be applied soon, lest the heat of discontent that lies latent now become fierce flames of revolution quenchable but in blood.

THE Boston City Government has voted $5,000 for soup to be fed to the poor during the winter. This, is well, but how much better it would be to spend a few thousand dollars to assist the poor to earn their own living; better still to so educate the poor that by combination of labor they would never come to want. Capital, under prevailing systems, has more power than is either just or necessary. This power seems to be a law of nature; but the seeming is only because centuries of usurpation on the part of capitalists have fixed the evil firmly in its seat. Nature never decreed that a few of her children should monopolize all her gifts. All human laws should discriminate against wealth instead of for it, as is now the case. The people, in this country, make the law, and when they are intelligent enough to see the injustice of our present system, they will change it. Industry should never be taxed. Trade should never be taxed. The property of the poor should be exempt, but the surplus wealth of the rich should pay all the expenses of Government. And these expenses should not consist, as now, in sustaining useless armies and navies, and hordes of office holders; but they should be for free schools, hospitals, orphan asylums, etc., for railroads, telegraphs and other internal improvements owned by and controlled for the general government. Our voters should be men and women of intelligence and good moral character, who have passed the examination of a competent tribunal. Such a state of affairs may be a long time hence; but when that time comes there will be no more soup houses, for there will be no necessity for them.

REV. E. L. REXFORD, the new pastor of the Universalist Church of this city, is proving himself not only a man of ability, but of much liberality. With Rev. Mr. Stebbins, whose sermons are full of the highest spirituality, overflowing with love and charity; Rev. Mr. Ijams, a bold, earnest, honest man, a good thinker and entertaining speaker; Rev. Mr. Carpenter, a liberal though not a profound man; Rev. Mr. Rexford. Rev. Mr. Dunn, and several others, the people of San Francisco are favored indeed. They are neither compelled to listen to the crudities of our popular debates on religious subjects, nor obliged to feed on the dry husks of "orthodox" theology; but are privileged to a choice between the teachings of a half dozen men who are as eminent for their scholarship as for their earnestness in reform.

SPIRIT MANIFESTATIONS.

The statements of Dr. Beard, with regard to the Eddy manifestations, have been denied by hundreds of persons present at the seances. A large number of papers have published denials from various correspondents. The Evening Post of this city gives extracts contradicting Beard. We copy a small portion as follows:

Dr. Beard's theory—and, in fact, the only supposable theory consistent with the belief that these manifestations are not what they purport to be—is that Wm. Eddy, with sudden changes of costume, represents all the spirits. Colonel Olcott says he first applied the test of measure, having made a height scale, and in a good light the spirits suffered themselves to be measured. Mr. Pritchard, a respectable and wealthy citizen of Albany, laying his cane over the head of each. He gives a table of measurements, varying from 6 feet 2½ inches in the case of the spirit Santum, to 4 feet in the case of Carrie Arnold. "Honto" measured 5 feet three inches. Colonel Olcott then procured one of Howe's standard scales, certified to be set true and in perfect order, and got Mr. Pritchard, before mentioned, to do the weighing. Honto weighed 88 pounds, but by request, made herself lighter, weighing the second time 58 pounds, and on third trial 65 pounds. Thus, without any change of clothing, and all within the space of ten minutes, this spirit, who weighed at the beginning at least 50 pounds less than any mortal woman of her size and height should weigh, reduced her materiality to the extent of 30 pounds, and, after holding it there several minutes, increased it 7 pounds. An affidavit, sworn to by Mr. Pritchard, is given, in which he corroborates all these statements. Colonel Olcott tells many other curious things, some of which, if correctly stated, destroy Dr. Beard's theories. In the light seance, guitars and musical instruments were held above the curtain and used, and hands wrote names and moved about in such ways as to prove conclusively that they did not belong to the medium, etc.

General Lippitt makes a statement, concerning the Katie King materializations in Philadelphia, in which he says:

The Doctor then produced six oranges, and began putting them into her hands, which she held out to receive. But all at once appeared several other pretty and delicate hands under hers, some of which evidently belonged to very little children. These eagerly grasped the oranges, securing three or four of them; when oranges and hands at once disappeared. Afterward Katie reappeared and handed out to Mrs. Holmes one of the oranges, and also a bouquet of palpably earthly flowers, but whence obtained no one knew.

Gen. Lippitt says: "All of the spirits, except Katie, had more or less a fixedness of look and immobility of features. This was even the case in some degree with John King while he was talking with us. Yet, if these were puppets, it is not easy to understand why they were not all made to look equally natural. And, as to Katie King, no one who saw her could be made for one moment to believe her to be a puppet. Unquestionably, if she were one, there has been no such creation since Prometheus' time, and the exhibition of her as such would alone suffice to secure to these mediums an ample fortune. Certain it is that she was either a young girl of living flesh and blood, or else a spirit clothed in what was real flesh and blood to all the senses. * * * I closely watched Katie King's countenance through an opera glass every time she appeared, and I invariably saw that, on her face being first visible, the eyes, as well as her other features, were perfectly natural and the Atlantic has an article from Robert Dale Owen, in which he argues that the spiritual phenomena are consistent with the idea of the universal reign of law. The Graphic is publishing long letters in reference to the Eddy manifestations, and one can hardly take up a first class Eastern newspaper or periodical without finding some reference to Spiritualism. This state of things calls for such investigations as will set the matter completely at rest. Men of the highest character and attainments should no longer hesitate at investigations which will be conclusive, for if Spiritualism is a humbug, it is certainly a growing humbug, and is humbugging a large number of people. If spirits can make their existence tangible to our senses, let us know it. If the whole thing is a fraud, it is time it were conclusively exposed.

The Chronicle says: "Whatever we may feel inclined to believe in regard to these marvellous narratives, apparently so well attested, one thing at least is clear, namely, that the time has at length arrived when the "phenomena" will engage the serious attention of men of science, and an earnest attempt to discover a purely natural and scientific solution of the mystery attending them will be made by persons qualified for the task."

"An attempt to discover a purely natural and scientific solution!" That would be like "discovering" the existence of man on this planet. Spiritualists have always contended that these manifestations are purely natural, and that they are scientific. Science is not something made by a few devotees of scientific investigation; it is the truth as manifested in nature, no matter who recognizes or refuses to recognize it. It is not limited to things we call material. Its domain is the universe, and its study embraces all the phenomena of nature.

The great difficulty in the way of the advancement of the spiritual theory among learned men has been mainly in the use of terms. The word Spiritualism has not clearly expressed what is meant by those who use it. Naturalism would be a much better word. Spirit, as used by Spiritualists, does not mean something in contra-distinction to matter. It is matter, and Spiritualists have always contended that there can be no manifestation of soul except through matter. A few men of acknowledged scientific attainments, refused, like Spencer, "from apriori reasons," to investigate anything claiming to be of a "spiritual" nature. Spirit, with them, was nothing; and "nothing" was not worthy of investigation. They arrogated to themselves the sole authority in matters scientific; and, although assured over and over again, that Spiritualists never claimed the existence of spirit apart from matter, yet they continued to treat the most important natural phenomena of this age with contempt. Truth, however, depends upon no man's opinion. It is truth which decides what science is, not men claiming to be scientific who decide what is truth. Men may assert time without end what the truth is in their estimation. That does not make it so; and Truth, in the end, asserts itself, overriding all human opinion, triumphing over all puny limitations.

"DELL DART, or Within the Meshes," is the title of a new story by Rowena Granice Steele, which she sells for fifty cents each. It is a California story, founded on facts.

in their appearance, the eyelids having all the appearance of those of a living person; but several times after her face had been a little longer visible than usual, the eyelids lost their mobility, the whites of the eyes became glassy and began to prolong themselves downward, looking like viscid masses about to roll down her cheeks. Of this change she always seemed to become suddenly conscious, hastily withdrawing her face from the window, at which, after a few moments, it would appear again with the eyes as natural as at first."

So well established have become the proofs of these manifestations, that the press of the country generally are treating them respectfully. The Rochester Democrat, in an editorial article, says:

What is this force or power? Does it really exist as thousands aver, or is it fraud or hallucination? The subject is agitating the public mind as never before, and the investigation will go on until some rational solution is reached. But the explanation of Dr. Beard, like the toe-snapping theory of the Burns, years ago, solves nothing; the weight of testimony is against them. Crookes, Wallace, Owen, Prof. Hare, and other scientific men investigated months and years before even venturing an opinion; but one seance is sufficient for Dr. Beard. Many persons admit the phenomena on investigation, but fail to adopt the spiritual hypothesis. They are looking for some new law or force in nature to account for all they see and hear. Let really intelligent and scientific men investigate and give an opinion, and the people will be glad to listen to them; but Dr. Beard's nine columns of egotism have not helped the matter.

The Chicago Times, in a lengthy article on the present aspects of Spiritualism, says:

Though the moderate phases of Spiritualism have been known and commented upon for over a quarter of a century, they have had a fair discussion in print only about two years. But the dailies, weeklies, monthlies and quarterlies of repute, in America and Europe, are vigorously making up for lost time. Robert Dale Owen has been at some pains to catalogue the prominent newspapers and magazines printed in the English tongue which have recently given fair mention of the Spiritualistic phenomena. A private letter from him shows that the list covers nearly every publication of any value or influence in this country and Great Britain. All of the great newspapers in New York, Philadelphia and London treat Spiritualism as they do other current topics; give impartial narrations of its effects, and candid comment as to its causes. The Atlantic Monthly, foremost of American magazines, has invited and accepted two articles upon the subject from Robert Dale Owen. The illustrated papers of the country are giving pictorial representations of "materialized" forms—"Katie King" and others. The London Fortnightly Review, an old established magazine, has published long essays upon the general subject. So, too, have London Society, the fashionable magazine of that metropolis; the Quarterly Journal of Science, and other favorite British periodicals.

The Evening Post of this city, compelled by the force of public opinion, gives facts for, as well as against, the spiritual theory, and says:

One thing is certain—these manifestations, or reputed manifestations, are attracting more attention now than ever before, and that from a higher class of observers. Two of our foremost magazines this month give considerable space to the believers in Spiritualism. The Galaxy has an account from General Lippitt, of the Holmes manifestations in Philadelphia—a portion of which we quote on another page,

DEBATE AT SOCIAL HALL.

The meetings of the Society for Self Culture continue to be well attended, and are, baring some crudities of thought, instructive and interesting. The music by Mrs. Morgan is of itself sufficient to attract an audience. On opening the meeting the President stated that the Society, when it went into the hall, was $51 in debt, but that the debt had been reduced to $27. He urged a liberal contribution, to clear off the debt, offering to give $5. Mr. Knight gave $2 50. The other sums were small, but nearly enough was raised to wipe out the debt.

Dr. John Allyn opened the discussion with a written essay. He was followed by Mr. Faber, who talked of the Bible, told in what self culture does not consist, and was just getting to the subject, when the gavel fell and Mr. Lundi took the stand, apparently for the purpose of declaring that there is no such thing as self culture.

Mrs. Ada Ballou, being invited to speak, briefly referred to the wandering from the subject of those who had preceded her, then said the first means of self culture is to learn how to think; how to trace causes to effects, and effects to causes; how to deduce correct conclusions from known facts; in short to learn the logic of thought. The great study of man is man. Take any individual, and after judging clearly as to his character, then trace back even through the lives of his ancestors to ascertain what produced certain characteristics. Consider not only the circumstances by which he has been surrounded, and his physical and mental organization, but his ante-natal condition, and the character and tendencies of his progenitors, then we are enabled to form an estimate of all the elements that entered into the formation of his character. In this way we can judge the best means for the culture of the human race, and measureably also of self culture.

Mr. Knight made a pleasant little speech to the effect that that course of conduct which results from a determination to make the most of yourself is self culture, no matter what it may be. We draw from every source, from every surrounding that which enters into and makes a part of ourselves.

Mr. Kenney made a rambling speech in which he asked many foolish questions about Spiritualism, all tending to show his utter ignorance of the subject. He wanted to know why the spirits did not help him build a stone wall at—not San Quentin, but some other place where the speaker was obliged to work for a living. He wanted to know why old Ben Franklin, when he materialized in New York, did not go down to the Astor House, and exhibit himself? why did not Lincoln go to Washington and visit the bloodthirsty villain who now disgraces the chair of State? [This language was deservedly hissed.] He wanted to know why the spirits did not stay materialized, and declared the "whole thing a humbug."

No one considered the speech worthy of reply, though Mrs. Ballou did remark that when Mr. Kenney desired to have the spirits pile stones for him, it was quite likely that the exercise was a benefit to him; that he needed physical culture then, just as it is evident that he needs mental culture now.

Mr. Klein preached a sermon on the fear of God, and Mr. Allyn closed with a short speech. Then Mr. Stetson was allowed three minutes, which he used by saying that the field for self culture is like a field for grass to grow. Let it alone and it will spring up spontaneously. The human soul sucks in inspiration from all its surroundings, and would unfold harmoniously if not cramped and warped by the bars and limitations which are thrown around it. What mankind needs, he said, is universal co-operation for mutual benefit. Look at an atom of matter as it floats in the air, and you see it at the mercy of every wind that blows; but aggregate such particles of matter, and you make a world, which swings in majesty through space, filling its appointed mission, obedient to law, one of the members of a universe of worlds, as we are members of the human race. Combined, we are a power, and have the means of endless advancement; disintegrated, we are weak, inefficient; and hindrances instead of helps to each other. Therefore, if we would progress, we must seek the advancement of the whole human race; must co-operate for the good of all; must be less self-seeking and more humanity-loving; must keep the mind and heart open to receive all the good that Nature, our bountiful mother, is ever ready to pour out to those who hold themselves in readiness to receive her gifts. The short speech of Mr. Stetson contained whole sermons in epitome. It was overflowing with suggestions; it had pith and vim, soul, sense and reason; but not one in ten heard it. He touched chords that should have found a response in every heart, yet scarce a soul was stirred. The sweetest music of the day fell on unattentive ears.

THE OVERLAND MONTHLY FOR DECEMBER.—This noble magazine has now reached the close of the thirteenth volume. It is a credit to the State, and has been mainly instrumental in making the literary reputations of several California celebrities, including Bret Harte, John Muir, Stephen Powers, Charles Warren Stoddard, Prentice Mulford, Joaquin Miller, Ina D. Coolbrith, and others. The articles in the present number are: "Violets and Violin Strings" (concluded); "Commercial Corporations;" "The Origin of Mineral Coal;" "In Santa Maria;" "Torcello," by Joaquin Miller; "The Cabin at Pharaoh's Ford;" "John Stuart Mill and Mrs. Taylor;" "Shacklefoot Sam;" "Studies in the Sierra," by John Muir; "Novarro;" "The California Indians," by Stephen Powers; "Bancroft's Native Races," by J. Ross Brown; "John Dobert;" "A Myth of Fantasy and First Love;" "Etc.;" "Current Literature." John H. Carman & Co., Publishers, San Francisco. Sent for $4 per year, postage prepaid.

For sale at this office—Allan Kardec's Book on Mediums, price $1.50; Col. Ingersoll's Lectures, price $2.; Heathens of the Heath, price $1.50; Startling Facts in Spiritualism, price $1.50; Jesse Butler's Poems, price $1.50 and $2.; Social Life, a Story for the Times, by Marion Todd, and various other works recently published.

AD INTERIM SOCIETY.

On Sunday morning last Dr. Pilkington read a portion of an essay on Free Agency. He was followed by Prof. Chaney, who denied that we are free, and also held that the name itself is a contradiction. An agent cannot be free; as soon as he becomes free he ceases to be an agent. He spoke at considerable length, and much to the gratification of the auditors, on faith and good works, holding that the whole philosophy of life consists in works.

Mrs. Hall made a few remarks on the necessity of better government and improved social conditions, holding that criminals are made such by society, by their own organization and the circumstances by which they are surrounded. The fundamental inquiry should be, "How can people be better born?"

Mr. Burns believed the term Free Agent to be a misnomer. No man can be really free. We are governed by circumstances, and until we arrive at a state where we can control the laws of nature, we must be governed by them, and consequently cannot be absolutely free. We are subject to law, and hemmed in on all sides by the limitations of nature.

Mrs. Hughes said, just in proportion as we grow spiritual so can we rise not superior to the law, but in power by making use of the law. Knowledge is the source of power. Brief remarks were made by various others, and the same subject will be considered again to-morrow morning, when Mr. Pilkington will conclude the reading of his essay.

BUTLER'S POEMS.—The following is a portion of the notice given by the Banner to the volume of poems by Jesse H. Butler of San Francisco:

The book is a wonder in these modern days of mere romance and sentimentalism, in that in it the author seeks to appeal to the home element—so much neglected in our times—which is inherent in all. His choicest inspirations are drawn from scenes of the fireside—although in the book matters historic and classic also claim limning from his pen—and it is refreshing to read a collection of versifications which has for its object the elevation of quiet pictures of life before the eye of the present generation, in place of the hurly-burly of passion, the rush of business, or the confusion of warfare.

Copies of this book may be obtained at this office. See advertisement on the first page.

E. P. Smith, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, has made his annual report on the condition of the various tribes, and recommends the continuance of the reservation and bounty policy. Isn't it about time for our Government to do away with this folly? Give each Indian 160 acres for cultivation, but not vast tracts for hunting grounds. The Indian territory should be open for public highways and for peaceful settlement. Let the Indians have all the rights belonging to white citizens, and no more. Then let them earn their living, or starve. This country belongs to civilization, and there is no more reason for surrendering any part of it to wild Indians than there is for giving it up to wild beasts.

AN EYE WITNESS.—Mrs. Laura Cuppy, on Sunday afternoon, gave her experience at Moravia, greatly to the satisfaction of her highly interested audience. She stated that she remained at the house of Mary Andrews, the medium, a month on her first visit, going again a few months subsequently. She saw large numbers of spirits, including that of her first husband, who was perfectly recognized. Even some little tricks of expression, which she had forgotten, were recalled. She was much affected by the interview, and what is more strange, he also: his lips quivered, and his eyes filled with tears. He spoke to her recalling memories of her youth, and slowly melted away before her sight. A number of other spirits came which she recognized, and there were hundreds recognized by other visitors.

The editor of the Boston Investigator, in one issue of his paper, admits that a piano was moved in his presence, with no other apparent contact than the hand of a medium resting on its top; but after witnessing this himself, he, the next week, publishes a statement made by some unknown person in Providence, that the medium moved the piano with her knees, and that a gentleman of Providence illustrated the manner of doing it, thus exposing the humbug. So it seems that the editor of the Investigator thinks more of the word of another person than he does of the testimony of his own senses in a case where the word denies and the senses affirm a fact which he wishes to confute. Furthermore, because one person moves a piano with his knees, why forsooth, that must be the way another person moves it. There's logic for you; and from an Investigator too!

VICTORIA WOODHULL, who has been seriously ill, in Philadelphia, is recovering, and has again gone to Europe. It is said she has been harrassed nearly to death's door by the slanders and persecutions of a Dr. —, a man who formerly assisted in the editorial department of the Weekly. Col. Blood is the mainstay of the paper, but in case of Victoria's death, it is doubtful whether he could sustain it. The public prejudice against it is very great, and hard to withstand; but if those who must condemn would but read it, they would soon learn that it contains more grand thoughts and important facts than any other journal in America. It deals in living truths, not ephemeral ideas and occurrences that have no bearing on the problems of life.

Some friends have called our attention to articles that have recently appeared in the Post favorable to Spiritualism, as proof that our strictures on that paper were undeserved. As the articles appeared after our criticisms were published we do not see that the fact proves anything. We know many friends of the Post who have protested against such manifest unfairness. Possibly that may account for the change of base. But no matter what may be the cause, we are glad to see the daily press beginning to treat Spiritualism with respect. It is a sign of growing intelligence on the part of the press as well as growing power in the ranks of Spiritualism.

MATERIALIZATION.

If there is any truth whatever in any of the various suppositions of materialization, then this truth means that the day of the resurrection is approaching. Not that single day of twenty-four hours, in which God by voice shall call forth those who have done good to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil to the resurrection of damnation, but a period, an age, in which this is to be done by the voice of God working in natural ways and by natural laws. There is a germ of truth in every doctrine that persists in the minds of the race, age after age. From time immemorial an idea of some form of resurrection has found place in the minds of a large proportion of the race, each individual, perhaps, having it in some different form; but it was, and is, resurrection at last—the reappearance of the spirit rehabilitated in garments of flesh. Accepting this idea and applying that of the phenomena of materialization, it is easy to conclude really what the resurrection means, and how it is to come about. So, then, Spiritualists and all others who believe that there has been or that there may be a materialization of a single spirit for the space of a single second, must necessarily believe that when there are proper and perfect conditions the reappearance may be permanent, because materialization is not undertaken by spirits merely to satisfy mortals that spirit existence is a fact; it is to bring about great and radical changes in affairs and their manner of conduct in both spheres; it is to bring to earth the government of heaven; it is to make humanity like the angels in heaven, who neither marry nor are given in marriage; and finally to unite heaven and earth in the millennium.—Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly.

The last number of the eighth volume of The Journal of Speculative Philosophy, published in St. Louis, contains several articles of much thought and research. Professor Tyndall is severely handled both by a contributor, Thomas Davidson, and the editor, Wm. T. Harris. Davidson, who does not discuss the bearing of Tyndall's address on religion, but confines his criticism to questions of historic fact, shows that Tyndall borrowed most of his ideas, and that he makes great mistakes. He concludes his criticism as follows: "While, therefore, I entirely sympathize with Prof. Tyndall in his manly and determined opposition to dogma and authority, and in his demand for the free and unprejudiced discussion of all questions, I cannot but be sorry that he has diminished the weight of his own authority, and thus injured a cause which is that of all earnest truth-seekers, by trying to draw conclusions in regions of thought where he is an entire stranger, and by being thus entrapped into making a display of carelessness in regard to matters of fact and of incapacity to grasp philosophic truth."

It was the old Puritan custom to make ministers of pious boys and educate the tricky, lying reprobate for a lawyer. And if there was one too lazy to work or study he turned out a merchant. To this day we are following that same example, and reaping the bitter fruits of this mistaken policy. As a nation we have gradually given up to the lawyer every place of honor or trust within the gift of the people. Presidents, Governors, Secretaries, Senators and Congressmen! Nineteen in twenty are lawyers, and to-day there is not five men in Congress practically identified with the farming community. Scarcely inferior to the lawyer are some of the merchants, traders and money changers of our country. Would to God, the teacher of men would again drive them from the temple of holiness.—Alfred Taylor.

BRIEF EXTRACTS.

Nathaniel Hawthorne, who was not a teetotaler, says, in his English Note Book: "Brewers' draymen are allowed to drink as much of their masters' beverage as they like, and they grow very brawny and corpulent, resembling their own horses in size, and presenting, one would suppose, perfect pictures of physical comfort and well being. But the least bruise, or even the hurt of a finger, is liable to turn to gangrene or erysipelas, and become fatal."

Thomas Davidson, a materialistic philosopher, who writes for the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, says: "Alfred R. Wallace, whose reputation as a naturalist is almost equal to that of Darwin, and who is as much entitled to be called the discoverer of the Darwinian theory as Darwin himself, has come to be a believer in Spiritualism on grounds entirely illogical." This is Mr. Carpenter's opinion, but facts are what must decide, when philosophers disagree.

Nelson Holmes, one of the mediums of the Holmes family, Philadelphia, says the most virulent opposition they have met with has been from other spiritual mediums. He denies that any "expose" took place while visiting at Blissfield, though he says the house was nightly surrounded by a mob, who played all sorts of tricks, among others pretending to catch the spirit, a boy in girl's clothing. All the pretended exposures occurred outside the house, and had really no connection with the mediums.

How any body can believe in the spirit-life and not pour all his or her energies into channels for reforming and making the world better, is an anomaly which is utterly incomprehensible to us, * * yet that class of Spiritualists who regard Spiritualism as phenomenal facts, from which no conclusions are to be drawn or deduced other than that spirits exist, and, under proper circumstances, do communicate, rest upon that fact satisfied, while the vice and miseries of the world are let alone to run rampant through the race.—Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly.

Prof. Huxley has been relating the case of a French soldier whose left parietal bone was fractured by a ball received in battle. The paralysis which ensued has now passed away, and the Frenchman now leads two lives—normal and abnormal. In the former he has full possession of his faculties and is eminently honest; in the latter, while the appearances are much the same, he has only the sense of touch in a state of activity, and steals with all the activity of the most obdurate kleptomaniac. The normal life lasts about twenty-seven days each month, and lapses suddenly into the abnormal, which holds during the remaining days.

"The exclusive pretension, long set up by theology, to dominate the whole field of knowledge, seems now to have simply passed over to the material sciences." This spirit of dogma—born of self-sufficiency and intellectual narrowness, and producing the appropriate fruits of scorn and intolerance—may be expected to exhibit the same repulsive features in all ages. History, too, may be expected to repeat itself in this as in other matters. The theologians were so blind that they could see nothing but worry and disturbance in Galileo's tubes and glasses; and Professor Tyndall is hardly to be blamed if he can see no more in tilting tables and spirit-photographs. But there is a curious irony of fate in its selection of a distinguished physicist of our own day to dance unconsciously to the same tune as the persecutors of Galileo unconsciously danced to three centuries ago. One would never have anticipated that the dogmatic spirit had been driven from the camp of theology, only to find a home in the camp of science.—James Martineau.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO.

FAUST'S STUDY. [Faust enters with the dog,]

FAUST—Deep shades of evening now are thronging
O'er field and meadow till day breaks;
With holy horror, mixed with longing.
In us the better soul awakes;
All wild desires within us sleeping,
With every fierce, unruly deed,
The love of man awake is keeping
In us the love of God indeed.

Be quiet, doggie, run not thus around,
What do you snuffle at beside the door sill?
Behind my stove lie quiet on the ground,
Here's my best cushion if you like the floors ill.
For since out on the hill, in freedom's riot,
You've pleased us with your springing and your speed,
A welcome guest if you'll be only quiet,
I'll pet you kindly in your houseless need.

Ah! when once more in one's snug study
The friendly lamp sheds cheers rich wealth,
So in one's breast hope's gleam glows ruddy,
If the heart really knows itself.
Prudence once more begins to advise us,
And hope again begins to bud,
With joy towards life's stream we raise us,
Aye! to the sources of life's flood.

Growl not, my doggie, from the heavenly music,
Which now holds captive every feeling,
Thy brutish voice the concord stealing;
Men sneer we know at all that's new, stick
Not to murmur at the beautiful
And good, to which they're so undutiful;
Do dogs, too, growl at all that's fair and healing?

Alas! I feel now, spite most earnest wishes,
Content no longer thro' my bosom gushes;
But why should fount so sweet so soon run dry,
And we waste yet in thirst's expectancy?
Of this I've had experience sufficient;
Yet 'tis a want that we may soon renourish;
We learn the supernatural to cherish,
We long for Revelation's light omniscient,
Which nowhere burns with such a glorious flame
As in the gospel's page—tale worth its fame!
I feel a longing its foundation text
Once more to open, and with reverence meek
To translate honestly the sacred Greek
Into my darling German, noblest language next.

[He opens the New Testament and begins to read.]

"In the beginning was the Word," I here find writ—
Here am I stuck, who'll help me fathom it?
Impossible to rate the "Word" so high—
I must translate it otherwise, I'll try.
If by the spirits "help the sense I've caught
Written it stands—that's it no doubt—the Thought:
Bethink you well, I pray, of that first line,
Let not your pen race o'er those words divine.
Is it then Thought that all things works? Of course
It ought to read, meeseems, far better—Force!
Yet whilst I write this down I feel a hint
That I shall never stand by it in print;
The spirit aids with counsel, 'twas our paction,
I see my way, and write contented—Action.

[For Common Sense.]

MYSTERIOUS DREAMS.

What are these dark, mysterious dreams,
That o'er our brain as vapors play?
Realities they often seem—
Sometimes they're sad, and sometimes gay.
Whence come they, whither do they go—
These silent atoms of the air?
Who can answer—ah, who can know
What's passing by us everywhere?
We dream of life, of love and power,
In every varied form.
They come and go, and change each hour,
As floating ideas newly born.
Ah! is it that around us wave
Echoes from the further shore,
To sport upon the brain and give
The newest light from over there?
Or do they bode of things to be,
Or those that are past and gone,
As floating echoes of the sea
Of thought, from every human form?

TO SPIRITUALISTS AND FREE THINKERS.

It is now more than six months since the first issue of this paper, during which time we hoped to be able to obtain a paying list of subscribers. There has been a gradual increase, and we have every reason to hope that, in time, the circulation may be so extended as to pay the expense of publication; but candor compels us to avow that it is yet far from that point. To prevent the failure of the enterprise, the original proprietors were compelled to form a Joint Stock Association, by means of which the paper has been sustained; and if the friends of Free Thought will take an interest in extending our circulation, it can soon be placed not only beyond all danger of failure, but in a condition so prosperous that the paper may be enlarged and otherwise improved.

The need of such a Journal on this coast is beyond question. If liberal ideas on religious subjects could find expression in our daily press; if reports of lectures and discussions by Free Thinkers received as much attention as is accorded to the sermons of the "orthodox," there would be less occasion for a Journal of this kind; but every reader knows that it is the interest of the secular press to ignore or misrepresent Spiritualism and what is called Infidelity. The advocates of Rational Religion can find no hearing except from their own platforms, and through their own press.

We again earnestly request our friends to aid us, not for our sakes, but for the sake of the cause we represent. Buy a little stock in the Company, even if it is no more than five dollars, and send us the names of new subscribers wherever they can be obtained. We cannot afford to send agents all over the State. What is wanted is an active worker for the cause in each county. If we had only one such friend in each county our success would be assured.

We desire also to obtain the address of persons to whom we can mail specimen numbers of the paper free of charge. Send us the names of those who are known to hold Liberal opinions, and who might possibly subscribe if they knew of the existence of such a Journal. In this way more can be done in three months to extend a knowledge of the paper among the people than would be accomplished in a year of unaided effort by the publishers. Who will send us the first list? No matter if you send the names of some who are already subscribers. That will do no harm, while every additional name may do good.

Do not make the excuse that COMMON SENSE is not as large as the BANNER OF LIBERTY. Of course it is not; it is yet in its infancy, but it fills a place on this coast that the BANNER cannot fill, and in time it may be as large, and in every way as worthy of support. The BANNER, the RELIGIO, the INDEX, the INVESTIGATOR and the TRUTH SEEKER are all good, each in its place, but none of them occupy the field, nor can they fill the place, of this Journal.

Signs of the Times.

Rev. Dr. Bartol has written to the Graphic commending a thorough investigation of spiritualistic phenomena.

Liebig the chemist proved that oatmeal is nearly as nutritious as beef, and that it is richer than wheaten bread in the elements that go to form bone and muscle.

The ladies of New York have generally ceased carrying their purses in their hands while walking in the street, so many have had them snatched from by thieves.

The public debt of New York city is $150,000,000, and there is nothing to show for it but the public buildings, worth at the most $20,000,000.

John Keyser, of New York, who owns a tract of land near Aiken, S. C., has given a large portion for a colony for the benefit of poor emigrants.

Beecher and his counsel are still fighting to postpone the suit brought against him by Tilton. The last decision in the case is that Tilton must furnish a "bill of particulars."

Twelve States have adopted compulsory education laws: New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Kentucky, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Michigan, Kansas, Texas, Nevada, California, and New York.

The rapid decline of Christianity in England is attributed mainly to the influence of Spiritualism and the opinions of men of science. It is believed that Spiritualism will in time result in a scientific religion.

In an Omaha street fight a rough was mortally stabbed by a fellow of his own kind. When asked who his assailant was, the dying man replied: "D'y'e think there's anything mean about me? He was a square boy, and I ain't a-going to squeal on him."

Some of the wealthy and highly respectable people of New York petition the Police Commissioners to order closed all theatres and concert saloons on Sunday evening. The clown at Talmadge's church may continue to exhibit as usual.

Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly assumes that the only means now left for the salvation of the Republican party is a declaration in favor of woman suffrage. Whatever party gives to woman the franchise will be the dominant party in this nation for a quarter of a century.

Rev. John P. Newman, of the Methodist church, a blatherskite of the first order, but a favorite of Grant, is still travelling in Europe on a pleasure trip at the expense of the U. S. Treasury, and is engaged in purchasing out of his stealings a stock of fancy goods, for sale on his return. Thirty thousand dollars worth of his shipments have been seized in New York for non-payment of duties.

Egg-carriers, made from California tule grass, are said to be the best means of egg packing yet discovered.

The Unitarian Review for November contains a valuable article by S. R. Calthrop on Religion and Science. Mr. Calthrop is a thorough evolutionist, but applies the doctrine to religious facts and forms.

The Laramie Sentinel says the ballot for women in Wyoming has worked admirably. Formerly riots were common on election day, and corruption in politics was the rule. Now there is peace, and what is better, honesty.

Prof. Tyndall maintains that typhoid fever is transmitted and propagated solely by matter that has been in contact with a typhoid patient, and never from decaying animal and vegetable matter. But this does not render proper drainage and ventilation any the less important.

There is said to be a Treasurer of a manufacturing company in New England who receives $50,000 per year salary. The workmen probably do not average $500 per year. This one man receives as much for handling money as one hundred workmen get for handling the material by which the money is made.

Mr. Conway says the English radicals represent a definitely religious movement, though widely differing in opinion, and that there is nothing like an equal amount of character, learning, and ability, enlisted in defending Christianity against them.

Mr. Frothingham has written a letter on the Sunday amusement question, which just now attracts unusual attention, which he closes in this common-sense way: Our Sunday is too precious to be sacrificed either to the "world, the flesh, and the devil," on the one side, or to theology and the church on the other. It belongs to man, humanity, to culture, intelligence, the refreshment and invigoration of the rational faculties, and to the instrumentalities by which they are reached.

The President's recommendation, that the country return to specie payments, is a good one, but the proposed repeal of the legal-tender act, giving up to banks the issue of the circulating medium, is merely a proposition to play into the hands of the monied men of the nation. The issue of money, or its representative, is no part of legitimate banking; that power should belong to the Government alone, which could thereby save the interest on at least $600,000,000, and could also save the value of notes lost, or destroyed by fire, an item which alone counts up a million or so each year. The bankers and brokers own this Government, from the President down.

WE ARE MILLIONS.

So says the Rev. Mr. Platt in his effort to "lift the pall from millions of bewildered and solemnized hearts." The concession is generous, and has a pleasing effect on the doubting soul who has never heard his case brought up in the pulpit bar, only in derision and mockery; it has seldom been conceded in the pulpit that there were honest doubters of the soul's immortality and the existence of God, but says the eloquent pastor, We are Millions.

It is truly a noble endeavor, that of attempting to answer in the affirmative "the soul's most solemn question, If a man die shall he live again?" The most skeptical have, at times, longed with eagerness beyond description for a realization of a certainty of a future life where the loves and hopes of the heart arise from graves of anguish and sorrow; and who can paint the disappointments in all their sinking weariness, when the troubled soul has listened to dry theologic assertion, commanding faith where hope was losing ground, and left the edifice doubting more than ever.

But here is a change! Science is drafted into theological service. Neither Peter nor Paul, nor even Jesus, is reiterated in our ears with arguments stale and useless to the honest doubter, but Science, in its most modern and advanced enfoldments, is placed upon the witness stand in favor of immortality. The scientific capital in the argument is the doctrine of Evolution, the Conservation and Correlation of Forces, and Eternal Progression. If the argument has been understood by one of the "millions," it is as follows: As everything has come into existence by progressive development, through the agency of the conservation and correlation of forces, which have been demonstrated to be indestructible, and that the mind, unlike other forces, is "individual, unabsorbable," and therefore cannot be destroyed, but must remain forever obedient to the universal law of eternal progression, so "surely, if the universally admitted principle of science be that the inferior impersonal force of the soul cannot be lost, how much stronger is the certainty that the supreme, individualized personal force of the soul cannot be destroyed, but must live on, and forever, as soul!"

Now this is very pleasing to the skeptic, and might be satisfactory were he sure of one or two assumptions made. One is, that matter does not influence mind, or that mind-force is incontrovertible into an impersonal force; the other is, the doctrine of eternal progression. Most writers when treating on this subject, forget that there is an eternity to the past as well as the future. A beginning is assumed, evolution has a beginning in the chaos of atom and molecules, but, once begun, scientists know of no power that can stay the eternal progress of things evolved. Forces are not only indestructible but they cannot be created. If it be true that once a force always a force, it is also true that once a force it has always been a force. It is a necessary truth that eternal things must in themselves be perfect, or at least incapable of improvement, whatever their qualities may be they must be immutable in them all.

Forces being uncreated, what becomes of the doctrine of eternal progression, for eternal things cannot progress. If they who imagine eternal progression possible will only reflect for a while on its correlative doctrine, the eternal retrogression of the past, he will not dream of the eternal progression of the future. For if all things are to progress eternally in the future, they must have been always progressing in the eternal past. If one past eternity has been spent in making us and our world what we are, what is there to hope for in the future eternity? The whole thing is absurd. Eternal progression is a contradiction in terms and can never be logically true. But it is also true that existence proves the eternity of that existence. Matter and its forces being in existence, must always have been in existence, and will always be in existence. There is a logical necessity in admitting that no force, not even mental force, can be destroyed, but neither can it be created.

If the mental thought which pens this article will be in existence a century hence, which may easily be admitted if not proved, then it must have been in existence a century ago—an eternity ago. Not as a progressive force or agency, but as a productive force. And what is the produce of force? Birth, growth, maturity, decay, death and dissolution. We know of nothing else by either reason, experience or analogy. Forms change continually, but the principles underlying those changes are unchangeable because they are eternal. Forms are evanescent because they are not eternal, but had a beginning and must have an end. We are forms, organizations subject to the same law, and must be dissolved, and return to where we were and what we were, but the principle which makes us men and women in our inception is eternal, never had a beginning nor will it ever have an end. In this sense we are immortal, but so is a mosquito. The thought producing power which governs our actions can never die, but will identity, as we know it, survive our dissolution? As we do not remember the past eternity of our existence, is there any likelihood that our organic memory will be continued after disorganization?

ATOMS OF THOUGHT.

BY L. D. S.

Justice to self is justice to all. Conjugal love is the life-giving principle. It not only gives life to the child, but it is the vivifying element to men and women. It is the life of life. As the spring sun vivifies the seed, so conjugal love vivifies the seed of good in the soul. When husband and wife do not grow better in every sense of the word, then they have not real conjugal love.

The perfume of a flower alters the face of the universe. Our experiences are the mile stones which tell how we are progressing on the journey of life. Facts are recorded long before a recognition of their bearings is possible. All things grow into recognition. First realization of facts, then realizations of the bearings of facts. The intellect, the spiritual and moral natures should keep time in their development. When two souls recognize each other it needs no priest to bind them. When true love binds two souls God himself cannot put them asunder. Life is the principle of matter.

SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCE.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM THE SPIRIT OF A PERSON STILL LIVING.

It was in the summer of 1852, on our ranche among the foothills, that I made my first attempt to hold communication with friends on the other side. Those were lonesome days for women, long enough removed from old associations to feel a deathly need of sympathy. The country swarmed with men, and often months would elapse without the rancher's wife seeing one woman. It is not to be wondered at therefore that, cut off from communion with friends in the body, I should eagerly have seized on this newly invented method of getting news from those dear friends who had passed to the other shore. The first "circle" was composed of my husband, one hired man and myself. Jack Barlow, the hired man, was an English sailor, under twenty-five, an honest, industrious, good hearted, illiterate fellow, whose cross was signed to an agreement with my husband to work for him on his ranche for one year at the rate of $60 per month. His name and very evident good character were all we knew of him.

It did seem such a farce for a grown woman to be engaged in such a performance as this, that I begged to be allowed to repeat the letters mentally, while Mr. X. and the man kept their hands on the table. This being agreed to, the table at once began to tip in response to certain letters, and this was spelled,

MARY PETERSON.

Mental question by me.—Friend of mine?Ans.—No.Ques.—Friend of Jack?Ans.—Sister.Ques.—Married?Ans.—No.

"It is no use," I said impatiently. "It's nothing but lies. Here's a woman professes to be Jack's sister; says her name is Mary Peterson, and she is not married. Now, of course, if she were not married her name must be Barlow."

"No, ma'am," said Jack with some hesitation, "she is my sister."

"Well, but your name is Barlow," urged Mr. X.

"No, sir," replied Jack, without looking up, "my name is Peterson, Jack Peterson; I ran away from a whale ship, sir, and I was afraid they'd be after me."

"Oh, pshaw!" said X., "nobody's going to trouble you. Stick to your own name. You're all right." [This he did, and afterwards married by it, and has a large family of Petersons.]

This being settled, and silence secured, the table tipped out what follows:

"I have a child, a girl, seven years old; I want Jack to get her."

Ques.—Where is she?

Ans.—In Mole street, in — England; a bad place. He must take her away.

"Is there a street called 'Mole street' in — England?" I asked Jack.

"Yes, ma'am, and it's the worst street in the town."

"Did your sister have a child, Jack?"

(It was a pretty difficult task to ask this question.)

"Yes, ma'am, she did."

"How old would the child be now?"

Jack stopped, meditated a little, and checking off the years on his five fingers replied,

"She must be in her eighth year now, ma'am."

I explained that she wished him to take the child away from her evil surroundings.

"Tell her I'll send fifty dollars next month and have her taken out of that house, and in the fall I'll go and fetch her here."

Here the sitting closed. Every few days after this, in hopes of getting word from our own friends, we sat at the table, and each time the name "Mary Peterson" would be spelled out. Being tired of this we dropped the thing for several weeks. On the next trial Mary Peterson came to say that her little girl was very ill with brain fever, and she did not believe she would recover. In a few days she said she was dead.

"Was she with herself?" I asked. Ans.—No.

I then wrote a guarded letter to Jack's parents at —, England, asking after the health of the sister and her child, and in reply was told that the child had died at the time, and as described, but that the mother had married an English soldier. ["Women of the town" are the only ones who are willing to marry a man who is paid but sixpence a day beside his board and clothes.]

We could only conclude that Mary Peterson (whose soul doubtless was as pure as seed wheat, and whose mother love suffered as she realized her child's evil surroundings,) had, in a trance, or in sleep, slipped her bark, so to speak, and sought to get her brother's assistance. Q. X.

[Why not conclude that some spirit friend of Jack had assumed the sister's name?]

MERRIT C. MOREY.

A letter from Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith in relation to the funeral ceremonies of Mr. Morey, was received too late for insertion last week. In it she corrects the statement that the funeral address was given by her, and says:

The funeral address was pronounced by Mrs. Eliza Howe McKinley, and was merely supplemented by myself with a few remarks. I may add that the occasion was rendered peculiarly affecting from the fact that Mr. Morey's daughter, Mrs. Sproul, so favorably known as a medium to the San Francisco public, has sustained a bereavement rendered more severe from the singularly pure and gentle character of her father, the tender and absorbing nature of the love he bore her, in common with his other daughters, and her absence from all relatives and near friends in this her trial hour. Surely all kind and true souls will cluster around our excellent sister in her loneliness, and by their sympathy soothe, if they cannot assuage, her sorrow, for though for her Faith is lost in sight and Hope in certainty, she cannot but mourn the loss of the physical presence so dear to her.

ASTROLOGY—NO. 3.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

ASTROLOGICAL DESCRIPTIONS AND PREDICTIONS.

Almost all persons suppose that Astrology teaches that we are "governed by the stars," that is, the man born under Mars is of a fiery, warlike nature, for no other reason than because so born. This a grave error, committed first in malice by the enemies of the science, but transmitted and kept alive through ignorance. It is true that two persons born at the same moment will be much alike, and subject to a similar fatality. Take, for instance, the case of a man born at the same time as George III, described in the Spectator as a "wonderful coincidence."

This man belonged to the laboring class, but rose a little above the rank of his brothers and sisters by beginning the business of a grocer on the same day that George was crowned king. The two men were much alike in disposition, but differently described by their contemporaries, for when the king had an odd fit, the courtiers call it "insanity," whereas in the grocer, similarly affected, it was called "meanness." This idiosyncrasy prevails even at present, for I observed in New York city that when Auguste Belmont drank so much brandy that his legs doubled up and allowed him to sprawl out on the sidewalk, the millionaire was sent home in a carriage, and next morning the papers would contain sympathetic notices on account of "Mr. Belmont having been taken suddenly ill;" yet if the same thing happened to a poor laboring man, the guardians of the law would beat him with their clubs, send him to the station house on a dray, and the next morning the papers would say he had been drunk. In like manner the king was crazy, but the grocer was mean.

Both king and grocer married on the same day; their wives were the same type of women, allowing for the difference in rank; their fortunate and unfortunate periods were similar, and finally both men died on the same day. In this Addison recognized only coincidence, but the Astrologer recognizes law.

Blame not the stars for what we are, for they are no more responsible than the finger board which reads "five miles to Joppa." The finger board merely indicates a fact that another cause has determined. In like manner the stars only indicate facts that other causes have produced. Ante-natal conditions have made us what we are, and like a finger board, the stars merely point out our attributes, peculiarities and characteristics. To accomplish this, Nature must possess infinite intelligence, noting every event in the universe, interested equally with an atom as a world. To this infinite intelligence must be added infinite power and infinite presence. Or, to state the proposition theologically, she must possess omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence. All scientists and philosophers admit this proposition in substance, if not in words. Hence the conclusion is inevitable that Nature possesses the ability to vary the period of gestation, by hastening or retarding it, in order that a child may be born at a time when the celetial monitors will indicate exactly what manner of being it is. I go further; I maintain that it cannot be born at any other time without shaking that grand philosophical structure which has been reared upon the basis that law is fixed and eternal.

If the factors are 4 and 6, the product must be 24. But if the factors are only 2 and 3, not even the Christian's God can make the product more than 6. In like manner the conditions of two parents at the period of conception, represented by the figures 2 and 3, can no more expect their offspring to be the equal of a child born from parents whose conditions would be represented by the figures 4 and 6 at the time of conception. God Almighty himself could not make these two children equal. Hence they will not be born at the same time, even though conceived at the same instant. The books record well authenticated cases where there has been a difference of more than three months in the period of gestation. Was this chance? The philosopher must answer in the negative. Then why this difference? There must be a cause, for no event is straggling. My explanation furnishes an answer, and I challenge the savans to dispute my conclusions in a public debate.

When corn has been planted, not all the Gods of pagans and Christians, not even Nature herself, can change the crop to one of potatoes. So, too, where a child has been conceived, both parents being Asiatic, God could not cause a Caucasian child to be born, because it would be in violation of law. In like manner, where the conditions of the parents are such that a thief or murderer has been conceived, God cannot change the conditions so that anything but a thief or murderer can be born. But God, or more properly Nature, can do this: Write "thief," or "murderer," as the case may be, all over the head, and body, and limbs of the unborn child. We know this to be true. Phrenology proves it; physiology corroborates it, and comparative anatomy demonstrates it. I go farther. Not only is the unborn child thus marked and labelled by the hand of Nature, but foreseeing the future, she causes the birth to occur at a time when her celestial watchmen are pointing out the exact character that will be unfolded. There is no more difficulty in accepting this proposition than there is in admitting that Nature stamps the character upon the brow and body.

The stars, then, must be considered as the indicators of the sort of persons born, and not as the causes. So, too, in the happening of events: Fortunate and unfortunate periods, the transits, directions, parallels, etc., of the planets do not cause the changes and vicissitudes of life, but simply indicate them. Therefore, even when we know in advance of an evil period, we can no more change it than the mariner can avert the storm which his barometer admonishes him is approaching. The most he can do is to take in sail, and in every way be prepared for it. And thus it is with the Astrologer, or the person for whom the Astrologer calculates the future. Foreseeing or pointing out the evil period simply affords opportunity to prepare for it. But in our weakness of judgment, very often the means which we employ for our protection culminate in our destruction. The same may occur also with the mariner. Nevertheless I consider it equally important in both cases to know the future, for I have observed many cases where persons have profited by knowing of the approach of both good and evil periods.

JESUS CHRIST AND MONTEZUMA EXPECTED DAILY.

The last time set by the Second Adventists for the appearance of Jesus in the clouds of heaven—the twenty-second of August, 1874—has passed safely. No sound of “the last trumpet,”—no “flaming fire”—no call of “come ye blessed.” But the Adventists are not discouraged. With a persistency and hopefulness worthy of a better cause, they still watch for his appearing soon—whether it be “at midnight or at cock-crowing, or in the morning.”

What a strange and humiliating fact it is, that thousands and tens of thousands of Americans, in the last half of the nineteenth century, educated in our common schools and higher educational institutions, and apparently possessed of ordinary intelligence, should be found day after day, bending under the weight of this singular superstition—watching for “the resurrection morn,” and listening with eagerness for the sound of his coming who, as they idly fancy, will lift them up to reign with him forever! There is a similar superstition among the Aztec Indians of New Mexico, and it is curious to see how close, in many respects, is the likeness between the features of this particular religious dogma, as seen among these semi-savages, and the civilized and comparatively educated Adventists of the United States.

James Roann Reed, in the third chapter of his interesting account of his recent “Rambles” through that southern region, says of the Aztecs:

“Their religion is a simple and confiding faith in the appearance of a great King or Saviour—Montezuma—who they believe will appear at some future time to lead his chosen people to great spiritual and temporal honors. He will come, so they believe, just as the rising sun darts his first rays from the far East, and will be mounted on a white horse of incredible speed. Each night a solitary guard is mounted, whose duty it is to watch for the first gray tokens of the dawning, and sound a roaring note should Montezuma be discovered approaching, so that he shall not find his people asleep. Their respect for the name of Montezuma is very great, and they cannot bear any slighting allusions to him.” However absurd “their affections for their hero-god,” Mr. Reed says it was evidently extremely sincere and “deep-rooted,” and nothing evidently was further from their mind than that their worship of Montezuma and their fond anticipation of his personal coming and reign was a gross idolatry and silly superstition.

How exactly this is true of those among us who are looking daily for the advent of the man-god, Jesus, I need not say, nor how forcibly we are reminded by this account of the watching and waiting continually kept up by our neighbors, the millennial Christians, for the personal coming of the bridegroom—for the white horse which John saw in prophetic vision, and “him that sat upon it,” whose “eyes were as a flame of fire and on his head many crowns.”

But the difference in this superstitious worship of Jesus

Christ and Montezuma is in this: in New Mexico, among the Aztecs, Montezuma is worshipped and looked for by all; in the more enlightened United States, the worshippers of Jesus, and lookers for his second advent, though somewhat numerous, are yet a very small minority.

HUSBAND CATCHING.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—I thought perhaps bits of sub-lunary matters, interspersed among the dignified and meritorious articles in COMMON SENSE, might claim some one's notice by their very audacity in gaining admission into thoughtful literature. It was very impolite and ungentlemanly in Deacon Jones' pup to waltz with the kitten in prayer time, but that act immortalized the deacon's whole family. Without flattering myself that I shall ever attain notoriety equal to theirs, I will proceed to tell you of a woman who has lately been publicly airing her opinions on “woman's duty.” She thinks the chief end of woman is the pursuit of a husband: in her own words, “Girls should be educated to think that marriage is necessary to the highest enjoyment of life.” Then after they get a husband they must stay at home and take care of him, because their refined and sensitive natures would be bruised in battling in the busy haunts of the world. It is evident that she is newly married, and perhaps after years of battling with her husband and children, her “sensitive nature” may be toned down, so, that if poverty or misfortune should come upon them, she might assist her husband pecuniarily in whatever direction her talent might lie.

All honor to the thousands of women who to-day are filling lucrative positions of trust and usefulness, and thousands of others who are qualifying themselves by the pursuit of science, literature and art, to do with their might whatever their hand findeth to do in the varied and busy walks of life; and let those who have no higher aspirations bury their one talent in a napkin as soon as they have been successful in husband catching. RUSTIC.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—I don't care to say much on this subject. It is unnecessary. Give Woman pecuniary independence of Man, and no more will be required. Her intuitions will do the rest. It will be done in the best way also, which will be woman's way. I know one way at least in which she will not do it—marrying for a home, or daily bread.

But how is a woman to become pecuniarily independent of Man? Give her equal pay for equal work. Make it equally honorable for her to engage in all legitimate enterprises. As to what she is best adapted, let her decide that by her intuitions also. As to being or continuing to be a helpmate for man, she can be that also. Have I the right key.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOOUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, DEC. 12, 1874.

MISS R. AUGUSTA WHITING, a distinguished Inspirational Speaker from the East, will speak at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union, to-morrow (Sunday) afternoon and evening, at 2 and 7½ o'clock. Subject of afternoon lecture, "The Mission of Unrest;" evening, "Death the Angel of Life." E. H. F. MACKINLEY, PRES.

Do not fail to read the interesting and instructive article on Astrology, by Prof. Chaney, on page 366.

Those of our readers who failed to hear the orator, Dr. P. B. Randolph, on Sunday last, must be sure to go to Dashaway Hall to-morrow, Sunday, afternoon. He sways an audience like a reed in the wind.

MRS. ADDIE BALLOU.—This lady gave an admirable address before the Self Culturists, on Sunday last. She is still in the city, waiting for engagements in the interior. Societies desiring an able and eloquent speaker can address her, Box 666, San Francisco.

The Exhibition by the Children's Progressive Lyceum, on Monday evening, was the most successful yet given by the school. The performance was highly creditable to all who took part in it, and two or three of the young ladies surprised their friends by exhibiting a degree of dramatic talent not suspected.

There seems to be no lack just now of Radical speakers in California. Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith has taken up her residence in San Francisco for the winter. Miss Jennie Leys is in one of the Southern countries. Mr. York is in Santa Barbara. Mrs. Addie Ballou is in this city at present, and Miss Augusta Whiting has just commenced a course of lectures before the Spiritualists' Union. At its close, about the first of January, the latter will go to any part of the State where her services may be required.

It gives us pleasure to announce that Mr. Brittan will continue the publication of the Quarterly Journal of Spiritual Science, which commences its third year in January, with better prospects than heretofore, the circulation being larger and the legitimate income of the Journal considerably increased. Our readers who desire to obtain one of the best of Spiritual publications can obtain what they wish and at the same time aid the good cause, by sending $3 to S. B. Brittain, Box 3806, New York City.

MISS AUGUSTA WHITING

This lady commenced a course of lectures in the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union, on Sunday last. Her first sentence, on Sunday evening, was this: "We claim for Spiritualism all of truth which has come to humanity from any source whatever." She then proceeded to give some reasons for the assertion that Spiritualism has during the last quarter of a century exerted greater moral power than all the teachings of all the theologies of mankind, from the earliest ages. We give, in our own language, the substance of her remarks as follows: The doctrine of individual responsibility, taught by Spiritualism, is adapted to a higher state of morality than the world has ever known. Spiritualism has kindled the beacon lights of thought on many an eminence where skepticism had built its stronghold; and has awakened new life in many a soul sunk in the bonds of superstition. It has shown its moral power in its ability to stand against all opposition, and in sending out its messages of joy and encouragement in every direction, cheering many a sorrowing heart and attacking evil wherever met, no matter how deeply entrenched in the very ground work of society.

These were the main ideas of her discourse, though not the words used. They are gems culled from a heap of rubbish—the few bright thoughts separated from a dreary hour-and-a-half of platitudes.

Miss Whiting is a sister of the late A. B. Whiting, who, as an inspirational speaker, stood, perhaps, second to none in America. Many who knew him personally or by reputation, and who went to hear his sister with expectations heightened by the memory of his eloquence, were very much disappointed. Her discourse in the evening contained very little that was new to her intelligent audience, which included at least one dozen persons capable of making a better address without any preparation whatever. The lecture, in fact, was very poor, both in matter and manner. It is with much regret that we feel compelled to say this. It may seem cruel; but it is the truth, and we think it better that one person shall suffer, than that the community at large be deceived. Pecuniarily it is the Society that will suffer. Miss Whiting is under engagement and will be paid, as it is right that she should be; but it is not right to deceive our readers as to the qualifications of any speaker. She is, no doubt, an estimable woman. We have never heard a word against her personally, but much in her favor; and this fact makes our duty as a teller of the truth still more painful. We would gladly aid her in any work she is fitted to perform, but she can never fit herself for the rostrum, for so entirely does she lack natural qualifications that no practise can ever overcome her deficiencies. She has no personal magnetism, but stands before her audience like an image of brass, awaking no human interest, appealing to no human sympathy, the force of her utterances so broken by the barrier between her and her hearers that her choicest words fall lifeless on the ear.

It is possible this notice will raise up friends in her behalf; as there are people ever ready to call truth persecution, turning upon the one who utters it as if he were guilty of a crime. There are also some who will have the curiosity to hear a speaker who is so thoroughly unfit for her profession; therefore we shall look for a larger audience than usual to-morrow, and we sincerely hope that some kind spirit may so inspire her with eloquence, as to make all that is here written appear to be untrue.

PROF. CHANEY ON ROMANISM.

The lecture by Prof. Chaney last Saturday evening, at the hall of the Y. M. C. A., was well attended, and listened to with much interest. He commenced by declaring himself the friend of civil and religious liberty, but having no affiliation with any sect of religionists, he could not be accused of bigotry or fanaticism in his opposition to Romanism, which is based entirely upon political considerations. The forms and ceremonies of the Romish Church were thousands of years older than the Church itself. An extract from the Bhagvat Geeta was read, showing that the Brahmins of India, more than three thousand years before the Christian era, had the rosary and counted the beads in a manner similar to the papists of today. The letters I H S were explained to have been of Greek origin and therefore pagan.

The writings of the early Christian fathers were read and criticised. Constantine was shown to have been a most cold blooded murderer, who, after having murdered his wife's father, the husbands of his two sisters, his nephew, his wife, his own son, and a few others, went to a pagan priest to confess and obtain absolution, but before he had finished his bloody recital the priest turned from him in horror, declaring that for such as him there could be no forgiveness. A Catholic priest hearing of the matter sent word to Constantine that "the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin." This was the kind of a priest that Constantine wanted. This event led to his embracing Christianity, and subsequently, like a good Catholic, he caused Sopator, the pagan priest who refused to shrine him, to be put to death. Such was the character of the most eminent man, or rather monster, who aided in founding Romanism.

The lecturer showed that the Roman Catholic Church was begun in fraud, lying and deception, and that it has held its own to the present day. He quoted from Mosheim, proving that the early church fathers held that it was not only justifiable but commendable to lie and deceive, if by so doing the Church could be benefitted. Catholics might swear falsely against Protestants, and it would be right, and pleasing in the sight of God, while to kill an excommunicated person was held to be no murder. The papists of today not only adhere to these horrible dogmas, but they claim infallibility for the Pope, looking to him as above all law, state or national, and therefore ready to commit high treason, or any other crime, at the bidding of the Pope or his understrappers. Hence, Romanism is a dangerous political element in any free country. Instead of being elated, the speaker was alarmed at the recent Democratic victories, for although they rebuked the corruption in the Republican party, yet they brought in power a still more dangerous combination, the Democratic party having long since surrendered itself to the dictation of the Romish Church. He said if people could be aroused, there would be no danger; but if not, then a few, a very few, might wake up some morning to a scene of horror too awful for contemplation.

Want of space prevents anything like a report of the lecture, which was listened to with marked attention, eliciting frequent and earnest applause. It was evident to all that a crisis has been reached in the history of Romanism, and that we are upon the eve of an important era, either for weal or for woe.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION.

We have received several communications on the Social Question, which we decline to publish, for the reason that the subject is not treated in a style suitable for publication in a family paper. Correspondents have already had great latitude on this subject. We have no objection to the most radical treatment of the question, but it should be done philosophically, and without grossness. The subject can be discussed in an inoffensive, and yet thorough manner, by those who are capable of properly treating it, and we are not disposed to give space to any who are not.

We would be very glad to publish instructive articles on Stirpiculture, but it seems almost impossible to obtain anything on this and kindred topics free from objectionable phraseology. The subject is second to none in importance; it is deserving of earnest study, but in a family paper little more can be done than to urge its investigation, without entering into particulars. The details seem better fitted for books and private lectures than for the columns of a reform journal.

We are not at all squeamish, but if a journal for the people is to accomplish any good, it must be made so acceptable to the people that it will meet with support.

Harry Grannice, a young man of 25, residing in Merced, Cal., on the 7th inst., shot and killed Edward Madden, editor of the Merced Tribune, in consequence of an intimation in the Tribune that Rowena Grannice Steele, mother of the assassin, is familiar with houses of ill fame, she having alluded to them in a small work recently published by her. The deed, which was committed in a very cowardly manner, was the result of false notions of pride and honor held by young Grannice. If what Madden wrote was true, killing him did not prove it false; and if false he injured himself more than he did her by publishing it. "Two wrongs never make one right."

We are glad to learn our Friends at Charter Oak Hall last Tuesday evening had an interesting time. Short appropriate speeches were made by Prof. Chaney, and Mrs. J. A. Logan. The vocal and instrumental music by Mrs. Dean Clarke and others, was fine. Miss Maud Richards gave some splendid tests. Other mediums aided in the enlightenment of investigators, and it was a very harmonious and satisfactory meeting. We hope that on next Tuesday evening the Hall will be filled.

A LETTER FROM S. B. BRITTAN.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—The following brief editorial paragraph—in your issue of October 24th—without some qualification or explanation is likely to lead to a misapprehension of the facts in the case:

It has never been so much as intimated by the undersigned, either publicly or privately, that he had expended an “entire fortune in endeavors to establish his Quarterly Journal.” The Circular recently printed, with the names of some twenty distinguished ladies attached, gives no warrant for such a conclusion. It briefly recites the facts, that, “by successive misfortunes,” I had lost every thing I possessed; and that inasmuch as the JOURNAL is not a financial success, it was proposed to aid in defraying the necessary expenses of its publication, as one would subscribe for a Course of Lectures, a public Reading Room, a School House, or a Pulpit Minister. Instead of any such statement of the facts, in your summary notice, I am myself presented as an object of charity, whose claims are of so little consequence that they are disposed of in five lines. As a rule I like to take COMMON SENSE views of things, but must regard this as an exceptional case. You will, therefore, indulge me in a brief statement and a very different construction of the facts.

The truth is when I projected the Quarterly I possessed property valued at over $25,000 above every incumbrance and all indebtedness; but in the course of the year I lost everything, including the house that was the property of my wife. Having commenced the publication of the JOURNAL I was unwilling to abandon the enterprise, and thus disappoint the expectations of its friends. By the personal sacrifices of two Ladies in New Jersey and the generous assistance of one noble Man in Connecticut, I have been enabled to continue its publication in spite of the adverse state of the times, and other discouraging circumstances which I will not mention in this connection. It has now reached the termination of the Second Volume. During these two years the subscriptions have not equalled the actual cash expenses by some $2,500, which fact suggests the questions, Are we a reading people, and do we care to improve the periodical and other literature of Spiritualism? Shall we furnish occupation to the scoffers by our persistent neglect to honor a great cause, and to properly recognize the instrumentalities of its progress?

I do not propose to trouble the public with the details of my personal and family misfortunes, since I ask nothing for myself. It is unseemly even for a public man, to force his private griefs upon others. These are often of so delicate, painful, and sacred a character, as to indispose a man of ordinary sensibilities to offer them as themes for careless commentaries and ungracious reflections.

With your permission I will define the position I would occupy before your readers. Know, then, that I am not an applicant for charity, since I can labor with my hands. If, then, any one flatters himself that he is making personal sacrifices to support me—when he subscribes three dollars for a magazine that will compare most favorably with any four or five dollar quarterly in the country—I beg of him to restrain his sympathies, keep his money, and leave the JOURNAL and its editor to the chances of life or death. On the contrary, whoever is broad enough to see the subject in its proper light, and all who are generous enough to be willing to share my responsibilities in the work of sending out such a minister to plead with men for the truth's sake, are cordially invited to follow their convictions of duty by their most zealous co-operation in the further prosecution of this work. The churches pay for millions of Bibles, and scatter them broadcast over the world. They supply Public Libraries, Reading Rooms, Marine and Merchant Ships, the inmates of Hospitals, Asylums and Prisons. Why should not Spiritualists do the same? Is their gospel not worth having; or is it so good that they must keep it all to themselves? We yet wait for such practical answers to these questions as we shall not be ashamed to see recorded in the history we are unconsciously making. Sooner or later the day of judgment comes to every people, and in the full and impartial view of that record we shall be tried by posterity.

Yours respectfully,

S. B. BRITTAN.

QUESTIONS FOR ANSWER.—The Spiritual Scientist asks the following questions:

1. In what respect, and to what extent, does the action of a disembodied spirit upon our organism differ from that of an embodied spirit?
2. Under what natural laws, and in what manner, do disembodied spirits act upon inanimate matter?
3. If emanations from our body are necessary for certain manifestations, how do they contribute to the result?
4. Can embodied spirits act upon inanimate matter in the same way, and if not, why not?
5. In what respect does the vision of a conscious medium differ from that of other persons?
6. Can this state of vision be produced, and how?

We would be glad to have persons friendly to COMMON SENSE furnish us with articles on these or kindred subjects.

THE November number of the Camp News, sent to us by our friend J. S. Heald, contains an editorial declaration that the “Patriotic Order Sons of America,” of which it is the organ, cannot include any who do not believe in a God, and a personal God at that. No one can be admitted who does not accept the Bible as the divinely inspired “Word of God.” Furthermore, the editor says the Order is opposed to the removal of the Bible from the public schools. This looks as if the Order instead of being “the friend of every true principle of American liberty,” as it professes, is really the enemy of religious freedom, and in the trying times soon to come, it will be a dangerous institution. What has our friend Heald to say to this?

STUMBLING BLOCKS.

The following is a brief sketch of a lecture recently given before the Spiritualists' Union in this city by Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith:

The speaker first referred to the blocks put in the way of human progress by the church, which she said has a mortgage on the youthful and the feminine intellect of America. Women are in bondage to priestcraft; it is still considered respectable to belong to the church; it is a good advertisement for business men, and husbands and fathers concede to wives and daughters when requests are made for pecuniary aid to build up the church.

The public institutions of the country, as a general rule, are under the dominion of priests. Many of the prisons and hospitals have orthodox chaplains. In Massachusetts prisons Liberal tracts are not allowed, and Liberal speakers are not permitted to offer consolation to the accused. The prisoners are told that they are conceived in sin and nurtured in iniquity, and they have no hope of reformation. Human goodness is characterized as a "filthy rag," and no hope held out except through faith in Jesus. Humanity, she said, cannot rise so long as belief in the innate depravity of man prevails. This doctrine, which inculcates an utter faithlessness in humanity, is the most dangerous ever taught. It stands in the way of human progress everywhere.

Mrs. Smith spoke of the degradation and want which are found in our great cities, under the very shadow of Christian churches; of the great value of church property and its exemption from taxation, and of the immense revenues of Trinity Church of New York City, much of it derived from the rents received by the church from liquor dealers and keepers of dens of licentiousness. It has large revenues from vice and crime, yet does nothing to mitigate the sufferings of the poor. Last winter she was in New York when there was so much suffering among the destitute, many of whom died of hunger and cold. She wished to see the doors of Trinity broken in, fires built in its furnaces, and the poor invited to enter for warmth and shelter. The "House of God" should be a house for humanity: but the religion preached and practiced in the churches is a sham, a bitter mockery.

The Young Men's Christian Association, another stumbling block, is purchasing large lots of land all over the country, erecting little houses on them, enough to exempt the property from taxation, and then begging for means to build. As soon as money enough can be obtained from the people for this purpose they will rent the portion not used by them, and have an income, from which in time they will become wealthy, and a power in the land.

Wherever Free Thought attempts to rise, the Christian church tries to strangle it at its birth. The speaker said she has no quarrel with the church, but is opposed to the shams and pretences of these people in the name of Christianity. Christ denounced such hypocrites when on earth, and should a second Christ appear the Christians would be the first to cry "crucify him." She advised parents to keep their children from attending orthodox Sabbath schools, where they have the shackles of superstition fastened upon them.

She then spoke of the stumbling blocks to progress put in the way by Spiritualists, who fear the cause will be injured by the advocacy of unpopular reforms. They are fearful of public opinion, and wish to make Spiritualism eminently respectable, consequently they deprecate what they call "side issues." All who follow such teachers are in danger of worshipping an issue more than the truth. Spiritualism must be large enough to embrace all of humanity; if not, the speaker preferred to be called a humanitarian. Spiritualism properly represents every phase of reform. It means a great deal more than mere phenomena. Phenomena will be valuable, so long as skepticism exists, but it can never take the place of spirituality and love of humanity.

Spiritualism is the open door to vast possibilities. It embraces every subject that pertains to the life of man, here and hereafter. It is a living, practical faith, not a mere belief in something which has no bearing on our every day life and conduct. How can any Spiritualist consistently say this or that subject shall not be discussed on a spiritual platform? Spirits are daily leaving this world in all stages of development. They need our help as much as we do theirs. How can a medium be prevented from expressing the views of whatever spirit may take control? Such repression is in direct opposition to the fundamental doctrines of true Spiritualism. To talk of side issues in Spiritualism is to talk nonsense. Everything that concerns the welfare of humanity belongs to Spiritualism, which is or should be the science of life. The social question cannot be ignored. It is an important consideration in the problem, "What is right living?" Mrs. Smith here considered the meaning separately of the two words Freedom and Love, one the greatest means of progression, the other the divinest attribute of humanity, yet, united they have become the synonym for all that is vile. She is not prepared to surrender her right and duty to discuss such a theme. "As to the opinion of the world," she said, "I count it nothing in comparison with my own sense of right and the approval of my own conscience. The remaining years of my life are devoted to humanity; and if the Spiritualists deny me a platform I'll take a door step. I will never cater to a debauched public opinion."

"The day is coming," she said, "when the broken ranks of Spiritualists will be called upon to unite with Liberalists of all kinds, against the common enemy."

She urged the necessity of greater earnestness in the prosecution of all works of reform. We need a prison reform in this country, and a reform in the administration of justice in our courts; we need a reform in the treatment of the poor and degraded classes; we need a reform in our judgments of acts which concern the sexes, that one sex may not be condemned and outlawed for that which in the other is not esteemed a crime. We need a reform, too, in our treatment of discharged convicts, that they may be raised out of their evil courses, instead of forced to remain in them by our uncharitable treatment.

Pictures of the summer land may be very pleasant for some Spiritualists to contemplate, but many who look forward to the delights of a heavenly life will be grievously disappointed. So long as sorrow and misery continues in this world, so long will their counterparts exist in the world to come. So long as miserable, degraded souls leave this life, for another, so long will there be misery and degradation in the lower spheres of spirit life, and the only way to make our fancied heaven a place of real bliss is to get rid of the evils that weigh us down here. The pictures sometimes drawn before you of the joys of heaven are but the relics of orthodoxy; the same old book with a new cover; they are the fanciful features of a false theology—the old seven-by-nine heaven of our antiquated churches. It is time for Spiritualists to outgrow such nonsense as this, and look life, as it is, sternly in the face, ready to bear its burdens, and do what can be done to improve it.

Col. Higginson says the advocates for Woman Suffrage may have a thousand defeats and grow stronger every time. The day of victory will come at last because truth is sure to succeed in the end.

MATERIALIZATIONS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

On Tuesday of last week, Harry George, editor of the Evening Post, attended a seance at the house of Mr. Pearson, and on the following day gave in the Post an account reflecting on the honesty of Mrs. Sawyer, and ridiculing the believers in her mediumship. On Friday evening the editors of COMMON SENSE were present at a seance at the same place, and on Saturday morning the writer took to Mr. George the following letter, thinking he would be willing to give both sides a hearing, but publication was refused on the ground that it would be advertising a fraud. Our readers can judge for themselves :

Edm. Post : Last evening I attended a seance at No. 111 Ellis street, the medium being Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, who recently arrived here from the East. I had been informed that she came here "to make money," and being suspicious of one who I was told had no higher object than that, I determined to see her, and, if I found her a fraud, to declare her such. I procured a place on the Committee acting with Dr. Horn. We examined the small room where the medium sat, locked the side door leading to an adjoining room, and I also tied a rope securely around the knob, and thence around the bedstead, so the door could not be opened. This door opened into a room occupied by an old personal friend, a lady I have known many years, and whose word is perfectly reliable. She assured me after the seance, that she had sat in the room during the entire evening. There was, therefore, no mode by which assistance could reach the medium. Dr. Horn tied Mrs. Sawyer, and I added a few knots, putting the rope over the chair back. Soon after retiring from the room, various musical instruments which we had left out of the medium's reach were played, and several hands were exhibited at the opening in the door. I then went in with Dr. Horn, and finding that the rope I had placed around the chair back had been slipped off, I tied it down to one of the rounds with another cord, and knotted it in a peculiar manner. After further manifestations, the rope was thrown against the door, it having been unfastened, thus destroying the test. I declared my dissatisfaction at the result, and was invited to tie the medium again, but declined, stating that I would prefer to sit in the cabinet with her. This was granted, and three of us went in, and so arranged our hands that no one could move without the others knowing it. The medium sat close by, securely fastened, and, having her head against the shoulder of a lady, one of the three invited to go in. It was utterly impossible for the medium to make any movement without notice. During the time we sat there our hands, heads, and faces were repeatedly touched by hands, some of which were small and velvety, some large, hard and bony ; some were warm, some cold, and voices were heard differing entirely from that of the medium, and several feet distant from her. The musical instruments were floated around the room, playing, meanwhile, and sometimes hit our heads, and thumped against the wall. We also saw little balls of light that danced in front of our eyes, not two feet distant. We retired from the room, and others took our places, with similar results. Afterwards hands and arms were again exhibited at the opening in the door, and a bouquet was lifted by one of the hands and taken inside. This hand and arm had a waxen appearance ; it was much whiter than the medium's, smaller, and more graceful in form. But the most satisfactory test to me was the fact that, for a single moment, it rested outside the curtain, after the curtain itself had fallen to its place, proving clearly it was not attached to a body.

Faces appeared only two or three times during the evening, and were indistinct ; none of them were recognized. They had a phosphorescent appearance, as did also most of the hands. Only the hand which seized the bouquet had the appearance of flesh, and that was waxlike. The medium was not well, and the circle itself was not harmonious ; the ill feeling being caused mainly by attempts to check the remarks of those who came to investigate.

At the close of the seance, and almost instantly after the exhibition of a bare arm at the window, I found the medium so securely tied that it required ten minutes hard work for me to unfasten the knots. On the ropes there were encircled a number of iron rings, of various sizes, and a chair had also been fastened by the ropes through the rounds, and tied so tight that the medium could not move without pain. Each hand was tied separately, in the center of the rope, so securely that it was impossible to slip them out ; then the rope was run through the rings and the chair, and fastened behind her back, in a manner impossible for her to accomplish with her hands so tied in front. After taking off the rope there was left a deep indentation entirely encircling each wrist, showing that it was not the pressure of her hands on the rope that caused it, but the tightness of the rope itself.

There are many circumstances omitted here, through fear of making this communication too lengthy, but I must add that if all were minutely related, it would be clearly seen that it requires a great deal more credulity to believe that this woman performed all that was done, than it does to believe that the manifestations actually are what they purport to be. If she can speak in the various tones we heard, and as if coming from a point distant from her, she is the very best living ventriloquist, and could earn more money with less abuse than she now receives, by assuming ventriloquism as a profession. And if she can exhibit a bare arm at the window, and then in an instant be found in the back part of the room, tied with dozens of double knots around her wrists and body, and her hands discolored from the stoppage of circulation, she would throw Blitz in the shade as a slight-of-hand performer.

Respectfully,

W. N. SLOCUM.

San Francisco, December 5.

The following letter was placed in type for last week's paper, but in the hurry of "making up," it was accidentally omitted :

On Sunday evening, the 29th ult., as no public notice had been given, there were but five persons present. The room in which the medium sat was small, containing a bed, table and chair. The room was examined by those who desired, and found to contain no machinery of any kind. In this "cabinet" the medium took her seat unfastened. About two minutes after the door was closed the spirit voice of Maud, the little Indian girl, was heard, saying "Good evening folks, how do you do?" Soon a manly voice was heard to say : "Open the door." It was opened, and we found that the medium was securely tied around both wrists, and the rope extended around her waist and tied to the chair behind. But a few moments before we had seen the medium sitting in the chair untied. The door was again closed, the guitar was played, bells were rung, the guitar was put through the opening and hung upon the shelf. Then hands, of various sizes, and arms, some of them complete to the shoulder, were thrust through the aperture, the index finger often pointing to those outside for whom it was intended. The arm of Achsa Sprague (so announced by Elan, the controlling spirit,) was laid upon the shelf in such a manner as to prove that it was attached to no mortal. Fifty or more arms and hands appeared. Then came faces, twenty-five or thirty; none of the spirits, however, were able to speak. Relatives and friends of all present appeared, and were announced as such by Elan or Maud. Numbers of tests were given, three of the spectators, the writer among the number, were called into the cabinet, when, being seated at the table with the medium, with our hands placed alternately on top of each other, the guitar was played, floating in the air, placed upon our heads, etc.; our hands were shaken, foreheads patted, etc. All this time the medium was firmly tied and apparently in a trance state.

On Tuesday evening the writer was present at another seance, held by the same medium, when there were twenty-two persons present. A committee was chosen, and the test conditions were very strict. Nearly all the phenomena appeared as on Sunday evening, but less in quantity, and no faces were exhibited. The medium was afflicted with a severe cold. Mrs. S. holds her seances at present at 111 Ellis street, but will soon remove to more commodious quarters.

THE NEW SCRIPTURES, ACCORDING TO TYNDALL, HUXLEY, SPENCER AND DARWIN.

GENESIS--CHAPTER 1.

1. Primarily the Unknowable moved upon cosmos and evolved protoplasm.

2. And protoplasm was inorganic and undifferentiated, containing all things in potential energy; and a spirit of evolution moved upon the fluid mass.

3. And the Unknowable said, Let atoms attract; and their contact begat light, heat and electricity.

4. And the Unconditioned differentiated the atoms, each after its kind; and their combinations begat rock, air and water.

5. And there went out a spirit of evolution from the unconditioned, and working in protoplasm, by accretion and absorption, produced the organic cell.

6. And cell by nutrition evolved primordial germ, and germ developed protogene; and protogene begat eozoon, and eozoon begat monad, and monad begat animalcule.

7. And animalcule begat ephemera; then began creeping things to multiply on the face of the earth.

8. And earthly atom in vegetable protoplasm begat the molecule, and thence came all grass and every herb in the earth.

9. And animalcule in the water evolved fins, tails, claws and scales; and in the air wings and beaks, and on the land they sprouted such organs as were necessary, as played upon by the environment.

10. And by accretion and absorption came the radiata and mollusca, and mollusca begat articulata, and articulata begat vertebrata.

11. Now these are the generations of the higher vertebrata, and in the cosmic period that the Unknowable evolved the bipedal mammalia.

12. And every man on the earth, while he was yet a monkey, and every horse while he was yet a hipparion, before was an oredon.

13. Out of the ascidian came the amphibian and begat the pentadactyle; and the pentadactyle by inheritance and selection produced the hylobate, from which are the simiade in all their tribes.

14. And out of the simiade the Lemur prevailed above his fellows and produced the platyrrhine monkey.

15. And the platyrrhine begat the catarrhine; and the catarrhine monkey begat the anthropoid ape, and the ape begat the longimanous orang, and the orang begat the chimpanzee, and the chimpanzee evolved the what-is-it.

16. And the what-is-it went into the land of Nod and took him a wife of the longimanous gibbons.

17. And in process of the cosmic period were born unto them and their children the anthropomorphic primordial types.

18. The homunculus, the prognathus, the troglodyte, the autochthon, the terragen; these are the generations of primeval man.

19. And primeval man was naked and not ashamed, but lived in quadrumanous innocence, and struggled mightily to harmonize with the environment.

20. And by inheritance and natural selection did he progress from the stable and homogeneous to the complex and heterogeneous; for the weakest died and the strongest grew and multiplied.

21. And man grew a thumb for that he had need of it, and developed capacities for prey.

22. For, behold, the swiftest men caught the most animals, and the swiftest animals got away from the most men; wherefore the slow animals were eaten and the slow men starved to death.

23. And as the types were differentiated the weaker types continually disappeared.

24. And the earth was filled with violence; for man strove with man, and tribe with tribe, whereby they killed off the weak and foolish and secured the survival of the fittest.

Madame Blavatsky, closes a letter in relation to the Eddy family as follows:

"On the last night that I spent with the Eddys I was presented by George Dix and Mayflower with a silver decoration, the upper part of a medal with which I was but too familiar. I quote the precise words of the spirit. 'We bring you this decoration, for we think you will value it more highly than anything else. You shall recognize it, for it is the badge of honor that was presented to your father by his Government for the campaign of 1828, between Russia and Turkey. We got it through the influence of your uncle, who appeared to you here this evening. We brought it from your father's grave at Stavropol. You shall identify it by a certain sign known to yourself.' These words were spoken in the presence of forty witnesses. I have the decoration in my possession. I know it as having belonged to my father. More, I have identified it by a portion that, through carelessness, I broke myself many years ago; and, to settle all doubt in relation to it, I possess the photograph of my father—a picture that has never been at the Eddys, and could never possibly have been seen by any of them—on which this medal is plainly visible."

The Vigilance Committee of Truckee had all orders issued by the Committee signed 601. D. B. Frink, one of their number, editor of the Truckee Republican, was accidentally shot by one of his brother Vigilantes, while endeavoring to capture some "roughs" in a hotel. By a singular coincidence it has been found that the petition for letters of administration on Frink's estate is registered No. 601 in the Probate Court.

Simeon Lester, on whose farm, in Westchester, New York, the body of Thomas Paine was buried, says the body was taken to England forty years ago. The monument which was erected near its former resting place, remains undisturbed.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO*

If I'm to share my room with thee,
My dog, please cease that symphony;
Such a companion, ever growling,
Near me, I never could endure;
One of us two I'm sure
Must now be shown the door;
Unwillingly I here retract my welcome,
Here's open door, my friend, come quit the cell, come!
Ah! what do I behold?
Can this be natural? Hold!
Is this some shadow, or reality?
Is doggie swelling in his animality?
He lifts himself with power;
This is no dog's shape that I see, I'm sure;
Why what grim spectre have I brought in thus?
He looks now like a hippopotamus!
With fiery eyes, and horrible fanged mouth,
Ah, you are he in sooth!
For halfbred hellhounds such as this,
Solomon's key were good I wis!

[SPIRITS. In the passage singing.]

Within there one is caught,
Stay within all, follow not,
As cunning fox in cruel trap
Mourns this hell lynx his luckless hap.
But take you care,
Hover hither, hover thither
Upwards, sideways, downwards, either,
And he has escaped the snare.
Can you but aid him,
Leave him not fading
In his close prison;
Since he's given all of us,
Both great and small of us,
Many a lesson.

FAUST.—To exorcise him first, I'll speak o'er
That potent old spell of the four.
Salamander, glow burning,
Undine, do you flow out,
Sylph do you go out
Kobold shall bestir him.

Who doth not know
The elements flow,
Peculiar power,
And properties dower
No Lordship inherits
Over the spirits.

Burn away to ashes, Salamander,
Flow together rushing, Undine,
Shine in meteor flashes, Sylphs,
Bring your sweeping brush in,
Incubus, Incubus,
Step forth now, be revealed to us.

None of these four
Make the beast sore,
He still lies quite quiet, and grins in my face,
I have not yet touched one hair of his grace.
I'll yet try his patience
With worse oburgations;
Art thou—thus at ease—
One of hell's refugees?
Then look on this emblem (holding up the cross)
Before which they bend them
Those black troops below.

With bristling hair it swells up now!

Abandoned being,
This emblem seeing,
Dost recognise,
Its meaning wise,
The underived son,
The unspoken Word,
Through all the heavens poured,
The wickedly pierced one.

Behind my oven crouched it lies
Swelling to elephantine size,
It's spreading fast thro' all my room,
It will disperse in vapors soon:
Rise not to the roof I bid,
Crouch at thy master's feet when chid,
Thou seest I threaten not in vain,
To scorch thee with holy fire, I'm fain;
Await thou not the threefold glowing light
Await thou not my strongest oburgation's might.

[Enter Mephistopheles, who, as the mist falls, steps from behind the stove, dressed as a traveling school divine.]

MEPHISTO.—What would my Lord? Why all this profanation?

FAUST.—This was the kernel of my doggie then?

A traveling divine, the joke provokes a smile.

MEPHISTO.—I bow before you, wisest of wise men,

You certainly have made me sweat awhile.

FAUST.—How are you called?

MEPHISTO.—Meseems the question's small

For one who treats the Word with such contempt,

Who, caring naught for semblances at all,

Would but the search for essences attempt.

FAUST.—Well, you fine gentlemen full often date your

Ognomens altogether from your nature;

Where such is all too plainly pictured, when

As Liar, Fly-god, Snake, you're known to men.

MEPHISTO.—Part of that force

Which ever wills the bad, yet must do good per force!

FAUST.—What by this riddle would you fain disclose?

MEPHISTO.—I am the spirit destined to oppose,
And rightly too, since all that may arise
Is worthy of the shock by which it dies:
'Twere better perhaps nothing at all were made.
Thus are those forces which by you are said
To be but evil, demolition, sin;
The very elements I reveal in.

FRATERNAL LOVE.

BY JESSEE H. BUTLER.

Fraternal Love! visible sign
Of the pure heart! In that rich mine
Lie treasures twinkling like the stars!
That jewel in the hand of Mars,
That won fair Venus from her seat!
And placed the goddess at his feet!
Thou priceless pearl! O, could we see
This sad, sad world striving for thee!
Thou purest One! to thy fond breast,
God's little ones were fondly prest;
The sisters' cries, the widows' tears,
Moistened thine eyes; thy listening ears
Drank in the sorrowing tide which flows
From human wrongs and human woes;
And thy kind lips dropped gentlest dew,
To mould the human heart anew.

How long, thou laboring world, how long
Ere the full harmony of song,
Shall flow and echo, far and wide,
Like Earth's free air and Ocean's tide?
O! never yet, since angels sang
That loving song, "Good will to Man!"
Has the grand chorus echoed back
Its music through the starry track.

How long, O God! before thy plan
Shall give a brotherhood to man?
Make all Earth's sons thy chosen race;
Fraternal love on every face;
And brothers' woes, and brothers' tears,
Find none but sympathizing ears!
When hoarded millions cease to rise
To vex the Holy One? whose eyes—

Pass them not by (the haughty crew),
Whose proud eyes lifted, scarcely view
The toiling millions, without hope,
Mid the oppressor's hordes, to cope
Successful for life's common boon;
And the wide world hath scarcely room
To give each son a tranquil spot,
For lucre blights the common lot.

[From "Home, Femme Heroic and Miscellaneous Poems."

Religious forms, and codes of state,
Do not avert the common fate;
The ermine and the sacred gown
Bring not the promised blessing down;
For that upholds the ancient way,
And this must please the rich and gay;
One talketh learnedly and long;
The other whines, and winks at wrong.
Both bound by custom, lucre, place,
To feed and fatten on the race;
Both teach contentment, thus to bind
The burdens tighter on mankind;
Both flatter, with a visor'd face;
Both wink at wrong, and boast of grace;
While one doth wield the oppressor's rod,
The other thunders like a God!

The sacred canon passeth by
The "postern of a needle's eye;"
And Dives smiling, looks around
Where Lazarus crawls upon the ground;
While mansions, tall and stately, rise
For rich men, 'neath the smiling skies,
The poor must still, as ever, wait
With dogs, around the rich man's gate.

Ye bards of free and fearless verse!
Who dare the wrongs of man rehearse,
(For Freedom, since the ancient time,
Hath dwelt among the sacred Nine);
Raise your bold numbers, and proclaim
Your burden!—like the ancient flame
That burneth ever warm and bright
With sons of song.—"The human right!"

Freedom and love, and holy song,
Shall yet redress each human wrong;
Religion, reason, justice, yet
Shall bound to pride and lucre set;
And in this world of busy strife
Shall the great boon of human life
Be fetterless, and Man shall see
In each a Brother, just and free!

Signs of the Times.

Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet has had a very large sale. One hundred and sixteen thousand copies were printed, and nearly all have been disposed of.

The physician of Brittan's Quarterly, having read with great care Frances Rose Mackinley's "Psyche," says the author is sick and recommends low diet and cold baths.

Wm. H. Harrison, of the London Spiritualist, proposes to issue an illustrated Spiritual monthly, provided subscribers sufficient to pay expenses can be obtained.

Congressman Storm, of Pennsylvania, proposes to amend the constitution so as to make the Presidential term six years, and render the President ineligible for re-election.

The manner in which the word "fabulous" is used by California newspapers will soon change the meaning of the word. It is a favorite in California talk, but is not used in its proper sense once in a hundred times.

Reverend Wm. Gill, an orthodox clergyman, has just published a book in exposition and defense of Evolution and Progress. It is a remarkable work to come from such a source, and is another indication of the change which is taking place in the public mind in, as well as out of, the church.

President Barnard, of Columbia College, predicts that the metric system of weights and measures will be in use throughout the civilized world before the year 1900. It is already used throughout Europe, except in England and Scandinavia, and throughout America, excepting Canada and the United States.

Forty New Orleans school girls left the High school last week because of an attempt to admit colored girls to the graduating class. They were willing the dark skinned girls should go through the lower grades, but there must be a line drawn somewhere, otherwise one of the Dinahs might come out at the head of the first class, and that would be awful. It would be disgusting, so it would.

The Golden Age says, "The scientific discoveries of the last fifty years have accumulated so fast that it has been impossible to co-ordinate them in any coherent system of religious philosophy, and minds have been dazzled and overwhelmed by the rapid accession of light. The material suggestions and speculations which naturally followed have had a benumbing effect on religious faith, and have chilled the springs of moral energy and human sympathy in the hearts of hundreds." Yes, and just at this time comes the new influx of spiritual truth, the new evidences Neal Dow is still lecturing on temperance. He is in England now, recommending to the law makers and people a prohibitory law.

Governor Giddings of New Mexico, in his thanksgiving proclamation, tells about "magnifying God." What queer ideas some people have of the Almighty.

Miss Burdett Coutts has given another proof of her humanity by giving over fifty prizes in money to London carters, wagoners and donkey-drivers, who satisfied examiners that their animals had been well-cared for and humanely treated.

Prof. Newcomb says scientific inquiry is much more active in Europe than in America. He says there is no sufficient incentive to scientific pursuits in this country. Our people are devoted to money getting, and our scholars are not students of science, but delvers among dead languages, searchers after mere words.

Prof. Draper says the Ecclesiastical spirit no longer inspires the policy of the world. "The history of science is not a mere record of isolated discoveries; it is a narrative of the conflict of two contending powers, the expansive force of the human intellect on one side and the compression arising from traditional faith on the other."

Elizabeth Cady Stanton, in the Golden Age, asks: "Should any man of common sense expect a class of American citizens, who are taxed without representation, denied the right of trial by jury, forbidden to enter our colleges, compelled to teach school at starvation wages, and snubbed generally and everywhere, to feel cheerful, good tempered, and full of fun in the nursery?"

John William Draper, LL. D., in his present last work, "History of the conflict Between Religion and Science," not yet out of the press, says there is in Europe and America a great and rapidly increasing departure from the public religious faith, and that while among the frank this divergence is not concealed, there is a far more extensive and far more dangerous secession private and unacknowledged.

In writing the history of the conflict between religion and science, Dr. Draper recognizes the fact that the people of civilized countries have come to the brink of a great intellectual change. Much of the frivolous reading of the present day is to be supplanted by a more thoughtful literature. His book, he says, is but the prelude to a body of literature which the events and wants of the times will

LAW, LIBERTY, LICENSE.

A fig for those by law protected!
 Liberty's a glorious feast!
 Courts for cowards were erected,
 Churches built to please the priest.—BURNS.

Four hundred years ago, America was unknown; whether the antipodes existed was not determined, except by the adverse decision of the Church; the earth was flat and stationary, around which the sun, moon, planets, and the whole universe of stars revolved. The Pope of Rome held the mental growth of Europe in his iron grasp, and determined the boundary of thought and experiment. Kings ruled only by his permission, and the allegiance of the subject was at his disposition. But the discoveries of Columbus and the Portuguese navigators determined the existence of the antipodes; Copernicus and Galileo put the earth in motion, and centralized the sun; Luther questioned the papal authority, and nations declared themselves emancipated from the yoke of Rome.

Protestantism then declared the Bible to be supreme authority, to question which was the greatest offense possible, as had been the questioning the authority of the Pope. Liberty of opinion in regard to scripture doctrine was what each Protestant sect contended for, against the Pope and against each other: and bitter was the contention. Blood flowed, and the incense of martyrs burning ascended to heaven, sacrificed by Protestants as well as Catholics. Kings still reigned by right divine. This right, at last, was doubted, until the result was the emancipation of the American Colonies from the serfdom of kingly authority. Only those who then lived could realize the terror produced in the masses by the efforts of the clergy in behalf of kings. Scripture was quoted; from nearly every pulpit was heard withering discourses from the texts, "Be subject unto the higher powers," "The powers that be are ordained of God," "Rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft." A rebel was as vile a character as a heretic. It was a crime to possess a copy of Paine's Rights of Man, and publishers and sellers were prosecuted.

But the authority which the Protestants put up in the place of the Pope was also disputed. Society was aghast. The entire social fabric of Christendom had been reared on the foundation of divine authority, as revealed in the Bible. To doubt this was to remove all moral obligation from the people, to sap the foundations of social order and virtue, and throw the world into anarchy and disorder.

The world has in part outlived its fear; it has learned that kings are dispensable; that doubt regarding the divine authority of the Bible does not necessarily render a man depraved, but on the contrary

"Ye'll get the best o' moral works,
 'Mang black Gentoos and Pagan Turks
 Or hunters wild on Ponotaxy,
 Wha never heard of Orthodoxy,"

And in the pulpit, to-day, in the very strongholds of biblical authority, are sentiments uttered which, eighty years ago, consigned the name and memory of Paine to theological infamy.

A man may now be an atheist, and have no dread of an officer's warrant, though still considered a dangerous element in society.

This is the Age of Freedom, so we boast. Thought is not fettered! "Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Schools," is our motto. But our freedom lies principally in the boast—"That keeps the word of promise to our ear, and breaks it to our hope." The battle of freedom still goes on, however,

"For freedom's battle once begun,
 Bequeathed by bleeding sire to son,
 Though baffled oft, is ever won."

It seems that while we will have full freedom for ourselves, the freedom of our neighbors must be defined by our limitations. Our ideas must prevail. We are all anxiously endeavoring to be Popes to the full extent of our power. So it seems by our proselyting actions. Instead of discovering and teaching how to think, and furnishing facts and subjects for thought, we are more anxious, in our self-conceit, to teach what to think—which is what we think. Now, that is not freedom. No man has a right to the name of freeman until he can honestly in his affections place all on an equality as regards belief and opinion.

Liberals denounce the illiberality of Christians in the most illiberal manner. Christians have no charity for those outside their little folds, and very little for those inside. We are sovereigns in this Great Republic, and are simply the bootblacks of legislators and lawyers; like the king in olden times, we become the stepping-stones for popes of our own making, on which they may rise upon the political horses they ride to power; and yet we are free.

Papal authority, biblical authority, kingly authority, have each been, in part, deposed in America, and our next step must be to save us from ourselves, to dispute our individual authority.

Marital authority is what is now agitating society. The weak-kneed tremble for the safety of social virtue if the sacredness of our matrimonial obligations be subjected to a crucial investigation. Just as it was when the sacredness of the Bible was put to the test. Take away the Bible, and away goes all moral obligations, was the cry a half a century ago, and is yet faintly reechoed over the land. Take away the marriage ceremony by lawyer or priest, and away goes all respect between man and wife, and they who were virtuous before will now lead lives of shame and degradation, says prudery, to-day.

The integrity of the matrimonial obligation does not depend by any means so much upon how we are married, as it does upon the parties married. If men and women are not faithful themselves, no form of marriage, though celebrated in the most pompous sacred manner, in the most sacred places, by the highest dignitaries known to the reverence of man, will make them faithful to each other in the observance of the most sacred vows.

The discussion of this subject cannot be stopped. It will overleap all boundaries, and will find its level in the culture and moral feeling of the age.

Our freedom and morality does not depend upon legislation, but rests upon what we are ourselves. Criminals will not be eliminated by punishment, though they may be restrained, but their existence might be prevented by a wise course of education and personal practice.

In order to be free ourselves, we must be more respectful to the opinions of others, and in building the tower of knowledge which will reach the heavens, let us not burden its erection by forbidding the humblest builder from placing his little brick there, and thereby make a Babel of our best efforts, to the delight of the authority-bound.

Nor will the mean, petty cry, "stop my paper," come from a Liberal, because an opinion counter to his own has been published, even though it be on the vexed social question.

Yours for the freedom to be good, true, and honest.

PIANO MOVED WITHOUT VISIBLE POWER.

EDITORS COMMON SENSE:—Having noticed in your excellent journal, recently, some account of the performances of Mrs. Belle Palmer, of Washington, D. C., in raising a piano with six men seated upon it, also some remarks of the Boston Investigator, that in somebody's opinion the piano had been moved by the lady's knees, I steal a few moments to give you some account of what I saw the lady do in the winter of 1866-67.

Myself and wife were invited by the celebrated medium, Major Thomas Gales Foster, to attend a select party at the Clarendon Hotel, on Pennsylvania Avenue. On arriving at the hotel, we found about forty persons assembled in the public parlor, including members of Congress, etc. Mrs. Belle Palmer being present played or improvised, as she declared, Scena; it seemed to picture the march of troops, a battle, with the roof of musketry, drums, etc., the booming of cannon, the cry of the wounded and of victory. Its conception was fine, and its execution fair; (it was said that Mrs. Palmer did not claim to play the piano in her normal condition,) but in the midst of the battle scene, there was a discharge as of gunpowder, as if in the piano, which raised it some eighteen inches from the floor. I expected to find the piano shattered by the shock, but a subsequent critical examination, the next day, failed to enable me to discover the least sign of gunpowder, or of injury. The medium then asked half a dozed gentlemen to sit on the piano, which they did, and then invited all who wished to come and place their hands under the piano, a large Chickering, with three heavily carved legs, two at the broad or open end, and one at the back or other end. I and my wife, in company with nearly all present, placed our hands under the piano, on the narrow or one-legged side, when the medium placed her finger under our respective hands, one at a time, and the piano was raised about eight inches from the floor. There happened to be a wounded soldier present on crutches, and the medium went with him to the other, broad or open end, and when he placed his hand under the piano the medium placed her finger under it as usual when up went the piano as before, leaving it resting only on one leg; of course, the six gentlemen were still sitting on it, the medium stating that they supplied the battery power which enabled her to do as she did.

Being somewhat sceptical at the time, but an earnest investigator, for Truth's dear sake, I went the next day into the same public parlor, and tried my best to lift the piano, but could not, at either end, nor could I see any signs of any mechanism or wires having left marks upon the frame. Now, suppose each man weighed only one hundred and fifty pounds, and the piano six hundred more, it would require a much stronger knee than I know of to move it, and pretty stout wires. I make this explanation for what it is worth, not caring a continental whether it is credited or doubted. I should have been as likely as anybody, perhaps, to doubt it if I had not seen it, though recognizing fully that there are more wonders in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophies. A large number of friends who see this will give me credit for veracity, doubtless, but will think, perhaps, that I was psychologized or mesmerized, or something of that sort, and san- cied I saw what I narrate. Friends, think what you please, it is immaterial to me. I am not proselytizing, nor do I care what you may think; I know what I know, and that is sufficient for me.

With regard to another article, as to President Lincoln's belief in Spiritualism, I would say I was at that time connected with the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department, and was intimately acquainted with Rev. John Pierpont, well known in Massachusetts and elsewhere as a poet, preacher, medium and truly honest man. He was at that time stuck up in an upper room of the Treasury building, and kept at petty clerical labor, which justly chagrined him. He gave me to understand that he was at times called for by Mr. Chase and the President, more to see "what reliance could be placed in Spiritualism, than in any recognized belief in it." From his remarks I inferred that the President inclined to the belief that it had higher objects and purposes than to be a substitute for a mere telegraph wire, in which opinion he is heartily joined by

Yours for the Truth,

GEORGE G. W. MORGAN, 742 Harrison street.

San Francisco, Dec. 6, 1875.

All defeats in a good cause are but resting-places on the road to victory.

Belief is not the subject of individual will, but is the inevitable result of those unfoldings of life which come before our cognizance.

To the contemplative soul there is no littleness; the least of things is infinite.

If calumny assails you, don't turn moody and misanthropic. Bide your time. Disprove the slander if you can; if not live it down.

No matter how deeply you may have got into hot water—always provided that you did not help the Father of Lies to heat it—your case, if you are made of the right sort of stuff, is not desperate.

Beecher says that as a farm free from weeds is not a good farm,—it must have a crop of grain—so a man free from vile habits is not a virtuous man; he must have some positive goodness.

The world gives back every man the reflection of his own face. Frown at it, and it will turn sourly at you; laugh at it and with it, and it is a jolly companion.

Admit that our knowledge is but a sand-grain to a globe in comparison with the infinitude of truth; yet it is valid as far as it goes.

To live a brave, helpful, grand life which fills out the circle of our nature, we must have faith and hope, and lofty aspirations, and a feeling of assurance that life has a meaning and will reach its goal.

All our popular systems of education deal with words rather than things, and stuff the memory at the expense of observation. Our boys and girls are not trained to see and to think, but to recollect and recite.

It is our duty as men and women to make this life as good as we can, to live as well as we know, and to do those things only which bring happiness and peace to ourselves and to others.

"There will always be sects and the spirit of sectarianism, until people shall come to see that character is higher than creeds, and a holy life better than a holy ceremony."

President Eliot of Harvard College, says, in a letter to the Graphic, "No time to investigate spiritualism, and no inclination either; for the phenomena included under that vague term seem to me uninteresting, and indeed for the most part trivial and uninviting to the last degree!"

ASTROLOGY—NO. 4.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

MAN SHOULD BE ABLE TO PREDICT THE FUTURE.

A false education has taught us that "the future belongs to God," and that it is blasphemous for man to even attempt to pry into it. Trained from earliest infancy in this belief, probably nine-tenths of the people of the United States are disposed to doubt when they hear it asserted that the future can be predicted. They occupy a position similar to the people before the time of Galileo. Educated in the doctrine that this earth was flat, they looked with abhorrence upon all who maintained that it was a sphere, and when Galileo was imprisoned by the Pope and Cardinals for maintaining that it moved in an orbit around the sun, revolving upon its axis at the same time, the common people felt that this early martyr to science was properly punished. I have not a doubt that there are millions in the United States to-day, who, should they hear me assert that man ought to, or can, predict the future, would look upon me as an enemy of God, and foolishly imagine that they could win the favor of that God by injuring me through any means, fair or foul.

I start with the proposition that man should be able to predict the future, whether he is or not. I base this upon all the analogies of Nature, wherever, in her ample domain, I have been able to explore. Commencing with the vegetable, I observe that it predicts the future, growing in a way best adapted to the contingencies of that future. In New England, if the winter is to be mild, the corn husks grow loosely about the ear; if severe, then they grow closely, uniting beyond the upper end so compactly as to exclude even the rain. The Indians observed this much before America was discovered by Europeans, and it was one of their "signs" for judging of the weather, the seasons, etc.

Fishes predict the approach of a storm, the changes of seasons and many other things: Serpents and birds do the same thing. Rats desert a building when its destruction is pending. Ground squirrels and gophers abandon bottom land that is to overflow the following spring, but remain if it is not to overflow. In Maine the wood squirrels lay up a large store of nuts in the fall, if there is to be a hard winter, but are not so provident if the winter is to be open or mild. Captain Kane's bull dog lost his coarse hair in the arctic regions, and in its place came out fur as fine as a beaver's. This was a case where Nature herself predicted, and in her bountiful care provided for the contingency. The otter, or any furred animal, taken to the tropics, soon loses his fur, receiving in its place coarse hair. When there is to be a high flood in the spring, the muskrats and beavers provide for it months in advance, by choosing high ground for their houses: If there is not to be much of a flood, then they build on lower ground:

I might multiply facts of this kind, but deem these sufficient to make out my case: Suppose some one objects, that in the cases cited, it was not the power of prediction, but that instinct with which God in his merciful providence saw fit to endow the lower order of animals for their protection: Well, that is a poser, sure enough! It is also a fair specimen of the clerical logic with which, from our earliest recollection, they have been accustomed to silence all spirit or inquiry or investigation. Therefore, I take pleasure in answering the objection, hoping that others may profit by the example, and learn to reason.

Prediction simply implies a knowledge of the future, and it is not of the slightest consequence whether that knowledge is instinct or reason. Such quibbling is on a par with the swell clergyman, who corrected a gentleman who inquired how he traveled, by replying, "I did not travel at all; I came in my own private carriage." No matter whether the knowledge is instinct or reason; whether it comes from God or the Devil; whether it is exercised by an animal or human, so long as it foretells the future it is prediction.

We next consider that knowledge in the animal is based almost entirely upon instinct, while in man it is based almost entirely upon reason; it therefore inevitably follows that what the former does through instinct, the latter accomplishes by reason. This proposition requires no proof. I next lay down that it is just as necessary for the well being of man that he should be able to predict as the animal: further, that, as reason is a higher order of intelligence than instinct, it is far more rational to conclude that man has been endowed with the power of prediction than the animal. Intelligence in both man and beast has been found to be in the proportion of the brain to the spinal marrow, increasing as this difference increases. Thus, in the fish, the brain is to the spinal marrow as two to one; in the serpent, as two and a half to one; in the bird, as three to one; in the mammal, as four to one, and in man, as twenty-three to one! Therefore, to assert that God has conferred the power of prediction upon the lower order of animals, yet denied it to man, not only sounds illogical, but blasphemous.

The animal predicts by the aid of instinct; the man who advertises himself as "the only living Astrologer," tries to do the same. So, too, Brigham Young, and the whole school of modern prophets, from the Indian medicine-man to the aristocratic fortune-teller, who turns up a tea cup or cuts a pack of cards. And all these must fail, for the simple reason that instinct in the human is so much more feeble than in the animal. The status of the infant proves this, for, during the first few months of human life we are incapable of exercising one particle of reason, being dependent entirely for all our intelligence upon instinct; and mark, what imbeciles we are—greater fools, even, than sucking pigs! There you may see the exact amount of intelligence put forth by the fortune-teller, for not one of them knows any more about the future at forty than when an hour old, aided only by instinct. Instinct never expands, never progresses, never learns anything, never makes a mistake. These characteristics all belong to reason. Whatever knowledge an animal may gain by experience or training comes through its feeble reasoning faculties, not its instincts.

If man would predict the future he must do it entirely by the aid of reason. The barometer predicts, but it is exclusively a product of man's reason. There are, so to speak, natural barometers, but we cannot read them by instinct. When the mariner perceives the mercury rapidly falling he knows that a storm approaches, even though there is not a cloud in sight; if very ignorant, he may imagine the barometer as the cause. When the astrologer observes that Mercury is about to transit the disk of Saturn, he knows that there will be thunder, lightning, and electrical disturbance; this is one of Nature's barometers or finger-boards. Thousands of them having been learned, they constitute the science of astrology; but to learn them, man must exercise his reason. Astrology is founded purely in the laws of induction; that is, the pointers have all been learned by observation, the same as it has been learned by observation that when the mercury rises in the barometer fair weather approaches.

SELF CULTURE.

The following are brief extracts from an address by James Battersby before the Society for Self Culture:

The cultivation of the mind includes among its means, whatever has the effect of enlarging and invigorating its faculties, and whatever delivers them from the trammels and impediments which hinder their free and beneficial action, so that the imagination shall be a prolific mother of healthful and well favored thought; the understanding an acute and jealous guardian, lest any illegitimate notions be received into the family, and cherished there as truths; and the conscience sitting a severe and incurrutable judge, impartially pronouncing sentence on all the mental offspring, and inexorably carrying his judgments into effect, unseduced by his handmaids, the passions.

The objects to be proposed in the cultivation of the mental powers is knowledge—acquaintance with facts—and next judgment, that we may estimate correctly whatever is presented. Now to obtain this culture one of the best means is to make as large acquaintance as can be with other men's thoughts, together with as great an exercise of our own as possible, and in order to be profitable, reading and reflection should be united. Either without the other will fail of obtaining the great end which should be had in view. A mere swallower of books is no more likely to become wise and cultured than is a glutton to be healthy and strong. Mark this well: Information simply is not knowledge; much less is it wisdom, any more than food is chyle or blood. We must exercise reflection on facts—information must be digested. Again to insure culture men's minds, specially those that are active and energetic, should be furnished with a copious supply of wholesome nourishment derived from books which, if read much and in the true spirit, the result will be mental vigor. You will not suppose by much reading, I mean the running over of many books—for that is mere mental dissipation—but he who has thoroughly mastered and appropriated one good author, has made a greater step in the path of self improvement, than if he had devoured the contents of a whole library, without reflection or attempting to ponder or retain what he had read. A child who has been taught to stand, or to take three steps, has made a greater progress in the art of walking than if he had been carried over the whole globe.

I am well aware, my friends, of the folly of prescribing any one method as applicable universally. The infinite variety of circumstances, tastes and talents forbids such hedging up of the path to knowledge; and genius commonly by a certain happy divination, discovers for herself the way and means that shall conduct her most directly to the point proposed; yet as genius is not a universal or even common gift, we may venture to make further suggestions appropriate to this head.

The first and most necessary preparation for making advancement in knowledge, is the habit of attention, or the power and custom of keeping one's mind fixedly and continuously directed to the matter before it. To generate and strengthen this power, nothing conduces more than the study of the great book of nature, which should be pursued by all to some extent. All studies, however, demanding a close application of thought, have the same tendency, though none, I think, in the same degree as the one I have mentioned. In this there is no liberty of base passions, but only appeals to our understanding—to the highest and best and divinest in us. Finally, one of the very best means of self-education is the Lyceum for Self Culture. I believe that controversies are great sources for discovering and diffusing truth. I know that disputations and heated debates are not good, but when men and women enter the arena wedded to no notions, and seeking only for truth, then will the contestants march to victory, and yield their nature to truth, goodness and affection.

RESPECTABILITY.

When people are troubled with that disease, Respectability, they are in a miserable plight morally. It is suprising what an effect it has. Why if the shadow of it only passes over some it at once deprives them of all manly and womanly independence. At once their moral knees begin to tremble and their backbone becomes decidedly cartilaginous. When a soul is troubled with respectability it seldom has room for self respect. The two do not agree. As a general thing when self respect takes up its abode in a soul, respectability departs. A good departure, for the absence leaves room for the soul to grow.

If Beecher had not been troubled with the disease of Respectability he would not stand before the world to-day a poor, weak coward, sacrificing all the manly attributes of his soul. However, there is one good thing the love of respectability prompted him to do. It made him acknowledge that Mrs. Tilton was the seducer instead of the seduced. A compliment to Mrs. Tilton which at once proves her mental caliber. Think of it: A woman having mental and physical charms sufficient to overcome such a paragon of virtue, talent and respectability as Henry Ward Beecher! We no longer look on her as weak, pitiful, a something to excite contempt and scorn, but she rises in our view a woman beautiful, self reliant, mentally strong, loving and triumphant in love; while Beecher is the poor pitiful object so much despised—the seduced! And why? Because seduction implies deficiency of self respect. He parted with self respect, and respectability has made him a moral coward.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, DEC. 19, 1874.

Dr. P. Br Randolph, and Mrs. Addie L. Balion will speak at Dashaway Hall, to-morrow at Dashaway Hall. Miss Augusta Whiting at 911 Market, aft. and eveng.

The Golden Age, New York City, is one of the most valuable exchanges that come to this office. It is full of good things.

Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, the medium for materializations, has left 111 Ellis street, and until a permanent place is secured, will give seances at Mrs. Cotter's, No. 10 Stockton street.

Rev. Mr. Noble says there can be no conflict between science and religion. He is right in that, but unfortunately what he means by religion is Christianity.

The meeting of the Ad Interim Society last Sunday morning was the most interesting yet held. Another to-morrow at 11 o'clock, No 39 Fourth street.

That reverend mountebank, Hammond, the "revivalist," as he is called, (the children frightener would be more appropriate) is on his way to California again—engaged by the Presbytery of San Jose. It is a sad indication of lack of sense in the people who call for such mental pabulum as this fellow can give.

Inspirational poems, speeches and good music were listened to by an intelligent audience in Charter Oak Hall Tuesday evening. Several lecturers and test mediums were present. Next Tuesday evening in addition to the regularly advertised entertainment. Spirit photographs will be exhibited to the audience. Investigators will find it to their advantage to attend.

We are glad to inform our readers that Miss Whiting's lectures last Sunday were better than on the previous Sunday, and her audience, which was of the usual number, appeared to be satisfied. What she said was in the main good; but the best feature was brevity. The evening lecture was only half the length of her discourse of the 6th inst., while it contained quite as many ideas. In our absence a friend promised to furnish a report, but has not done so.

The Spiritual Scientist proposes the formation among wealthy Spiritualists of an association for the scientific investigation of spiritual manifestations of which materializations takes a front rank. It thinks members of the secular press might institute an inquiry that would result in obtaining valuable information.

THE INDUSTRIAL BROTHERHOOD.

Some weeks since, we published the platform of principles put forth by this Order, and cordially recommended them to the attention of the workers of California. We have had several inquiries concerning the institution of a Lodge in this city, and to obtain information we wrote to Wm. Dunn, of Sacramento, the State Deputy for California, without receiving a reply. Afterwards, we wrote to Jordan Cox, of Windsor, Sonoma County, who has recently been appointed deputy to organize lodges in Oregon. He promptly responded, sending us a copy of the Constitution and other information. The object of the organization is to effect a combination of the industrial classes, and their co-operation to secure the rights and privileges necessary to enable them to enjoy the blessings of our republican institutions. The organization is not political, yet it is hoped by fostering a public sentiment favorable to its objects to secure the abrogation of unjust laws, and the passage of others favorable to the producing classes. No religious test is permitted. Mr. Cox is about proceeding to Oregon, to organize lodges in that State, and he is desirous of entering into correspondence with persons in this city preliminary to the establishment of a lodge here. He says:

Before any great progress can be made in the rural towns of the State, the Order must be organized in San Francisco. Our Lodge (Windsor, Sonoma co.) would like to inaugurate an 'order system,' by which we could obtain our family supplies at wholesale from the city house. I start for Oregon, the first of the month coming. I hold a commission as State Deputy for that State. I would like to open direct business relations between every lodge I organize, and a central agency in your city.

Will not Captain Smith, or some other of our active friends of the laboring man, write to Mr. Cox?

The workingmen have an organ here now, in The Labor Advocate, and they should organize at once.

The Labor Advocate is the title of a weekly journal, the first number of which has just been issued in this city, the object being to advocate the interests of all classes of producers, farmers, miners, mechanics and laborers. It is a neat looking sheet, terms $2.50 per year. Of course it has not met with a very warm welcome from the press. Its projectors could not have expected that. They will find they have much to contend against to establish such a journal on a secure basis. The people interested are largely in the majority, but they lack organization. They are diverse in their ideas, and do not pull together harmoniously. But an organ, if properly conducted, will greatly aid them in the attainment of their just rights. It will enable them to compare views, and in time they will perhaps succeed in agreeing upon a line of policy. When they can do this success is achieved, for they have the power. All they want is the knowledge how to use it. Success to them and their paper.

Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith speaks before the Spiritual Society in Sacramento to-morrow.

A DISGRACE TO "CIVILIZATION."

THE destitution among the workingmen in the Pennsylvania coal regions is a shame to the nation in which it exists. The only real use of governments is the protection of the people; but governments, as they exist all over the world, seem to be for the protection of property in the hands of the few who have the ability to grasp it. What right has any man or set of men to monopolize the coal beds nature has provided for all her children? Why have not these starving people the right to go into the mines, and take out the coal for their own benefit? Let them try it, however, and the officers of the law, with the entire army of the United States at their back, would be ready to seize and imprison the poor wretches. Some capital is required to work mines, and to take the product to the market, but this is an obstacle easily overcome by co-operation. The only real obstacle in the way of the independence of willing laborers is the law, which says: Mines, and lands, water—all the natural resources of the country, and nearly all the products of labor—belong to the few who hold by virtue of inheritance or greed. And this is called Government in the XIXth century! Government! it is legalized robbery. But people do not think of its enormity so long as their mouths are fed and their bodies clothed. It is only when want stares a man in the face that he begins to inquire why it is that willing hands cannot earn honest bread.

Bye and bye there will be a day of reckoning, and after a wild struggle, in which many innocent will perish, another order of things will come out of chaos, and civilization will take a new start. We advocate no upheaval; we merely prophecy it, regretting the necessity. We warn against it, and would even beseech man to be just to his fellow, but one might as well whistle to the wind for all the effect it will have. The evil is ingrain in constitutions, established in law, and permeates the whole social fabric. Think of it, you who read, and sneer at it if you will, but the day of retribution is at hand.

"THE LYCEUM," a Liberal paper for the young, published monthly, at Toledo, Ohio, closes with the December number its first volume. It is an excellent journal for the children of Liberals and Spiritualists, full of sensible matter, including much that is calculated to incite the reader to efforts for self improvement. It is an eight-page sheet, handsomely printed, and costs only seventy-five cents per annum. See advertisement, on the last page of this paper.

Of the $500,000 subscribed to start the New York Republic, only $40,000 was paid in; that was swallowed in eight weeks, and the paper suspended. It is said that it will be recuscitated, but there are few who believe it. Great newspapers are not now established as the organ of a few men, they are the outgrowth of a public want, and must serve the public need rather than the purposes of individuals or even of a party.

Truth is a good thing, but it is very unpopular;

WOMAN SUFFRAGE JUBILEE.

The friends of Woman Suffrage are to have a good time at Mayfield, Santa Clara County, on Tuesday evening, 29th inst. There will be speaking, a supper, sociability, and a dance. The affair is to be under the auspices of the State Woman Suffrage Association, (incorporated,) of which Mrs. Wallis, of Mayfield, is President. Visitors will be there from all parts of Santa Clara and adjoining counties, and a large delegation will go from this city. Laura DeForce Gordon, of Stockton, S. J. Finney, of San Mateo, J. J. Owen, of San Jose, Laura Cuppy Smith, Mrs. Pitts Stevens, and others, will make ten-minute speeches. Arrangements have been made by which those going from this city can save half the fare. Tickets may be obtained from the Secretary of the Society, Mrs. McKoom, 118 Post street, and also at this office, the fare to go and return being only $1 50. It is hoped that a delegation of at least one hundred will go from San Francisco. A car will be specially provided for their accommodation.

ANOTHER CHANCE FOR SETTLERS.

A land sale on the colonization plan is to take place near Los Angeles, on the 18th of January, when the Sausal Rondono and Centinela ranches are to be sold at auction in subdivisions ranging from five to one hundred and sixty acres. General Shields and Wm. H. Martin, who conducted the Lompoc sale so successfully, are the managers. The property consists of 25,000 acres of land, lying within a few miles of the flourishing city of Los Angeles, and about six miles from the Wilmington railroad. J. Ross Browne, who recently visited the tract, speaks of it in the highest terms. He says there is no better tobacco land than the alluvial portions of the ranch, and cotton is an established success. There is now upon the tract an orchard of about three hundred acres, containing orange, lemon, lime, fig, walnut, almond and olive trees, and a nursery of young orange and lime trees. Some of the orange and lime trees are in bearing. It is contemplated by the company to lay off a town on the Centinela Creek, at a point commanding a view of Los Angeles on the one side, and the Pacific Ocean on the other. Arrangements are also in progress for the opening of a port on the shore line of the property, and the construction of a railroad from the embarcadero through the entire ranch to Los Angeles.

The new postal law is made an excuse by some publishers for a large increase in price. The proprietor of a little monthly we know of, the postage on which cannot exceed by weight three cents per annum, charges twenty-five cents extra to subscribers, on account of postage, and calls the pre-payment act a bad law. It is certainly a good law for him. It is also good for the public, and for the Post Office Department. The postage will be paid in the centers of population, and small officers will not be troubled with trifling accounts, the revenue from which does not repay the cost of collection.

LAURA CUPPY SMITH'S LECTURES.

Mrs. Smith has given four admirable discourses in this city, one of which is sketched on page 371. In her other lectures she spoke of social reform, prison reform, etc., practical subjects for the times.

In her second lecture, she said ignorance is the curse of society to-day; it designates as vulgar, truths which should find utterance on the lips of mothers to their children, but a false modesty prevents, and thousands of daughters are left to learn from the vulgar insinuations of older companions, that which their parents and teacher should explain.

Mrs. Smith spoke at considerable length in favor of one judgment for both sexes. She said, "I will never call a sister debased, while the man who made her what she is, is respected. She would invite her sister," she said, "to take her place beside the man who visits her by night and condemns her by day." Sons should be taught to prize moral and physical purity in man as highly as men profess to admire it in women; and no young woman should be willing to touch the hand of any man who has led a sister down to social degradation; the same purity should be demanded in the one that is required of the other. Woman should take her place in society neither above nor below man, but by his side—his equal. Woman's strength lies in her womanhood; she does not need to imitate masculine qualities.

She spoke of her visits to houses of prostitution in New York, for the purpose of obtaining information that might enable her to arrive at a just judgment of the causes of woman's degradation, and also with the hope of affording in individual cases some relief. She had become convinced that the tendency to debauchery is frequently inherited; these women are the daughters of libertine fathers. The mothers of many were pure-minded women, but they married rakes, and the sin of the parent is transmitted to the child. If the ministers of America, instead of preaching regeneration, would instruct their hearers on right generation, they would accomplish much more good than they now do. It is very well to be "born again," but it is much better to be born right, in the first place.

She urged the cultivation of the affections, the pure feeling of love for our human kind, and the elevation of the baser passions. It is the abuse, not the proper use, of our faculties which is injurious. This idea of crucifying the affections is monkish, abnormal and unwise. The trouble to-day in the world is, not in loving too much, but in not loving half enough. True love can do nothing to degrade or sully the purity of the object loved. Love should be the basis of marriage, and no true marriage can exist without it, no matter how many priests proclaim the bonds; the bond is not of the law, nor of the church, but of love, and this no priest nor justice can give; they may legalize, but cannot create.

There is strenuous opposition by some people to the discussion of social questions, but she had always found that those most opposed to it are either the grossly ignorant or the grossly impure, and she cited the case of a certain editor who denounced the efforts at social reform in unmeasured terms, and who refused to allow a report of a lecture on the subject to "contaminate" the pages of his paper, yet on inquiry as to the manner by which that editor came to wear a wax nose, she learned that he had lost a portion of that useful organ by investigating the social evil.

If Spiritualism is worth anything, she said, it is because it enters with redeeming power all the dark avenues of life, encouraging the weak, lifting up the fallen, and turning into brighter paths the vile and degraded; it is the religion of humanity. The only mode of salvation is through reformation, and reformation comes through charity, kindness, and instruction. The man who sends a loaf of bread to the poor is a hundred times more religious than he who on bended knees prays God to feed the starving. We must be God's instruments for the accomplishment of good.

We should think less of the "Summer Land," and more of the winter land of sin and wretchedness. Make your spiritualism a practical thing, then you will have less time to spend in bickerings about radical and conservative teachings. Here is work for you at your very doors, thousands of poor and unhappy people to be aided and comforted. Virtue is acting out our highest convictions of duty, and whoever does this is not only aiding his fellow-beings, but is cultivating in his own soul the germs of an angelic life.

Another lecture by Mrs. Smith, entitled "Thoughts for the Hour," we would be pleased to sketch for our readers, but have no space this week. Reports and communications crowd out nearly all editorial and selected matter.

Mrs. Smith is one of the most earnest, instructive and entertaining speakers in the Spiritual ranks, and the various Spiritual and Free Thought organizations of this Coast cannot do better than to engage her services. Her address is 526 Chestnut street, San Francisco.

A NEW MAGAZINE.

Rev. Samuel Watson, of Memphis, Tenn., is about to commence the publication of a monthly to be called The Spiritual Magazine. Memphis, although not the "Hub of the Universe," is near the centre of the Great Republic, and as Mr. Watson has money as well as brains, it is believed that the magazine will be a success. It is said he can afford to lose $10,000, and not mind it. He will advocate Spiritualism from a Christian standpoint, and may possibly enlist a large class who would not read ordinary spiritual publications. Gates Agar, it will be remembered, had a very large sale, while Dawn, a story in every respect superior, still remains neglected on the booksellers' shelves. One is a Christian story with a spiritualistic squint—the other openly Spiritual, without any attempt to win favor from church people. One was acceptable, and profitable—the other shocking, and of course unprofitable. But Gates Agar did a good work. It spread the way for something better. We hope Brother Watson's Spiritual Magazine will do the same.

SELF-CULTURE AT SOCIAL HALL.

At the meeting, on the 6th, Dr. Quinlin read an original poem, "Spirits of the Mountains." He stated that it was written when partially unconscious, while living in the mountains. We infer he was in a trance. It was well read, notwithstanding the Doctor hastened to the conclusion, at indications of impatience by the President. The sentiment was good, poetically expressed, and very creditable to its author, whether in or out of the form.

Mrs. Addie Ballou opened the debate. She considered man as a trinity of body, mind and spirit.

She said: That, in order to cultivate any thing, we should understand its nature and its needs. Man is a triune being in component parts. First, the basic or physical, without which he could not have being, and through which for a time the other nature is sustained; Second, the intellectual, a grade higher, and immortal because characteristically a part of the entity of the undying; Third, the Spiritual or sentimental, called or designated the heart sympathetic relation of man to man. As much of the growth of the immortal, while here, depends upon the health and usefulness of the basic, it is not provident to attempt to force the growth of the intellectual and spiritual at the expense of the physical, though a proper care of it is necessary. A high state of intellectual culture may also be induced by careful study, and yet not be the ultimate or fullest culture. The Spirit which feels for humanity's sufferings might be almost barren of good to self. The first great lesson to learn for the higher culture of self, aside from the physical, is to learn to think independently—to learn to trace effect back to cause, and we would, by thinking more, and by coming en rapport with the individual, gain a fairer and juster estimate of the causes which lead to what we call immoralities, and their consequent misery; and thus, with greater charity, we could measure the faults of others. Neither is it the best method of self-culture to always shrink from contact with guilt, because we need the lesson of contrast to keep goodness by us, and we need to have temptations, that we may put them away, and thus grow strong in the experience. The great need, then, is to know what will most speedily and surely bring us into the harmony of that development or culture where we can be physically, mentally and spiritually most perfect and most wise, and through wisdom, charity and health, judge of humanity as the saintly who have gone before judge of us.

Mrs. Ballou's treatment of the subject showed her to be both a thinker and speaker.

Mrs. Hughes thought we needed more quiet, to be alone at times, for high thought, and suggested that a few minutes between each speech be devoted to silence.

Mr. Healy then took the stand, slowly repeating an aphorism of the preceding speaker, that silence is golden. He appeared to be imbued with the spirit of the sentiment, uttering short sentences, and making long pauses, to which the President and some others took exceptions, they evidently believing that Mr. Healy's object was solely to make sport, which certainly is not in consonance with the objects of the Society for Self Culture. They were unwilling to make allowance for Mr. Healy's peculiarities, and it was decided that he was out of order. He remarked that he had nothing to say, but had been requested to read a few verses from the Scientific Bible, which might prove satisfactory to the many who were disinclined to hear the old Bible quoted. After reading three verses, it occurred to the President that reading was not in order, and Mr. Healy was thrown upon his own resources. Mr. Healy termed this action of the Lyceum tyrannical, violating the spirit of liberty and equality. Whereupon Mr. Knight arose, and was allowed to use five minutes in rebuking the former speaker, though it was evident to the reflecting part of the audience that all the disturbance was the result of the intolerance of a majority of the body itself, who allowed Mr. Healy no opportunity to enlighten them, for which Mr. Farrell censured them in turn. Mr. Lundi spoke with his usual elegant diction. Mr. Batesby concluded with some forcible remarks. The President complained of the want of order, and for some reason, not very plain, blamed Mr. Healy, styling his remarks a scurrilous attack on the Bible, though we heard nothing that anyone could take exception to. The article Mr. Healy attempted to read was, perhaps, intended as a burlesque on scientific nomenclature and methods, though most readers might be willing to accept it as a really scientific exposition of the processes by which man has arrived at his present state. It certainly contains nothing which can justly be construed as a travesty of Scripture. The reader will find it on page 373 of last week's issue.

MR. AND MRS. TODD.—A letter from Port Huron, Michigan, says: "Benjamin and Marion Todd are here, lecturing every Sunday before the Society of Spiritualists. Large audiences greet them, and are interested. Benjamin Todd, as is well known, is a pioneer in the cause of Spiritualism, and an able and courageous champion of social freedom. He has raised his voice for truth from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In California he is well known and respected. As a speaker he is just what is needed, and his boldness and originality of thought are gaining him respect among all classes of people. His companion Marion Todd, is a lady of refined intellectual culture, and her lectures are the utterances of an earnest heart."

PREPAYMENT OF POSTAGE.—On the first of January next all publishers of newspapers are required to pay postage in advance, and we notice that the Banner of Light, the Religio, and nearly all others of our exchanges ask subscribers to pay the extra cost. The postage on COMMON SENSE, under the new law, will amount to fifteen cents per annum. As we are already publishing the paper at a loss, it may not be asking too much of our subscribers to reimburse the publishers for this extra expense, though no paper will be discontinued for lack of this extra payment.

AN AWKWARD PASS.—Some missionaries in India paraded a convert, as they supposed, before a meeting to testify to the efficacy of prayer. He said he was muchee sick, and prayed earnestly that he might be better next day to attend to some particular business. The doctors had given him up, but he recovered most miraculously—no doubt in answer to prayer. The congregation cried "amen," "bless God," and the ungrateful dog said it was Brahma he prayed to, not God. The missionaries groaned.

The Ministerial Union want another revival here. They are about to send for Rev. Mr. Moody, of Chicago, who is now evangelizing in Scotland, and Rev. Mr. Sankey, a "sweet singer in Israel," who is said to be able to take the "shine" entirely off Phillip Phillips, the holy minstrel, who, by the way, is also said to be here, though his dulcet notes have not been heard in public since his arrival. Well, well! when will grown up people get over child's play? With Hammond and Moody, and Sauky and Phillips, crazy Grant and the tent-howlers, San Francisco will be well supplied in the line of sensational Christianity. Where is Beecher? Alas, he cannot come; he is engaged at a thousand dollars a night in a performance one grade higher than the poor tom-foolery of these penniless tramps who, as Mother Poage says, travel around with one suit of clothes on their back and one change of linen in a carpet-bag (the dirty fellows,) and not enough money in pocket to take them to the next railroad station. That is what they say; but, of course, it is not so. Old Steele took thousands of dollars out of this State, and Mrs. Van Cott gobbled up a goodly pile in a very short time, while Phillips, Moody, Hammond, etc., have all had a prior trial of California generosity. The saints will not suffer, so long as fools are plenty. Let them come.

In Rochester, N. Y., recently, a Sunday school teacher attended a materialization seance determined to expose the humbug, and thus do the Lord service and shame the devil. After the medium had been securely tied in the cabinet with ropes, a heavy leather belt was strapped around her waist and hooked to the chair. When the curtain dropped, as the tying committee were leaving the cabinet, this belt was thrust out, and was caught by one of the committee, who tried to pull it away, but could not. The Sunday school teacher rushed up, seized the belt, and tore down the curtain, where he found the medium still fastened in her chair, apparently asleep. The belt remained in his own hand. Whose hand it came from he could not ascertain, but went home to think about it.

One of the most absurd reasons ever given for refusal to investigate Spiritualism is the assumption that it is evil, and therefore should be let alone. This is a reason which can be urged only by those who are steeped in superstition. It is also a reflection on the ruler of the Universe. Is spiritual manifestation a fact? That is the question, and if a fact; and it be productive of evil, the sooner we investigate, learn to understand and seek to provide against the error which it teaches, the better.

The Davenport brothers are traveling in South America, and "astonishing the natives" with their spiritual manifestations. They have been "exposed" so often they have got used to it; the Eddys have also been "exposed," and Bastian and Taylor, now in England have been "exposed," as has also Home, Mrs. Hollis, and in fact nearly every medium in the country, but it don't seem to hurt them any. They go right on with the work the angels have given them to do, and leave results to take care of themselves.

MISS AUGUSTA WHITING

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—Your cutting criticisms upon the lecture of Miss A. Whiting has given surprise and pain to many of your readers in San Francisco.

You denounce the lady in unmistakably plain terms, (1) forgetting she had just passed a long, tedious journey, and was a sister woman in a strange land, and entitled at least to our sympathy and consideration. (2)

I had the pleasure of hearing Miss Whiting's discourse, and liked it, because she proclaimed solid truths, which could not fail but to interest every one who loves the religion of which she is a sincere and painstaking exponent. (3)

Miss Whiting is far above the level of hundreds of inspirational speakers, and those who went to hear and inwardly digest the lecture found much food for sober reflection, and went away weighing well her words. (4)

If you, Mr. Editor, will make a mental winnowing of what you call the "chaff" of the discourse, you will find plenty of Golden Wheat. (5)

Hoping you will find space in your columns for these lines, I am, very respectfully,

Yours for the right,

LENA CLARKE.

December 15, 1874.

COMMENTS.

1. We did not denounce the "lady"; on the contrary, spoke in high terms of her personal character. It was as a speaker solely that we referred.

2. "Sympathy and consideration" is just what we gave her, and offered to aid her in any work she is fitted to perform; but, because we had a little sympathy for her audience, as well as herself, those people we referred to who are always ready to call truth persecution, begin to buzz.

3. Nonsense! Four-fifths of her audience, who were not asleep, were bored to the verge of desperation, and many wished to go out, but remained and suffered martyrdom rather than hurt the feelings of the speaker by leaving. These people have full as much love for Spiritualism as those who boast of it more. For our part, we certainly have too much love for it to praise without stint every one who feels "called" to advocate it.

4. This is an intimation that we went there not "to hear and digest," which is not true. We went to hear Miss Whiting, expecting to give her lecture, as we hoped it would deserve, a most favorable notice.

5. We did make a "mental winnowing," and gave to our readers all the good we found. If Miss Whiting or any one else will give us a fair report of the lecture referred to, we will publish it, to show how much "wheat" there was in it.

Finally, we advise other friends who have talked about the "personality" of our notice of Miss Whiting, to reflect on the meaning of the word "personal," and then read again the article complained of; they will find that all that was personal was highly commendatory.

Rev. Mr. Noble says the first step towards a scientific religion is to turn men's thoughts Godward. We beg pardon; the first step must be to turn men's thoughts towards suffering humanity. God, if there be any, is able to take care of himself, and no man can truly love the Unseen, until he has first learned to care for his own kind.

AN UNRULY SPIRIT AT CHARTER OAK.

The Sunday evening performances at Charter Oak Hall are generally so similar that we do not usually report them in extenso, but the following is somewhat out of the usual order:

The first spirit to respond was the paternal ancestor of a Mr. Guttenberg. He announced his presence by rapping with a distinctness that was felt all over the hall. The place and time of death, etc., were given with exactness, although the questions were put in German, and as the medium does not understand that language the answer was a double test. After satisfying himself of the correctness of all his answers, Mr. G. determined to ask the old man "a clincher." "Am I your son?" he asked in a very anxious but determined manner. The spirit father mildly rebuked his putative offspring by a respectful silence. The presiding officer then told Mr. G. that the question was out of order.

Several other spirits were called, and answered questions correctly. The spirit of Charles Howes was questioned by several ladies and gentlemen who knew him in earth life. Among others the well known Christian Stockbroker Mr. Klein asked if "Jesus Christ is the only hope of salvation?" which was promptly answered in the negative. "Is the Bible the only inspired word of God?" from the same, was negatived from spirit land. "Do spirits give lying communications?" Yes, sometimes. "How shall we know whether spirits lie or not?" By their fruits shall ye know them.

At this juncture a friend whispered to Mr. K. the possibility of "Caledonia" being depressed at the morning "board," and thus summarily dampened his theological ardor. Several other spirits responded to the names written, some of the writers reluctantly recognizing their spirit friends, and some positively refusing to do so—the spirits, no doubt, being poor relations, and a satisfactorily evidence of their death was all the writer could stand. Some of them left the hall on the response being given.

Mrs. Cummings—who is usually controlled by the spirit of a gentle Piute, Mahala—became powerfully influenced by the spirit of the deceased uncle of a gentleman, who promptly recognized his relative by the vigorous manner in which he hurled the choicest gems from his vocabulary of profane expletives. The chair endeavored to tone down the remarks of the spirit, but it was of no use; he kept right on, praying a blue streak. His nephew explained that such conduct was singularly characteristic of his paternal uncle; that he swore everywhere, even in the presence of ladies. Some one asked this spirit if he had progressed any in spirit life? "Not a God damn bit," was the emphatic reply. "Do you desire to progress?" No definite answer. The spirit met with such a cool that he soon retired, and another spirit took possession of the medium, and explained that the "guide" thought best to permit the spirit to manifest, thinking it might be for his benefit; that such exhibitions are less objectionable in private, but that in this case opportunity might not soon occur again, and it was deemed best to give the spirit a show, in hopes he would receive good advice, and be benefitted.

The President stated that it was the first time in that hall that such an unruly spirit had communicated, and she hoped it would be the last. The proper time for undeveloped spirits to return is at private seances, where they can receive more benefit and do less harm.

The Chinese, more than any other nation, have reduced the saving of fertilizers to a science.

THE USE OF RICHES.

Rev. E. L. Rexford, on the 22d ult. preached a sermon which we intended to print that week, but the Chronicle gave a report in advance of our publication day, which spoiled its freshness for most of our readers. As, however, the following extract from our report differs somewhat from that already published, we make room for it.

Personal wealth, is not inconsistent with true development of character. On the contrary, honest money-getting, if pursued not as a finality, but as a means to a great end, should enlarge the heart and expand the soul. It is not a trivial thing to be the owner of millions—to possess that, which if rightly applied, would redeem thousands of suffering beings from destitution, wretchedness and crime. Shall a man be greater than his money, or shall his money be greater than he? Shall he be labeled all over with his millions until there is nothing seen of him but his dollars, or shall he crowd his life so full of great and noble deeds, that they shall grow into him and become a part of him so that his gold shall derive a lustre from him and not he from his gold? For when he dies, he can take none of his transient wealth with him, but his spiritual wealth thus acquired will follow him when his icy hand shall have forever relaxed its hold on houses and lands and earthly title-deeds. A young nan whose father, a very wealthy man, had recently died, was asked, how much his father had left. The answer was striking, and would point a moral. "He left" said the son "all he had."

There are scores of rich men in this city who count their fortunes by hundreds of thousands. Suppose, instead of their present system of selfish, ostentatious extravagance, which is vitiating the public sentiment, and demoralizing the community by setting up false standards of life, they were to exercise the keenness and sagacity which enabled them to amass their money, in deriving means for the improvement of the condition of the poor, and thus become public benefactors. What a changed city would this become!

Every rich man should be in part at least his own Executor—he should not only know before he dies, how his money is to be appropriated, but he should himself begin its distribution while living. The need for these charities is on every hand. Let those however who would be their own Executor, remember it is better to stop the lamentations of the living, than give voice to the dead. It is better to help the living to live well than that the dead should live again in bronze or marble.

Special Notices.

Do not fail to read Dr. Docking's advertisement, on the last page.

For the very best Photographs go to Bradley & Rulofson's Gallery, with an elevator, 429 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Subscribers and Advertisers who change their residence without notifying the Business Manager are expected to pay the full amount agreed upon.

A purchaser is wanted at this office for a Sherman & Hyde Piano—the best instrument sold for the price—entirely new; also one of the celebrated Standard Organs, manufactured by Peloubet, Pelton & Co., New York. Inquire of A. M. Slocum.

Those suffering from that most annoying of the minor miseries of human life—a cold in the head—or from catarrh in any form, should try Dr. Evory's Diamond Catarrh Remedy. Just try it—that's all. Sold at this office, and by all druggists.

Dr. BANCROFT's treatment for Dyspepsia and General Debility has benefitted me more than all the medicine I have used for many years.

MATERIAL AND SPIRITUAL.

The following lines were designed to show the effect of Materialism and Spiritualism on character—that a belief in a future existence ennobles and elevates, while a denial of it, and a belief that this is the only life, tends to selfishness. The writer has endeavored to set this forth by the soliloquy of a materialist, who has a wife of the opposite nature and belief. The characters, of course, are imaginary. The author, in a letter to the editor, says he makes no pretence of poetical ability, either natural or acquired. He knows nothing of the rules of verse-making, and cares nothing for them. He writes as he feels, and in a way to accomplish his object, and, of course, does not deem his unpretentious lines worthy of criticism.

A SOLILOQUY.

BY JORDAN COX.

This is a world of stern realities.
Immortal mirage lies along our way.
This rising spiritual light casts ghostly
Shadows to unsettle and confuse.
Dimly we see the true in this twilight
Chasm, 'tween two dark eternities, the past and future.
Bright-eyed science bridges the space
To distant constellations, measures
Their distance, the spectrum their elements
Disclose. The telescope and microscope
Render all, from sidereal sun to molecule,
An open book; no Spiritual is seen—
All is tangible matter, solid, fluid, æiform,
And law supreme the only deity
Before whom all bow in cheerful worship,
Or are broken 'gainst the law they would ignore.
Beautiful law! No pardon; penalties extreme
Scourge us to wisdom's ways. My wife agrees
To this, and woos its teachings with angelic grace;
But she hears immortal voices I do not—
And sees familiar faces, long since dead,
With eyes fast closed, which I cannot see,
With orbs wide staring to discern. Senses
The best of all refuse to show to me the merest shadow,
Yet she gives names, and dates, and sketches
Of history as true as holy writ;
And with some magic lens takes photography
Of spirit realm. O, if ever nomadic
Arab charmed his nightly circle with his
Hassheesh-inspired tales, she has me:
Ah, led me up through flowery paths, hills,
Quiet silver lakes, terraced mountains, houses
With walls translucent, bedecked with gems, towered,
Fantastic-beauty clothed; society ideal
Too high for earth.

These facts and fancies do
Allure my heart and stagger reason.
Yet I know 'tis all unreal; 'tis very boah.
If I had not proof that my better half
Is a real, physical, human being,
I should think I had wedded a citizen
Of some spirit sphere in which she still lives half her time.
If gods took now daughters of men to wife,
As anciently, I'd have to take the rest of life alone,
For sure some god, allured from heaven, would Make his home with her, and roam both worlds
In happy sympathy. I'm chained to earth.
The winds of inspiration blow in vain—
My moorings are secure 'gainst aerial storms.
But, what holy warmth of love inspires her soul when talking Spiritual to a clod like me. Never holy prophet's lips
Were touched with sacred fire in so divine a sense!
I walk, and talk, and live in her ideal,
A moment at a time. 'Tis irrational,
Bosh, romance; I would investigate
The airy realm but 'twould portray my weakness.
I fear, in fact, to explore the enchanted realm
Of dreams and goblins. If human evidence is any worth
The facts overwhelm reason, and lead it
Captive to the airy camp, horse, foot, artillery,
And press it into service on the other side.
I fear, I doubt—I'll still deny, and live
On cold negation. I wonder if Spiritualists
Ever fear to trust their spirits as Rationalists
Do their reason. If he who doubts is damned,
I'm damned with doubts born of the grace of reason,
Legitimate bantlings clamoring for proofs
Yet seem insatiable.

This is my world;
Let others dash this life for a shadow,
And lose the substance here, ghost-gazing
Weaklings, unfit for either world.
Yet, my faith-blessed wife, living in the clouds
Half her mysterious life, with perfect body,
Mind, and rounded spirit, reasons straight home
To a conclusion. Has no indecision

Born of doubt, is better qualified for life's Duties here than I, I must confess.
I wish to progress here; she rises here to rise
In other spheres, and rises as she raises
Others up—is happy as she others
Happy makes, I'm blessed, I'm blessed!
Were all like her, we'd need no other world.
Heaven would sit on all our hills and vales
With transcendent glow, and Eden be restored.
She unfit for other worlds! She honors both;
My selfish, sensuous self for neither fit.
Indeed, I hold her down to this crude earth
By my own density. She may, in the good Future, assist my ballast to unload, until
I shall lose my earth polarity, and accompany
Her in her excursions to the land of souls,
And then return to bless, as she is doing;
But, if this is the only life we shall enjoy,
I'll live for it, and of earthly inspiration
Take another draught, to give me concert pitch,
Pure, from the hills along the haunted Rhine.

Beside the silver river, I'm watching for a gleam
Of little shining garments across the flowing stream;
For tiny, dainty footprints upon the golden sand;
I'm waiting for the life-boat to bear me to the land.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON JULIANO.

FAUST.—You call yourself a part, yet here you stand entire!
MEPHISTO.—Discreetest truth I speak to you. Oh, sire!
If perhaps mankind, poor trampy world of fools,
Be taught that 'tis a whole in its own schools,
I'm of that Part a part, what was the whole, before;
Part of that darkness, which the daylight bore:
The daylight proud, which now, from mother night
Would flch her rank, her room, and her birthright.
Yet can it ne'er succeed, how'er it strives,
Material bodies hold it fast in gyves;
From them it streams, each colored by its rays is,
A body stops it in its onward way,
I trust then, that with very short delay
Light and material forms will go to biases.
FAUST.—Ah! how your noble metier I fathom—
In gross you can't destroy one atom,
And so attempt the business in detail.
MEPHISTO.—And truly I must own in that I fail;
All that the Nothing doth oppose
The Something, this round world, and those. [pointing to the stars]
Despite of all I've undertaken,
They've always chanced to save their bacon,
Spite floods, cyclones, storms, earthquakes, and volcanoes,
Both sea and land, unscathed as on first day goes;
And that damned trash, the brute and human nation,
Of them I can make nothing, that I'll swear;
What thousands have I buried here and there,
Yet ever comes fresh blood in circulation;
And thus 'tis ever, one might grow insane;
Air, water, earth, all prove my arts are vain:
From drouth and moisture, as from heat and cold,
A thousand germs are every hour unrolled,
So that unless I'd paid the flames especial care,
I should find nought reserved for mine own share.
FAUST.—And you would shake those devil's fists
Doubled in saucy impotence,
Against the power of Providence,
Which makes and mends, still active, as it lists.
Pray why not drop this futile game,
Thou curious bastard son of Chava?
MEPHISTO.—Well, really, we'll think o'er that same
Next time, if you'll not now delay us.
May I, please, meantime, take my leave?
FAUST.—Truly, I don't see why you ask;
I've learned to recognize you, I believe;
Pray come and see me, when you like the task.
Here is the window; there my door stands wide;
The chimney's also at your service quite.
MEPHISTO.—Must I confess it; ere I move outside
One trifling obstacle stands in my light,
The ghost's foot drawn on your door's sill.
FAUST.—My Pentagram disturbs you, eh!
Come, tell me then, you child of Hell,
If that thing stops you, how d'you enter, pray?
How could that catch so wide awake a wight?
MEPHISTO.—Regard it well, it is not drawn aright,
That outer corner of it, master mine,
Stands as you see, a trifle open yet.
FAUST.—Thus chance has woven you a pretty net,
And you are now my prisoner, I opine.
Quite undesignedly the deuce I've caught.
MEPHISTO.—The dog, as he sprung in, remarked it not,
But things look different on this side of the wall
The devil can't get out, it seems, at all.
FAUST.—Why don't you use the window for your exit?
MEPHISTO.—Because, this rule, all ghosts and devils vexes,
"Where'er their entrance, there their exit, too!"
The first is our free choice, the last an obligation.
FAUST.—Hell holds a law-abiding nation!
That's good, in sooth, and so a pact with you,
Firm and secure, might thus be entered into?
MEPHISTO.—What ere we promise, you shall surely win, too;
Not one iota shall be shaved, 'tis true;
But that's a process intricate, somewhat,
And we'll explain next time the how and why;
Just now, I beg you, most respectfully,
Permit me to vacate this spot.

Signs of the Times.

Over three hundred women are attending lectures at University College, London.

Wm. T. Clarke says Mrs. Grundy has papers enough already. She can't have the "Golden Age."

The King of the Hawaiian Islands met with a very cordial reception in Washington. The people are evidently hoping to annex the Sandwich Islands.

The tunnel between New York and Jersey City has been commenced. The water is one hundred feet deep in the Hudson at the point of crossing.

Miss Sarah B. Morrison, a graduate of the State University of Indiana, was recently elected a teacher in that institution, but the students refused to recite to her.

Indecent dancing in places of amusement in London has been suppressed. The can-can, and other French dances are not allowed. Vulgarities in theatres are also prohibited.

The Pacific Railroad people say that within thirty years the Government will be repaid for all its advances to aid that road, the country will be filled up along the line, business will be good, and everything lovely.

All the Powers having accepted the invitation to the international Code Conference, Russia has issued a circular asking them to present their recommendations as to the time of meeting.

The Vicksburg massacre grew out of the fact that the whites had resolved that "niggers should not hold office." Northern papers, generally, sustain the injustice of the whites, and take pains to distort the facts.

Rev. Joseph Stittim, of Westchester, Pa., is on trial for the seduction of a young girl of his congregation. She has become insane in consequence, but in her sane moments she says he justified the act by the scriptures.

Hepworth Dixon has had small audiences in San Francisco, and on Monday evening there were so few present he refused to read. He will appear again after the holidays; meantime the curious can go to Dashaway Hall, and hear Addie Ballou and Dr. Randolph.

A few hundred years ago any one had a right to whip a woman, unless she was married, then, being her husband's property, he had the sole right of chastisement. The proverbs of that day show the utmost contempt in which the wife was held, being full of contempt, insolence and absolute scorn. Times have changed.

M. Leitre says Christianity is losing ground; that faith has declined everywhere.

While the woman suffragists in Michigan polled 50,000 votes, the prohibitionists polled only 5,000.

An improved kind of steam car or carriage, adapted to street locomotion, has been brought forward in England.

England has appointed a Commissioner to attend to the interests of English exhibitors in the Centennial Exhibition to be held in Philadelphia.

The French government has decreed that no army officer can marry unless the bride has a dowry of at least 25,000 francs. The limit was formerly 10,000.

The demand for a graduated tax on property is gaining ground, though little is said about it in the press. When the people are thoroughly awakened, the press will speak.

It is said that the present market value of the mining stocks owned by Flood & O'Brien is over $100,000,000. The stocks held by them have doubled in value during the month of December.

Seven women are candidates in Boston for positions in the School Board, which is composed of twelve members. It is believed that at least five of the seven will be elected. Some have no opposition.

Carl Shurz thinks the mistress of a house has more influence than a congressman; but he does not propose to become a dishwasher himself, influence or no influence. He'd rather have a seat in the Senate.

Scientists and Spiritualists agree in one thing at least. Neither believe in the supernatural. The Spiritualist believes that the continuous life of the spirit is just as natural as the death of the body. He does not recognize in nature any departure from established law.

The Montgomery, Ala., Advertiser speaks of the white members of the Legislature as Mr. Smith, Mr. Jones, etc., while the colored members are referred to as Tom Smith, Bill Jones, etc. The editor says he does this as a matter of convenience, to avoid repeating the word "colored."

There is considerable opposition among the Spiritualists of London to the continuance of the National Association of Spiritualists. Wm. Howitt and others object, because the dogmas of the Christian faith are excluded, and on the other hand, some object because the tendency of the Association is to produce sectarian bigotry. The London Spiritualist says the Association will stand, notwithstanding the objections.

PROOFS OF ANOTHER LIFE.—No 2.

BY B. SHRAFL.

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I will continue my articles to prove our existence hereafter. After the old lady died, (referred to in my letter—see page 352,) her daughter, who came to take care of her during her short illness, went home to Paris Hill, Maine, and I kept at my business as usual, and, being very busy, I had hardly bestowed a thought to the subject. In September, the same year, I made a pleasure trip to Niagara Falls, and on my return came by the way of New York, where I stopped a few days. In my travels around the city, I called in the Banner of Light "Branch Office," on Mr. Chase, who kept it. While conversing with him, a gentleman came in, who, in the course of conversation with Mr. Chase, said he was going over to see Dr. Fred Willis. I asked permission to accompany him. Arriving at the house, we went up one flight of stairs, Dr. W. living on the next floor above, and passed several doors, one of which was open. My guide, looking in, and seeing a gentleman standing in the middle of the room, addressed him: "How do you do, Charley?" and stepped in a few steps and talked familiarly to him, I remaining outside the door. After a few moments conversation, this Charley, whom I had never seen before, said, pointing to me: "It is singular, what a number of great reformers you have with you. There is Luther, with his grand, bold countenance, J. Wesley, J. Murray, (one whom I have seldom seen,) Henry Zschokke and others; there is another now coming in the foreground; what a beautiful, almost feminine, countenance he has, quite a long nose, high forehead, long, curling hair, with a cloak thrown over his shoulders. Do you know him?" I answered: "I really don't know." He quickly said: "He is holding up a paper. I should say it is music, I see letters appearing on it. I will spell it out as they come." So he commenced slowly: "Rondo, Capriccioso, by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy." This was to me a very good test, as he had been described to me precisely like it before, three or four times, through different mediums, in different places, to all of whom I was an entire stranger. "And," again said he, "there is an old lady here." Giving a full description of her, he added: "Ah, how she loves you; no mother could love her child any more than she loves you, yet she is not your mother, she will give her initials on my arm," and pushing up his sleeve, two letters, E G, formed on it, while I was looking on. "She will write you something;" and, turning to the table, seized a pencil and wrote rapidly a communication, undersigning the name in full, "Elizabeth Garland." All this time we were standing at the table in the middle of the room. I did not know yet who this Charley was who gave me these remarkable communications, until afterwards he told me he was Charles Foster the medium. Readers will remember him as the one who gave Mr. De Long and many others such good tests when he was on this Coast.

Now, I consider this a good test. First, I did not go to Foster to get a test, as I had no idea that he lived in the same house; second, I had never seen him before, nor since, neither did he know anything about me, nor the gentleman who was with me, who was also a stranger to me, and whom I have never since seen. He could not have read it from my mind, as I had not thought on either of the three tests he gave me. The only reasonable explanation which I can give is, that my spirit friends, who watch over me as well as over every other human being, perceived there would be an opportunity to give me a positive proof of their guardian care over me through the mediumistic powers of Foster, and improved the chance unknown to me, and therefor so much more convincing, as they well know how skeptical I always have been, and am to this day, although I have sat in many hundreds of circles and have often seen others receive tests who were fully convinced by evidence which to me would not have been worth anything. Whenever I received convincing proof, it was always in such an unexpected manner that it was beyond a shadow of a doubt; as I question spirits out of the form as to their truthfulness, etc., just as thoroughly as I would were they in the human form, and never accept the ipse dixit of any; and, therefore, the charge so often brought against believers in Spiritualism, that they are credulous, falls to the ground. In another article, I will give you a second test from the same lady, proving the test through Foster, if I do not infringe too much on your valuable space.

SPIRITUALISTIC INQUIRIES.

Spiritualistic phenomena of all kinds attract more attention than ever. The new phase of the manifestations is not only specially wonderful in itself, but it throws new light and interest back over all former exhibitions. Those who witness the "materializations" are generally awed and appalled at first, and rather disappointed than convinced; they grow on the spectators, after two or three experiences, and the spiritual explanation of them is so much simpler and easier, and more in accordance with the facts than any other which has been offered, that it is not surprising it is so generally accepted. Not the least remarkable thing in connection with these materializations is the fact of their gradual development. At the first appearance an apparition is usually frail and spectral, and hardly half formed; slowly it gains completeness, and bears a stronger light, while its movements are more natural and energetic, and its communications more satisfactory. These facts accord with the theory propounded by the apparitions, but they raise a whole thicket of interrogations which the incredulous insist on having answered before they believe the initial wonder. However these marvellous manifestations are caused, they certainly challenge rigid scientific investigation, and it is hardly creditable to American science that they have been ignored so long.—Golden Age.

It seems strange that corporations have so little faith in a certain old fashioned contrivance for securing fidelity in their servants, called kindness. There is no patent on it. It makes no noise and was never counterfeited. But after millions of trials for thousands of years, it has stood the test and has never been improved upon.

ASTROLOGY—NO. 5.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

MAN CAN PREDICT THE FUTURE.

Having proved by rules of logic that man ought to, and therefore can, predict the future, I come next to a demonstration of the fact. I have been led to pursue this course because I have learned from experience that the skeptic is never satisfied with demonstrative proofs until the way has been prepared through logical reasoning. To illustrate—Horace Seaver has published in the Investigator that he saw a heavy piano move, with six heavy men seated upon it, while Mrs. Youngs was playing upon it, there being no contact between the medium and piano other than her fingers upon the keys. But Seaver has never yet had what is to him the logical proof of immortality, and hence this demonstrative proof, amply sufficient to convince thousands of other minds, did not weigh a feather with Mr. Seaver. I know him well—he has one of the noblest souls, but because he can't see his soul, why, he can't see it in that light.

I have many times demonstrated the truth of Astrological prediction by writing out the nature of the event before it transpired. Others have done the same in thousands of instances. The downfall of Napoleon Bonaparte was predicted and published by the English Astrologers years before it occurred. So, too, of Napoleon III. I have a work on Astrology, published in 1856, wherein the author gives the horoscope of Louis Napoleon, and predicts his downfall in the later years of life. The Astrologer with whom I studied predicted the downfall of Gen. McClellan, and published it in Philadelphia at a time when "Little Mac" was the idol of this nation. The Philadelphians were so indignant that they talked of mobbing my old preceptor, denouncing him as a rebel.

In 1651 William Lilly, a distinguished English Astrologer, published a number of hieroglyphics, one of which represented two men digging graves, near them two coffins, and in the back ground three dead bodies tied up in sheets. This could bear but one interpretation, namely, there were not enough living to properly care for and bury the dead. The hieroglyphic which followed next to this represented a fire, with men pouring water upon it, while over the fire appeared Gemini, the twins, with their heads downwards. On the left was a horoscope. The meaning of this, too, was very plain to the Astrologer, for it had long been settled that Gemini ruled London. There could not be a doubt that a fire in London was predicted; but Lilly dared not publish his predictions, having been so often imprisoned on the charge that he committed the evil himself in order to verify his prediction.

In 1665 occurred the great "London Plague," and in 1666 the great "London Fire." Then it was talked over that Lilly had predicted both events, and such an impression did it produce on the public mind that Parliament felt obliged to notice it. A summons was issued, commanding Lilly to appear before a committee, of which the following is a copy:

Wednesday, 22d October, 1666.—At the committee appointed to enquire after the causes of the late fires:—Ordered, That Mr. Lilly do attend this committee on Friday, the 24th of October, 1666, at two of the clock in the afternoon, in the Speaker's chamber, to answer such questions as shall be then and there asked him.

ROBERT BROOKE.

On receiving this summons Lilly became frightened; being now quite old, he dreaded another imprisonment, and thought to escape by flight. But a noble lord, who had long stood as a friend to the poor Astrologer, knowing that no harm would come to him, persuaded Lilly to appear before the committee. A copy of the proceedings is too lengthy for insertion here, but any person calling upon me may see the full account, together with a fac simile of the hieroglyphics.

The poet Dryden was an Astrologer. When his oldest son, Charles, was about to be born, Dryden handed his watch to a lady, imploring her to stop the watch and pass it to him, in another room, the moment the separate life of the child commenced, for this is the true data of birth. The lady did so, and Dryden set about calculating the nativity. He discovered that the child's life would be in great danger when seven, twenty and thirty years old. These predictions were all fulfilled. Charles escaped the first two, though seriously injured in both cases, but was drowned in the Thames when the time came round for the third.

Valentine Naibod, an eminent Astrologer of the middle ages, having discovered an aspect approaching in which he would be in danger of losing his life by a sharp instrument, resolved to thwart the evil by shutting himself up. Accordingly, having laid in a good supply of provisions, he barricaded all the doors and windows in the most thorough manner. Afterwards, some banditti, chancing to pass that way, imagined that there must be immense treasures in a house, since so much pains had been taken to keep out thieves. They attacked the place, and having forced an entrance, poor Valentine rushed towards them, with a view, as was supposed, of explaining the situation, but not understanding his motive, a bandit thrust a spear through his body, so that he perished precisely as Astrology had foreshadowed.

But we need not explore the dust of the dark ages for evidence to establish the truth of Astrology. I proclaim myself to the world as an Astrologer, ready at any time to give tests of its truthfulness. The only conditions that I make is to be furnished with a full data of birth, namely: the sex, race or nationality; the year, day of month, hour and minute of birth as near as possible, and the place where born. It is not necessary for me to see the person, or receive even the slightest hint as to what sort of a person it is. I have thus tested the science before public audiences in hundreds of cases, and am ready under any and all circumstances to have it tested, for if false, I am as anxious as any one to find it out.

I cannot afford to give my time for private tests to every one that applies, else I should have no time for anything else. But let a committee be appointed, or let from twenty to one thousand persons meet, and invite me before them. One day's notice is all that I ask, for I will even defer business rather than disappoint them. There may be a number of private parties made up, and I will give them each a night—one night a week for the next two months. Who speaks first for a test?

"THE IRON-CLAD PLATFORM."

This is the name that has been applied to the platform of our spiritual friends who meet at Charter Oak Hall, because (as they admit) the platform is not free. The following incident illustrates its "iron-clad" nature:

On the thirteenth of December, at the two o'clock conference, I stated that the word "holy" meant the sun, being derived from the Greek Helios. The pro tem President, Mr. Lewis, contradicted me, denying that it had any such meaning or derivation. I repeated my declaration, citing Rev. Robert Taylor as my authority, and he repeated his contradiction, saying that all the authorities were against me. There the matter dropped until the following Sunday, when I read my authorities, which are hereto subjoined. He replied, saying that I was wrong, and that "holy" was derived from a Greek word, which he pronounced hagaos. I demanded of him the meaning of hagaos, and he replied "holy." I then inquired the meaning of holy, and he answered hagaos. I said holy meant the sun, and he denied it, but failed to give any other definition but hagaos. I then attempted to give the equivalents of "holy" in the various German languages and dialects, to show that in all of them the definition had relation to the sun, but the acting President, not Mr. Lewis, called me to order. I insisted that I was in order, speaking to a privileged question, having been flatly contradicted in a statement that was true, and that I was now entitled to show it. Mr. Lewis interposed, telling the acting President that he did wrong by not stopping me in the first instance. I replied that it was useless for me to say anything more where the Vice President was permitted to contradict me, and then when I attempted to justify myself to be choked off. It was a little too "iron-clad" for me, and so I departed. But I am anxious to ascertain the truth, and hence make this publication, inviting criticism from linguists. If I am wrong, I will recant and apologise.

I do not contradict Mr. Lewis in his assertion that hagaos is the Greek for holy, for I find that the Greek hagatheos means "hallowed, most holy," according to Liddell and Scott, but in my hasty search failed to find hagaos. But because I did not find it I will not say there is no such word, for then I should be imitating Brother Lewis, who evidently contradicted me because he did not know that "holy" was derived from the Anglo Saxon halig, which means the Sun, or pertaining to the Sun, and as both the Greek and Anglo Saxon languages belong to the "Sanskrit Family," there is not a doubt in my mind that helios and halig are from the same root, since both have the same signification. But Brother Lewis is merely playing the quib-bler. The real issue is this. Does the primary definition of Holy mean the Sun, or pertaining to the Sun? But beyond an emphatic denial, Brother Lewis would not meet this issue at all. The following points were made as authority for my position:

THE HOLY GHOST.

Rev. Robert Taylor, the best educated clergyman that England ever produced, and one of the finest modern linguists, says: "The word holy is but an affectedly solemn and religious cant utterance of the word heli, purposely adopted to conceal its real meaning and derivation from the Greek word helios, which signifies the Sun, as the Greek word is from heli, which is, My God, that is, the Sun." In corroboration of Mr. Taylor, who held an opinion differing from our worthy Vice President, I submit the following:

1. Sanctum sanctorum means "Holy of Holies." Sanctus is the name of the Sun in the ancient Sabine language, and every word compounded, or derived, from sanctus, means the Sun, or pertaining to the Sun, or something of the Sun. Hence, the argument takes the form of a syllogism, thus: Holy means sanctum; sanctum means the Sun; ergo, Holy means the Sun.

2. Jove, Jehovah, Jupiter, Adonis, Ammon, Hercules, Osirus, Æsculapius, Apollo, Dionysius, Phœbus, Bachus, Pluto, Baal, Bel, El Belus, and numerous others, are the names of the same pagan deity, and that deity was the Sun. He took a different name and character in different months and seasons, as water takes the different names of dew, frost, rain, shower, brook, stream, river, ice, snow, pond, lake, etc. In summer the Hebrews said the Sun was the God of fire, of fiery indignation, riding through the heavens in a chariot of fire. His goings forth were from the east to the uttermost parts of the earth. The same Sun was cast into hell during winter, when they called him devil and all sorts of vile names. Hell has the same meaning as helios, the Sun, being the fire that is never quenched. The Greeks had different names for the Sun in this wise: In summer he was the "Olympian Jupiter;" in winter the "Stygian Jupiter;" when hidden or concealed, "Jupiter Ammon." He died and was buried at the winter Solstice, rose from the grave and ascended into heaven at the vernal equinox, and then he was "Jupiter Easter." All these things long before the Christian era.

3. Neither Webster nor Worcester give any Greek root for the word "Holy," so if our worthy President is correct with his Hagaos, then both these eminent lexicographers may as well take a back seat, since both were stupid enough to derive "Holy from the A. S. halig, haleg, halic, hali, from hal, halo, halu. From haleg the English Astrologers derive hyleg, "Giver of Life." The Sun is hyleg when in a "hylegiacal place." The Christian phrase, "Giver of all Life," is a perversion of this Astrological technicality, having been originally applied to the Sun as the author of all life on our planet, vegetable as well as animal. Hali is a close approach to the Greek heli. Halo is a direct transfer to the English language from the Anglo Saxon. Pictures of Jesus represent him with a "halo" about his head, that is, a circle of light, or the Sun's rays.

4. With the word "Holy," Webster compares "hale," "heal" and "hallow." The "hale" man is one on whom the sun shines, not one confined in shadow and darkness. The ancients taught the importance of sunshine for the recovery from disease. Hence, to "heal" was to give a sun-bath, and so effective did this often prove that "heal" came to be used in the sense of "cure," the same as "cash" formerly meant a "chest," but because money was kept in it came in time to signify money. The word "hallow" is somewhat similar in meaning. "Hallowed be thy name" was the apostrophe of an old pagan prayer addressed to Saturn," the "Father of Time," as the "Father in Heaven," thousands of years before the time of the Christians. Hallowed, i. e., haloed, meaning to surround the name with a halo, or circle of light.

5. "Ghost" and "ghastly" are from the same root. In some of the languages belonging to the Sanscrit family the word "gust" is the equivalent of "ghost." "Gust" means "air in motion;" or, as Bosworth says: "The first signification of both 'ghost' and 'spiritus' is, 'a breathing, a blowing.'" To ascertain the nature of a "holy blowing" we consult Acts II, 2, and find it compared to "a rushing mighty wind," proving the Holy Ghost to be a first class blower of some kind, and I insist that by every analogy cited it is evident that "Holy" has a meaning pertaining to the Sun. In plain English, then, Holy Ghost means "Sun Gust." The Holy Ghost makes its annual appearance in Judea about the first of May, baptizing the earth with that gentle zephyr which brings "healing in its wings." In June and July the same Sun baptizes the earth with fire that "burns like an oven, saith the Lord." John the Baptist is the dropsical patient when the Sun transits Aquarius in January, baptizing the earth with water. John and Jesus are cousins, and so they should be, for John is "the voice" and Jesus "the word," near enough related to be brothers. In spite of all these, and numerous other proofs, our worthy President denies that "Holy" has any reference to the Sun, while I think it has. Who is right? W. H. CHANEY.

ASTRAL INFLUENCES.

Professor Chaney will please accept the thanks of V. S. for being so prompt in his response to the heavenly call. But as no prophet ever yet appeared who did not meet with opposition I have determined that Professor Chaney shall not be an exception to the rule.

The Professor denies that the configuration of the stars at birth has any influence, and affirms that this "grave error was committed first by the enemies of the science, but transmitted and kept alive through ignorance," and that the stars are only indicators.

Let his affirmation be first examined. The oldest work in existence on Astrology is the Tetrabiblos of Claudius Ptolemy. In it we find the following words:

"From these premises it follows that not only all bodies which may be already compounded are subjected to the motion of the stars, but also that the impregnation and growth of the seeds from which all bodies proceed, are framed and molded by the quality existing in the Ambient at the time of such impregnation and growth."

Ptolemy nowhere in his work speaks of the stars as indicators apart from the idea of causation, but affirms repeatedly that the stars are causes of effects on everything on the earth.

Ptolemy, however, does not affirm that they are the sole causes of formation and character, but notices the existence of terrestrial as well as celestial causes, a fact often lost sight of by astrologers.

The very first words in the Introduction to Wilson's Dictionary of Astrology, are, "That the stars have an effect upon the earth and its inhabitants, is as self-evident a truth as that they have an existence. * * Every sublunary event has its origin in planetary influx; and, as

Locke justly observes, 'the change or removal of any orb, although incomprehensibly distant, would cause things to put on a very different appearance.' The dispositions, habits and fortunes, not only of men, but of every organized being that does or can exist, are derived from the same source; and the infinite variety of causes operating against each other, in which the less is, of course, overcome by the greater."

Why does Partridge say "I need not use arguments with you to persuade a belief in starry influences," if he knew that they were only indicators? It is needless to quote further; the best friends and ablest advocates of astrology have labored to prove that the stars are causes, and as such, indicators of effects produced.

It would be puerile to attempt to prove to the Professor that all things have a corresponding influence on each other; no one is better acquainted with the fact that certain perturbations in the orbit of Uranus led to the discovery of Neptune. These irregularities in the motion of Uranus indicated the existence of another planet, because they were caused by it.

Perhaps the Professor has been led to his erroneous conclusions to avoid the doctrine of inevitable fate, the vain and useless task of nearly all astrologers.

Why not boldly accept the seeming conclusion, inevitable destiny? For necessity rules us all. We are each the culminating point of an eternity of preceding causes, all indispensable to what we are. So, whether causes are mundane or supramundane, we cannot change one of them, or avert any of the effects produced by them.

Whether the stars really influence us, as taught by astrology, I will not now discuss, as the Professor can do that better than I, providing he means influence when he says indication.

As the doctrine of Incarnation is now agitating the Spiritual world, I will, the stars willing, give the astrological doctrine of reincarnation in a future number of COMMON SENSE, which will also illustrate the reason why, in a Spiritual sense, people are born under certain stellar configurations.

VOX STELLARUM.

In England, when a man makes a scientific investigation or discovery, he is considered a valuable member of society; in America, he may work until he is gray, without public recognition, and we may add, that, if he investigates such a scientific subject as the proofs of immortality, in England he is applauded, while in America he is derided, and called "lunatic." The fact is, Americans, with all their boasted independence, are the veriest trucklers to public opinion that exist on God's footstool. They are utterly contemptible in their unmanly fear of Mother Grundy.

The difference between Northern and Southern loafers is that the former are generally despised by the industrious of all classes, rich and poor, while the latter are the gentlemen of the South, the sons of rich men or those who have been rich. They are too lazy to work, too proud to steal, and too ignorant to engage in any occupation which they consider respectable. All manual labor, in their estimation is menial, and fit only for "niggers."

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, DEC. 26, 1874.

MASS MEETING AT MAYFIELD

To be holden TUESDAY December 29th, under the auspices of the California State Woman Suffrage Association (Incorporated). Tickets have been procured from the railroad company, $1.50 the round trip. They can be had at the office of the Association, 118 Post street, room 15: also, at the office of COMMON SENSE, 236 Montgomery street, and at the San Jose Depot. Prominent speakers have been engaged, and good singers secured. The entertainment to close with supper and a ball. The public generally are invited. A good time guaranteed.

Owing to the continued illness of the Business Manager of COMMON SENSE, (still detained in Santa Clara,) the necessary absence of the editor, and the impossibility of getting any suitable person to conduct the paper, it is deemed best to omit the issue for next week. As this is the holiday season, we trust our readers will be satisfied with the arrangement.

When we adopted, a few weeks ago, the plan of marking on the wrappers of subscribers' papers the date from which subscriptions are due, it was supposed that those who had not paid in advance would remit the amount due. Very few have done so. We need every dollar which is due, and again earnestly request our friends to pay what they owe. In a few cases, the paper has been ordered stopped by people who voluntarily subscribed for it eight months ago, but who have never paid a dime for it. We hope there are very few more of this class to hear from; but, to save such the trouble of notifying us, we now give notice that after the first of January no paper will be sent to any person excepting those who pay in advance. We shall regret to lose any of our readers, but the only safe way of conducting the newspaper business is to require payment in advance.

The editor of the Scientific American shows his utter ignorance of spiritual philosophy by asserting that "it denies the conservation of matter and force; demands a reconstruction of our chemistry; and finally professes to create matter and force out of nothing, and annihilate them when created." After this utter falsehood as to what Spiritualism is, it is not strange that the editor proposes to lasso materialized spirits, throw Scotch snuff in their eyes, and squirt ink at them with a syringe. The same spirit of ignorant inquiry would lead to the smashing of the chemist's bottles, to prove there is no such thing as chemistry.

We have received from that radical and clear-headed thinker, Austin Kent, another letter addressed to George W. Lewis, which we prefer to pass over to that gentleman without publication. Although we approve of much that Mr. Kent says, we do not altogether like his manner of saying it. He writes just as one might in a private letter to a friend; but not as one should for the columns of a family journal. We toned down all of his letters which we published, and he took it in good part; but when we did the same with the letters of our friend Lewis, he demurred so strongly that we concluded to publish no more on the subject, pro or con. Nevertheless our columns are open for any philosophical treatise on the Social Question, couched in proper language, although we are convinced that most of our readers would prefer not to have even that. While we receive few requests for articles of this nature, we do have remonstrances without number, and as we publish a paper for the people as well as for the cause of Truth, we feel bound to give the people what they demand.

SUNSHINE.—This is the appropriate name of a bright little monthly, of twenty-four pages, for children, published by Mollie K. Simons and S. Estelle Hammond, of Santa Clara. It is handsomely printed on tinted paper, is illustrated with wood cuts, and well filled with prose and poetry, calculated to interest and instruct the young. As it is the only magazine for children published on this coast, it ought to find adequate support. Address, Box 228, Santa Clara.

An item found its way into the paper last week without correction, and of course, the errors were more absurd than would happen once in a hundred times when a proof is taken. Lankey was changed to Sauky, Brother Poage to Mother Poage, and Mr. Earle to Old Steele. As all these gentlemen are ministers of the Gospel, the paper appeared to be more than usually irreverent.

The tranquility of society, says Draper, depends so much on the stability of its religious convictions, that no one can be justified in wantonly disturbing them; but faith is in its nature stationary—science is in its nature progressive, and eventually a divergence between them must take place.

The American Artisan, which has just closed its eighteenth volume, is one of the best publications devoted to Art, Science, Inventions, etc. in the world. It consists of 32 large quarto pages, profusely illustrated, published monthly, $2.25 per annum.

The Popular Science Monthly was designed to interest the non-scientific public, and to create a taste for scientific literature, and an appreciation of scientific knowledge in the reading community. It has answered the purpose admirably.

Large numbers of people in San Francisco are now purchasing holiday presents, a fact which seems to indicate a fair degree of prosperity.

A number of the friends of Woodhull's Weekly in this city are about to contribute one dollar each in aid of that journal.

A FRAUD.

All the San Francisco dailies, without exception, eagerly seize on the story of fraud in connection with the "Katie King materializations" in Philadelphia, and assume that it is proof positive that all reports of materializations are false. It would be as reasonable to assume that, because a dishonest person may pretend to have laid a telegraphic wire across the ocean, and the pretence is exposed, therefore there is no such thing in existence as the Atlantic cable. All of the papers, also, connect the Philadelphia performances with the manifestations in London, with which, in fact, they had not the most remote connection, except in name. The London Spiritualists have from the first repudiated the genuineness of the Philadelphia Katie King, and we gave extracts from the Spiritual journals of London months ago to this effect.

It is shameful that any human beings can be found capable of the meanness of perpetrating a fraud of this nature, and especially shameful that such persons are Spiritualists and genuine mediums, as the Holmes are known to be, but the shame is wholly upon them, not on the cause they assume to uphold.

Robert Dale Owen and Dr. Child publish the following cards in the Banner of Light:

Circumstantial evidence, which I have just obtained, induces me to withdraw the assurances which I have heretofore given of my confidence in the genuine character of certain manifestations presented last Summer, in my presence, through Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Holmes.

ROBERT DALE OWEN.

Philadelphia, Dec. 6, 1874.

I give notice that I will no longer receive applications connected with the seances of Mr. and Mrs. Holmes, now in Philadelphia, the manifestations being unsatisfactory.

HENRY T. CHILD, M. D.

No. 634 Race st., Philadelphia.

We do not feel disposed to blame Messrs. Owen and Child for the course heretofore taken by them. In fact, it is rather creditable to their honesty and high sense of honor, that they were disposed to believe the Holmes, and not suspicious that it was possible for any one to trifle on a subject as sacred as this. But, having given minute accounts of the "appearances," they now owe it to the public to make a close investigation as to the modus operandi of the fraud, and make a full expose of the manner in which they were deceived. The cards they publish are quite unsatisfactory.

One thing, however is certain, that this exposure proves nothing whatever concerning any other alleged Spiritual phenomena. The evidence of the genuineness of the Philadelphia Katie King was very slight in comparison with that given in London, and nothing to the mass of testimony concerning the Eddy materializations. In Philadelphia, only one "spirit" appeared; in Chittenden, they come by hundreds. Large numbers have also been seen at the seances of Mrs. Hollis, Louisville, and also at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Mott, Memphis, Missouri. At the latter place, the spirit of a young man appeared and asked that his mother, residing in St. Louis, be sent for. Rev. Isaac Kelso gives a detailed account of this incident in the St. Louis Democrat. He says the mother came, and had many affecting interviews with her son, a boy of eighteen, who committed suicide a few weeks previous in St. Louis. She brought a younger brother of the deceased, a child of three years, who also recognized his brother, shook hands with him, kissed him, and seemed to have no idea that he was not living. Several other materialized spirits came and caressed the boy at the door of the cabinet, in which there was no person in the form excepting the medium.

The following is the manner in which the New York Graphic refers to the forthcoming volume to be published by Colonel Olcott, concerning the manifestations at the house of the Eddy family, in Chittenden, Vermont.

Whatever may be one's private opinion in regard to Spiritualism, there can be little doubt that the subject is beginning to assume the most formidable proportions, and that it can neither be sneered, nor laughed, nor coughed down any longer. Quite recently, some very noted people have changed from skeptics into devoted adherents of Spiritualism; and though the occurrence of frauds among some of the mediums is admitted, a reference is made to manifestations where fraud was impossible, and which science, as it now stands, is incapable of explaining. Among this latter category of marvelous facts, Colonel Olcott unhesitatingly classes the Eddy "materializations," and has enforced his opinion with an ability, grace of style, and clearness of statement to which the readers of The Daily Graphic will cheerfully bear witness. There can be little doubt that, in presenting to the public an amplified edition of these letters, Colonel Olcott will secure a very wide circle of readers, and add a most valuable contribution to the literature of Spiritualism.

We have received a communication in which the writer dissents from the inference deducible from a remark of Laura Cuppy Smith, concerning the degradation of prostitutes. Our correspondent maintains that the "degraded" are those who are forced into such relations. There is truth in this, and we would gladly publish the letter, but we feel assured that our readers do not want to listen to reflections on the marriage system, and we have not money enough to publish a paper for our own gratification. While we will not pander to a debased public opinion, we yet cannot run so directly counter to public sentiment as to cut off thereby our entire means of usefulness. The struggle is hard enough as it is.

AD INTERIM CLUB.—At the meeting of this Association last Sunday, an essay on Self Culture was read by Mr. Post, followed by a discourse on Social Freedom, in which Dr. Pilkington, Prof. Chaney and others took part. The same subject to-morrow; 39 Fourth street, at 11 A. M.

The entertainment given for the benefit of Mrs. Hughes, at Social Hall, although not yielding much pecuniary profit, was a very pleasant affair. Mr. Waldron, who exerted himself to make it a success, is deserving of much credit.

Truth is a good thing, but it is very unpopular; and as to the naked truth it is absolutely shocking. The majority of people will not look at it twice.

OUR TREATMENT OF CRIMINALS

A large audience assembled at Dashaway Hall, on Thursday evening of last week, to hear what Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith had to say about that little understood and much abused class—our criminals. Her lecture, delivered without notes, though too long (one hour and a half) was listened to with marked attention. She claimed that the discipline of our best prisons is fatally defective in their assumed chief function, the reformation of the offenders, tending to degrade and confirm these unfortunates in their vicious ways. This, she said, is largely due to the monopoly of spiritual teachings enjoyed by the evangelical sects. Liberal thinkers are not allowed to talk with or preach to prisoners, as are the Christians. She claimed that self-respect is the basis of virtue; that all the instruction permitted criminals declares them either totally depraved, or unworthy of respect or regard, which destroys all ambition to reform, added to which, the uniform refusal to employ released convicts, forces them back to crime. She contended they respond to kindness as readily as others, and are no worse than thousands who constitute the much larger class who escape detection. She related touching incidents of prison life, going to show that the outlaws need only fitting opportunity to exhibit the best qualities of our kind. The convicted criminal is driven by society to greater degradation, while the unconvicted, because of better treatment, do not sink so low, and often reform entirely. This and much more she sustained by the logic of reason and facts. She does not think much can be done for this class through legislation. More rapid measures for relief are needed. She urged Liberals to organize so as to make practical application of their advanced ideas, especially in the direction of aiding released convicts to gain a living, to develop in them self-respect and self reliance; to sustain them in all possible and practicable ways, until they became self supporting. She said our Christmas gifts are a bitter mockery—the rich and fortunate exchanging benefits, while the abject, and miserably poor starve, body and soul, for the crumbs of bread and kindness given to dogs. The earnestness and pathos of her statements and appeals for succor for these castaways moistened many an eye, and roused the latent tenderness in the hearts of all her auditory. Yet her discourse, so noble in sentiment, so excellent in style, and on a subject so vitally important to the interests of society, received no notice from our City press. Columns are given for the details of a wrestling match, or a horse race, but not a word for a lecture which moves the hearts of all listeners, given by one who goes “into the depths,” not for our delectation, but for our lasting benefit, and to furnish food for reflection and warning. Shame on such a press. There is no word which can express our contempt for it.

Professor Newcomb, of the Naval Observatory, Washington, asserts that the time of the earth's rotation on its axis is not strictly uniform. For twenty years prior to 1860, the rotation was slightly slower than the average. Since 1860, it has been accelerated.

POPULARITY. [For Common Sense.]

It is not popular to be somebody. It is popular to be only something. By being somebody, I mean personal ownership—the possession of one's own faculties and their untrammelled exercise. By being something, only, I mean the opposite of all this—allowing others to dictate what you shall do or say, or believe.

The great mass of mankind are willing to sacrifice their manhood for popularity, and they think they are driving a good bargain. They are willing to appear to believe in religion what they cannot believe, and heap derision on others more independent than themselves. In Europe they worship the divine right of kings. In America we worship public opinion.

If kings had a divine right, and public opinion were infallible, it would be no harm to worship the truth. But public opinion is very fallible; it is formed from its caprices and prejudices, and its ignorance. Right well, spoke Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith, when she said: “As to the opinion of the world, I count it nothing in comparison with my own sense of right and the approval of my own conscience.” Why sacrifice to that which with the same breath which elevated you will also cast you aside?

And right here let me say that, if the public, or any portion of it, or my friends, or any portion of my friends, frown because I give COMMON SENSE and the Spiritual philosophy a helping hand, they will have their pains for their trouble.

Having investigated the said philosophy and applied the process of exclusion to the phenomena during a period of seven years, I am left without any option in the premises; and I will stand with equanimity all the unpopularity which may accrue from an advocacy of the truth as I know it.

E. STEVENSON, M. D.

Virginia, Nev., Dec 13, 1874.

The same difficulty seems to attend the publication of radical sentiments in England that meets the spiritual papers of America. Of the dozen or more Free Thought and Spiritual publications in the United States, not more than two or three are profitable. All the others are published at a loss. In a recent number of the Medium and Daybreak, of London, Mr. Burns, editor and proprietor, being ill from anxiety and overwork, publishes a card, in which he says: “What I venture to ask is that those who owe me small sums of money will send it in without further delay. A long list have been applied to repeatedly, and now is the time for them to be honest and generous—both at the same time—and pay their debts into the bargain. Mrs. Burns is exhausted with work by day and watching by night, and any kind act extended to us now will be appreciated. I cannot submit myself to a premature death just for the sake of a few pounds, especially when it is in the hands of persons who owe it.”

Every human spirit bears the impress within itself of every thought, feeling, emotion, word and action of a life.

CO-OPERATION—INDIVIDUAL SOVEREIGNTY.

At the weekly meetings of the Friends of Progress, in this city, it is usual for members to read short essays, or make brief speeches. The following is an article read at the last meeting, by Mr. M. E. Morse, in defence of his ideas of Co-operation and Individual Sovereignty:

Intelligent people co-operate in business, form companies and associations, which sometimes run into monopolies, and oppress and degrade the many, while the few aggregate immense wealth. If this wealth could be participated in by the whole people, as is our free school system, uniting the interests of all in organizing industry on a grand scale, so as to include the welfare and happiness of each man, woman and child, the millenium might become a reality instead of a prophecy. But why cannot all co-operate and secure the benefits of united effort, as well as the intelligent few? Simply because our system of society and business is based upon opposition of interests; and the mass are too ignorant to comprehend the divine law of compensation and reciprocity, which would secure individual happiness by contributing to the happiness of all. Unity of purpose, intelligently directed, gives strength and power to achieve, to overcome all obstructions; but unity of numbers, without unity of purpose and intelligent direction, is a source of weakness, and, with the crude notions of democratic equality prevailing among the incapables, who are apt to be the egotistical, disappointment and failure is sure to follow, and disgust and disintegration ensue. The organization of this Order, or of any order or association, is subject to the same criticism, and may be used as an illustration. The declaration of individual sovereignty, contained in the preamble to the constitution, and embodied in the ritual, which of course has been accepted by the members as they have been initiated, seems not to have been very thoroughly comprehended; for, if understood, it would entirely preclude the desire, and certainly the attempt, to enforce by a vote of the majority, any rule of action repugnant to a single member. There are persons, too, who profess to believe in social freedom and inalienable rights, (only another name for individual sovereignty,) who prate of the sacred obligations of marital contracts, as though the human spirit, in its spontaneous search to supply its own needs, according to its inherent inalienable rights, was less sacred than the legal bondage imposed upon it from without.

Some people seem entirely unable to see that out of the human spirit itself, if left free from ignorant meddling and handling, there would flow Order, Harmony, Love, and Good-will as naturally as the heart beats, the lungs inhale the free air, and magnetic attractions and repulsions bring to us what we need, and send from us what is hurtful. You who are afraid to trust yourselves and Nature, may hedge your lives within the narrow limitations of your own circumscribed mental vision to your heart's content, but remember, this Order says, to both man and woman, "hands off, we are a law unto ourselves, the Divine Proceeding in our own lives shall not be interfered with from without."

Ferdinand Papillion says the palate distinguishes four savors, sweet, sour, salt and bitter—all else, which is called taste, are olfactory sensations; it is odor, not taste. By closing the nostrils when eating, this is proved, and this accounts for the fact that people with colds in the head or with chronic catarrh do not fully enjoy savory food.

Ten thousand people are said to be starving in Nebraska.

WHAT IS CAPITAL?

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—In your last week's issue, in an article entitled A Disgrace to Civilization, you say: "Some capital is required to work mines and take their products to market." What is capital? The surplus products of labor, you will say, either in the form of money or property. The latter cannot be used for the purposes above named, except as security for money. Then money, and money alone, is the capital referred to.

Now, I deny that money has ever been used for the purposes referred to, namely, as an auxiliary of production, or that it is necessary for that purpose. What we have always used to work mines, farms, mills, and sail our ships, is credit, and nothing else, except to a very limited extent.

Formerly, we used the credit of individuals, issued in the form of bank paper, for currency. Now we use the credit of the nation for currency. This, of course, belongs to the people, and should be loaned to them to prosecute their industries; and, if any distinction is to be made, should it not be in favor of those whose needs are greatest, and more especially if they are public benefactors? But what does our Government do? It loans over three hundred millions of its credit to rich bankers, without recompense, and if the proposition was made to loan a few thousand dollars, to enable these starving miners to work and earn bread for their suffering families, it would be laughed to scorn. The vampires who gorge upon labor, while laboring operatives are starving, are the ones who receive these favors from our Government. WORKMAN.

The following notice of Miss Whiting's discourses on the 13th inst., was brought to our office after the paper had been printed. It was kindly furnished by Mrs. Mackinley, the President of the Society:

Miss R. Augusta Whiting spoke before the Spiritualists' Union, last Sunday, to an appreciative audience. Her theme in the afternoon, "The Mission of Unrest," was ably and logically treated. Her illustrations were very fine, containing gems of rare beauty. She claimed the old idea of heaven as a place of perpetual rest was a fallacy, and inconsistent with the functions and activities of the human mind, and that, admitting the possibility of such a condition, it would be, not a heaven of peace, but a state of misery in comparison with which the fabled torments of the damned would sink into insignificance; that the soul's unresting energies are the surest guarantee of our immortality and the pledge of that continued progress which alone can render that immortality desirable. In the evening, the subject was "Death, the Angel of Life." There was a fine original poem given at the close.

DR. YORK'S LECTURES.—This gentleman, who has been lecturing under the auspices of the Spiritualists' Union, has been listened to by large and increasing audiences. The subjects of his discourses have been: Open Questions, Inspiration, Wasted Force, and Temperance. This (Thursday) evening he will lecture upon "What shall be done with our criminals?" Dr. York is a talented, earnest, and forcible speaker, and his presence adds materially to our opportunities for useful evening entertainment.—Santa Barbara Index.

A MEMORIAL.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Almost a century has elapsed since the fathers of our country framed the Constitution, which was, for their time, a master-piece of political wisdom, elaborated according to their best knowledge, and in the most zealous endeavor to create a permanent republican government, that might guarantee to the citizens the greatest scope of individual freedom compatible with public welfare; a government which might by its example, ultimately revolutionize the oppressed nations of the globe, and establish an asylum of liberty extending its hospitality to all who would flee from the fetters of despotism and take upon themselves the responsibility of republican citizenship.

Although we, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, acknowledge with a feeling of profound gratitude the merits of the framers of the Constitution, we are nevertheless constrained to express our conviction that the development of liberal political views which the more general study of the philosophy of universal history has brought about since the revolution, and a consideration of the future of our Republic, demand imperatively a thorough revision of the Constitution, with the aim to make our government what the founders, owing to the then powerful existing circumstances, did not dare to make it, that is, as nearly as practicable, in view of such a large expanse of territory, a purely democratic republic.

A hundred years ago the principles of universal liberty and equality would have been rejected by the slaveholders, so that a consistent adherence to that fundamental democratic principle on the part of the best minds in the constitutional convention would have prevented the Union, which in those times was the uppermost desire of the patriots. Therefore, slavery was suffered to remain in the "land of liberty" long enough to engender that most deadly civil war, which not many years ago threatened the destruction of the Republic and the institution of a barbarous oligarchy; slavery, the moral cause of the present sad condition of affairs in the Southern States, where murder, anarchy and local despotism are the order of the day.

A similar policy of expediency, prompted by the fear of abuses on the part of the uneducated masses, caused the direct democratic control of the government to be withheld from the people, and behold the consequence: the most shameless corruption parading at the seats of government and in the halls of justice almost throughout the country.

This is a sweeping assertion, but it will be sustained by the people from Maine to California and from the northern frontier to the Gulf.

It is our firm conviction that next to the development of a system of popular education, that will elevate the moral character of the people, the principal and most efficient means of insuring a permanent reform in public morals would be a remodeling of the Constitution according to the principles of purely democratic republicanism.

The overwhelming majority of our people have acquired an average degree of education which makes it perfectly safe to entrust to their hands the direct sovereign control of all branches of the government; the public mind is more reliable than the mind of individuals, and the law of self-preservation will be sure ultimately to guide the people to do what is best, even though occasional errors, (as is the case with individuals,) may not be entirely avoided. Under the present laws, when the voters have elected their representatives to State legislatures or to Congress, they are absolutely deprived of the right of self-government for the whole term of office held by said representatives, and have no efficient means of enforcing their will if the latter choose to ignore it or act contrary to it. The history of our State and National Legislatures furnishes ample proof of this assertion.

In our opinion, all the members of legislative bodies should be elected by the people directly, and be made directly responsible to their constituents; all important enactments should be approved by a popular vote before they become laws. Cæsarism should be made impossible by the abolishment of the offices that rear and nurture it.

And the universal principle of liberty and equality, that has at last been justly applied to the colored citizens, although the great majority of them are as yet in a state of utter ignorance, should also be extended to the female citizens; for as long as one half of the people are deprived of the right of self-government, we cannot boast of having established a democratic republic.

The Swiss republic has passed through a stage of development similar to that of the United States in the present day. Its constitution had long before been decidedly superior in many respects to those of other countries, and was long considered the best. But after the Swiss people had been enlightened by experience in regard to the defects of that former constitution, they resolutely planned and carried out a thorough revision of the same—and have improved it so that it may now be called a model in many respects and especially in regard to those regulations which provide for a control of the Executive by the legislative assemblies and which secure the necessary influence of the people on legislation. In this very relation, more than in any other, the Constitution of the United States has proved defective.

Our country is termed a democratic republic; accordingly the will of the people should direct the legislation and administration at all times; but in reality the people have only the right to elect (in some cases not even directly) those who are to have the privilege of making the laws and of exercising the powers which the whole people must obey. After the elections, the chosen representatives become, in fact, independent masters of the nation's fate for a number of years, and the people have no efficient constitutional means of controlling them or preventing them from legislating contrary to the popular will or detrimental to the common interests. By electing a representative the citizens actually abdicate their sovereignty and lay it down at the feet of those who in a truly democratic republic ought to be simply their agents and servants. In any ordinary business transaction an agent is dependent upon his employer, and may be discharged whenever he acts contrary to the latter's interests. Yet in legislation and the administration of public affairs—the most important business that society has to transact—the agent is made the ruling master, and the employer is changed into an impotent spectator.

Our country has suffered severely from the consequences of this incongruity, and it is high time that we profit from the bitter experience of the past. Many a resolution has been adopted and many a law enacted by Congress that would never have gained a majority if the people had had the decision in their own hands; as, for instance, in the case of the Back Pay Grab, many laws favoring monopolies, the atrocious squandering of public lands, etc.

The antagonism between the acts of our legislators and the wishes of the people is most plainly shown after each session of Congress, when a testimony of satisfaction at the results of its labors is rarely heard.

Owing to their long-continued habit of ruling, the opinion seems to have become prevalent among congressmen that it is the people's only task to elect the rulers in order to obey them. Several Senators expressed themselves plainly to that effect during the last session.

The time has come for the citizens to assert their sovereignty.

The cardinal issue of the day should be a reform of the Constitution by which the representatives would be made directly responsible to and dependent upon their electors, which would furthermore afford a safeguard against the possibility of the enactment of any laws contrary to the will of the majority of the people.

We therefore demand that amendments to the Constitution be laid before the people of the United States, in the proper form and manner, proposing,

1. That every member of Congress shall be directly responsible to the electors of his district, the majority of whom, if he does not meet their expectations or justify their confidence, may at any time recall him or replace him by a successor. The modus operandi of this regulation is to be defined by a special law.

2. That no important law shall come into force until it shall have been sanctioned by the majority of the people.

3. That the Senate (a mere copy of the aristocratic House of Lords in England and other monarchies), whose members are not elected directly by the people, be abolished, and its privileges and duties, so far as they do not become superfluous, be transferred to the House of Representatives.

4. That the offices of President and Vice President of the United States be henceforth abolished, and that the powers now vested in them be transferred to an Executive Council of seven members, to be separately chosen from among all the citizens of the United States, and to be separately and jointly responsible to the said legislative body, and subject to be dismissed by the same.

5. That Article XV of the Amendments to the Constitution be amended by inserting the word "sex" after the word "color."

We are well aware of the wide-spread conservative prejudice in favor of the old time-honored institutions which we propose to have amended or abolished, but we are also convinced that if the great and good men who founded our Republic were to-day living, they would be among the first to join us, for they were great thinkers and would not be blind to the fact that political as well as physical things are subject to the universal law of evolution and development. They would concede that like unto the most beautiful natural crystals that have ever been investigated by science, the political jewel which they bequeathed to us is capable of greater perfection. We can in no wise better honor their magnificent inheritance than by endeavoring to heighten its beauty and usefulness to mankind.

For the sake of our beloved country's welfare we recommend this memorial to your earnest consideration.

A method of preserving grapes from autumn until the following summer even, has been originated in France, and put into extensive practice. The grapes are kept on the vine until the first frosts appear. They are then cut with a portion of the stem extending two or three knots below the bunch, and two above it. The upper end is then covered with wax, to prevent the evaporation of the liquids contained in the veins of the wood; and, after removing all the unsound grapes, the lower end of the stem is inserted in a small, elongated bottle, filled with water, and having a bit of charcoal at the bottom. The space between the stem and the tightly-fitting cork through which it passes, is filled with wax. The bottles, with their contents, are then placed on shelves in a dry room, as close together as they can conveniently stand.

J. L. York will deliver a course of liberal lectures in Ventura, during the first week in January, 1875.

BRIEF EXTRACTS.

The Panama railroad was constructed at a loss of 81,000 human lives by malaria, equal to one human being to every yard of road.

In the salt mines of Hungary and Poland, the galleries are supported by wooden pillars, which last unimpaired for ages, from being impregnated with salt.

The only way to end the race of dyspeptic, neuralgic mothers, is to educate a generation of complete women, not toys nor slaves, but reliable, responsible human beings.

The church has never led in any social reform that has the good of universal humanity at heart. The sects are too busy in propagating their faith to pay much attention to the needs of humanity.

Radicals are open to the charge of coldness and selfishness. Would to God that, in the holy cause of intellectual and spiritual freedom for all mankind, they had a little of the zeal and missionary spirit which the Church displays in promoting her own ends.—Index.

Mapleson, the London impresario, offers to give Jenny Lind's daughter four years' instruction under the most eminent Italian masters, and $2,000 per year, provided she will contract her services to him for six years as an opera singer.

Saint Peter was the only one of the remaining eleven that denied his Christ thrice before the Pharisees; that is just the reason why, of all the apostles, he is the most revered by the Catholics, and has been selected to rule over the most wealthy as well as the most proud, greedy and hypocritical of all the churches in Christendom.

She is not the best hostess, who is ever going to and fro with hurried action, and flurried manner, and heated countenance, as if to say: "See how hospitable I can be;" but rather the one who takes your coming with quiet dignity and noiseless painstaking; who never obtrudes attention, yet is very attentive all the while; who makes you, in one word—the most expressive word in the English tongue—to be at home. There is no richer, deeper, larger hospitality than that.

T. W. Higginson does not approve the system of separate education which is to be carried out at the new Wellesley College, which is exclusively for women, and will be under the exclusive control of lady professors. He says: "This system will only deepen and perpetuate that one-sided and monastic character which is the bane of separate education, at any rate, but which is now tempered at Vassar by the residence of cultivated men with the proper accompaniment of wife, baby, and family ties. So forced and unnatural does the whole policy of separation seem to me, that I would almost as willingly send my daughter into a convent for education, for four years, as into a Protestant palace of celibacy, called a college.

When, twenty-five years ago, Agassiz ventured to assert the diverse origin of the human race, theology attempted to expel him from his chair. It has followed every savant into his laboratory or observatory, and insisted that whatever they might find they must teach nothing that did not accord with the creeds. Most of our colleges are sectarian, and were a professor at Yale, or Bates, or Oberlin to declare himself unqualifiedly in favor of Darwinism, for instance, he would find his chair too uncomfortable for occupancy. The professor thinks what he pleases and holds his tongue, or stops exploring dangerous ground. This tyranny of theology must be broken before we can ever have original scientific research and a frank, full statement of its results.—Golden Age.

[For Common Sense.]
NEVER GIVE UP.

BY I. A. HEALD.

Respectfully dedicated to the advocates of freedom and progress everywhere—particularly as applied to woman.

Never give up! Whate'er thy position,
Where'er on this planet thy lot may be cast;
Mid life's varied ills, fulfill thy true mission,
And victory will perch on thy banner at last.

Never give up! Earnest words fitly spoken,
A motto well chosen to battle with crime,
'Till the victims of wrongs and oppression have broken
Their shackles, and passed into freedom sublime.

Thy labor for years may have ended in sorrow,
Still there's work in this life that must surely be done;
Though hope has gone down with the sun, yet, to-morrow
May bring you a victory most gloriously won.

Then never give up! But onward forever,
Let your watchword be while life shall remain;
Show friends that are true, your highest endeavor
Shall be, their confidence now to retain.

Yes, onward still, though slanders assail you,
For they can injure you but for a while,
Use no such defense, 'twill never avail you,
Slander is but the coarse food of the vile.

Then never despair, though dark days come o'er you,
There's sunlight and shadows wherever we roam;
Press onward to duty, which now lies before you,
Shadows will vanish and brighter days come.

Advance guard of progress, then make no concession,
Your cause is God's truth, let justice be done;
Brave spirits then forward! True friends of progression
Will honor and bless you when freedom is won.

What, though the world in a false light may view you,
Though you may have drank from life's bitterest cup;
Success yet awaits you, if you are true to Yourself, and the motto of Never Give Up.

FATE.

Why should man struggle early, late,
When all he is fixed by fate?
For everything that comes and goes,
Goes, comes at its appointed date.
The wind is measured as it blows.
The grains of sand have each their weight.
Only the fool can say he chose
The woman that is now his mate!
And so with friends and so with foes,
The rising and the falling state.
'Tis idle to support, oppose,
To open or to shut the gate.
What is we see; but no one knows
What was or will be small or great.
Nothing is certain but the close,
And that is hid from us by Fate!

—R. H. STODDARD.

LET WOMAN TAKE THE LEAD.

BY A NATIVE JERSEYMAN.

[Read before State Convention of Spiritualists, at Trenton, N. J., Nov. 29, 1874.]

For ages past the men have led,
In Church, and State, and Home;
And battle-fields been strewn with dead,
To gild Ambition's dome.
But now the great transition comes,
Earth's slaves are being freed—
Love's light is kindling in our homes;
Let Woman take the lead.

Man's forte is force—centrifugal—
And to destruction tends;
A woman's, love—centripetal—
Which all life's forces blends.
The reign of force has had its day,
And scattered wide its seed;
Love claims the harvesters to sway,
With Woman in the lead.

In fields of scientific art,
Hath man achieved high fame;
And now, within the realm of heart,
Would woman gild her name.
The homeless millions of the world
Call loudly for Love's need;
Let prejudice from power be hurled,
And Woman take the lead.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO

FAUST—I pray you, a few moments more remain,
Tell me some story, you must know full many.
MEPHISTO.—Let me go now. Soon will I call again,
Then you may ask me, and I'll tell you any.
FAUST—No more have I about you cast,
Did you not seek the trap yourself?
Who holds the devil, let him hold him fast,
Not soon a second time he'll trap that slippery elf.
MEPHISTO.—Well, if you choose, I'm ready, quite, to stay
And bear you company, this evening, here,
On the condition that I drive away
Ennui, with arts that I at least hold dear.
FAUST—I'd like to see them, that you're free to do,
So that your arts be smart and pleasant too.
MEPHISTO.—You'll find, my friend, each hour and minute
Hath more delight compressed within it
Than in a year of common hue;
These songs my clever spirits sing you,
The lovely pictures that they bring you,
Are no mere empty comedy;
Your sense of smell will be delighted,
Your palate, too, will be requited,
Your senses shrick with ecstasy;
We've no rehearsals for our play,
We're altogether—alng away.

SPIRITS.

Dark roof so sombre, now,
Arched o'er his head,
Burst thou asunder now;
Blue ether shed
Kindler influence,
Stretched o'er instead.
Let the thick thunder clouds
Melting to tears,
Unfurl their sullen shrouds,
Each star appears.
Softer suns soothe his sense,
Twinkling o'er his head,
Bright spirit beauty of Heavenly children;
Wavering duty, soft
Hover, bewildering;
Yearning affection, too,
Follow the lead.
Ribbons like gay flowers
Deck each green alley,
Flutter in nest bowers,
Where lovers dally,
Deep in reflection, too,
On life's faded
Thick tendrils, muster ye
Bower on bower;
Heavy grape clusters, the Sweet purple shower
Cast in the wine presses
Deep, clammy hollow.
Foaming wines gush out now

Bubbling in fountains;
Hissing they rush out now,
Leaving the mountains;
Brothers, the time presses,
Follow, oh, follow!
Leaving the steep blue hills
Lying behind them,
Murmuring in deep blue rills
Thro' gems, we find them.
Widened to miles they lie
Round green hills pouring;
And the bright forms that fly,
Sipping their nectar,
Dart towards the sun on high,
Vigorous as Hector,
Dart toward the isles that lie
Nodding in glories;
Where we hear merry ones
Shouting in choruses,
And see these very ones
Dancing before us.
Free o'er the meadows see
Every one wanders,
Some climb the hills so high,
Some swim the lakelets,
Some through blue ether fly,
Each heart would slake its
Life-joy in shadows;
Though distance sunders ye,
Striving to pierce those wee
Loving stars' wonders.

MEPHISTO.—He sleeps; all's well, my merry, clever children,
You've safely soothed him with your strains bewildering.
I'll owe you something for this concert's fun dears—
You're not the man to hold the deuce it seems;
Play on his senses with phantasmic dreams,
Submerge him in delusion's sea.
To break the spell of these enchanted beams,
A rat's tooth would be welcome now to me:
I need not long conjure the beast, I think,
There scratches one, he'll hear me in a wink.

The Lord of rats and frogs, and mice,
Of flies and bedbugs, and of lice,
Commands thee to come forth instant
And gnaw the door-sill in a creak,
Where he shall smear it now with oil;
Ah, there you come—jump to your toil;
Be sharp, now, you will find the corner
That bothered me, sticks out before there—
Just one more bite, and I can pass the door—
Now, Faust, dream on, friend, until we meet once more.

Signs of the Times.

The experiment of co-education of the sexes in the Michigan University has worked admirably so far, and we have as yet heard no unfavorable report from our California University.

Dr. Draper's History of the Conflict between Religion and Science was published simultaneously in New York and London, and is soon to be published in Paris, Leipsic, Milan and St Petersburg. Translations into the Continental languages are in rapid progress.

James Freeman Clarke has recently married a couple who protested against the yoke before submitting their necks to the bow. The lady would not surrender her name, and took occasion to utter her formal dissent against the legal status of women under marriage. But she submitted nevertheless.

The annual sale of pews in Beecher's church held this week, amounted to over $70,000. Fifty thousand dollars were paid in premiums over the regular price of the seats, meantime Beecher is on trial at suit of Mr. Tilton, in which case much difficulty has been met with in efforts to secure a jury.

Four conservatives claiming seats in the Louisiana Legislature were last week forcibly ejected from the State House by United States soldiers, a sign of the times not very encouraging to lovers of civil liberty. There was no just occasion for such interference, and the Executive, who placed Federal soldiers at the service of a usurping Governor, should be taught that he is not yet autocrat, though this is his second term.

Professor Baker of Philadelphia, has recently made a discovery of metallic paint, intended for application to "journal boxes" on railroad cars. The paint when heated to about 160 degrees Fahrenheit turns from its original color, which is a deep clear red, to a pure black; and immediately on cooling it resumes its redish hue. The journal boxes being covered with this metallic paint, train hands detect at a glance whether a journal has heated or is heating.

T. B. Taylor, M. D., reports that at Carbondale, Ill., recently, Dr. Vincent Hinchcliffe was shot by "bushwhackers." The murdered man's wife was the first to reach the spot where the body lay. She found his arm and neck broken, and six bullet holes in his breast. The shock caused the premature birth of a child, (dead) which bore all the marks of the murdered father, and was born with a broken arm and neck. Can scientists explain?

The Kingdom of Heaven is no more. It departed this life in Boston recently, without sign, aged ten years.

The Russian Government has completed negotiations with a Russo-English company, for the construction of a canal from Cronstadt to St. Petersburg. The work of construction will occupy six years and will cost $5,530,000.

The immigration into the United States during the year just closed was considerably less than that of the preceding year. The number from Germany fell from 159,000 to 97,000, and the Germans are the most valuable portion of our adopted citizens.

An invoice of flour, in paper barrels, from Winona, Minnesota, was received in Philadelphia last week, and attracted much attention, being the first ever received in that style of package. It was manufactured by the "patent process."

There is a lighthouse in England, using an electric light, which throws forth a beam of light equal to 800,000 candles, while the light-houses of America give only the equivalent of 200 candles. England is ahead on the light question certainly.

Barrels are now made from one stave each. This is accomplished by turning a steamed log, of the length of a barrel, against a sharp knife of the requisite length, and thus cutting it into a continuous sheet of wood of the thickness of a barrel stave.

The Popular Science Monthly notices favorably a work just published called "Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, based on the Doctrine of Evolution." The rapidity with which such works are coming into favor shows clearly the change that is taking place in public opinion.

Justice Leonard, of New York City, recently committed to prison a boy of seven years on complaint of the boy's father, the offence being that the boy stole five cents with which he was sent to buy beer. That father and the "justice" ought both of them to be in prison in the boy's place.

In the matter of co-education of the sexes in our colleges, it is generally admitted that the female students work under disadvantages. The question to be decided is whether this difference is removable, or permanent, whether it is the result of temporarily unfavorable conditions or of the actual constitution of the sexes. When women get equal wages for equal work, when they have the opportunity to become pecuniarily independent of man, it is believed that many of the differences now observable will disappear.

MATERIALISM VERSUS SPIRITUALISM.

In that very ably conducted but inadequately supported quarterly, Brillan's Journal, for October, appear editorial comments on the attitude of Materialists towards Spiritualism, and a retort for the Boston Investigator on the motto about "Trumpets" and "Angels," which has been agitating those journals with all the wit and force of Lord Dundreary's remarks on the proverb: "Birds of a feather flock together."

The attitude of Scientists generally towards the phenomena, on which is based the hopes and faith of millions, is confessedly absurd, and unworthy of honest investigators and truth seekers, but the attitude of Spiritualists towards Materialists is not what it should be, even though some Materialists may look upon Spiritualists as lunatics governed by whim, caprice and impression, instead of reason and cultivated judgment. In this respect, however, Materialists are generally more charitable and just to Spiritualists than their co-believers in immortality, Christians.—Public lecturers and writers on Spiritualism rarely mention Materialism without a libel of the grossest character; even that elegant and forcible writer, S. B. Brittan, cannot speak of it without adjoining the adjective "bald" (whatever that may mean—to me it is a more insolvable conundrum than the "Trumpets,") or hinting that its only effects are

"To creep and grovel on the earth."

To believers in immortality the Materialist is a hog, only governed by brutal instincts, with no higher aspiration than selfish, sensuous gratification. From the Christian I have long since ceased to hope for justice; to him the Infidel, the Materialist, the Atheist must always appear as a monster condemned to the everlasting wrath and vengeance of an offended deity, one in whom can dwell no good thing, and meriting in this life the contempt and ostracism of every Christian community. From the Spiritualist I hope better things yet to come. I expect the time will come when Spiritualists will cease to bandy the epithets, coined by Christians, against unbelievers.

In the COMMON SENSE there lately appeared a poem illustrating "that a belief that this is the only life, tends to selfishness." Now, in behalf of Materialism, I appeal to the candid judgment and experience of Spiritualists whether they have found Materialists to be really such degraded, sensuous, selfish beings as they represent the Materialist of their fancy to be. Do they make worse husbands, wives, citizens and neighbors than others who believe in immortality? But what is there in Materialism that it should be continually subject to such choice adjectives as gross, bald, grovelling, etc., etc.? The first reason usually given is, that it places its adherents on a level with the "beasts which perish;" if "a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast, as the one dieth so dieth the other," then because he is like the beast in this respect, like the beast he must be in all respects. I cannot think this presentation of the case is ever put in sober earnest. Everyone knows that man has a pre-eminence above a beast, though both may die alike, and alike depend on eating, drinking, sleeping and exercise for life; though they live alike and die alike, or even possess immortality alike, there is a difference between them, and a superiority that belongs to man. Tigers are cruel, lambs are innocent, dogs are faithful, doves are loving, foxes are cunning, because such is their nature. Man is intellectual, is benevolent, social, affectionate and loving, because it is his nature; and according to the degree of his natural qualifications so must he act, whether he believe in immortality or not. I do not assert that belief has no effect upon our actions, it certainly has, but belief itself depends upon our natural constitution; there are people who are by nature Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Spiritualists, Deists, Atheists, etc.; and though they be educated in the Catholic, Mohammedan or Hindoo faith their belief and practice will be characterized by those peculiarities which divide Protestantism and philosophy into so many sects and parties.

Another reason commonly given is, that if this life were all, that if beyond death justice could not overtake us, either in the form of rewards of merit, or punishment for crime, then every inducement to do well, or to avoid injustice and wrong, would be taken away; our only care would then be to "eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die"—no matter at whose expense or what expense. I for one, as a Materialist, repudiate such sentiments, and I have never met a Materialist who entertained them. They—all the well doing Materialists I have known—do well because it is their present interest to do so; they perform duties in which are involved self sacrifices because of the nobility of their natures, for Materialism has its list of heroic martyrs as well as Spiritualism, by whatever name known; they avoid injustice to others, because they would have others be just to them, and because of that self respect which will not stoop to degrading actions. Does a belief in another life furnish higher, nobler motives? Are those who do good because they look for reward in the eternities, or to avoid punishment in a world to come, free from the charge of selfishness? Has the patriot who dies for his country, the martyr who loses his life for his faith, the man who daily does his duty as he knows it, but has neither faith nor hope nor fear of a life yet to come; or the parties who do the same deeds because of the cheering prospect of reward in heaven or the spirit world, the greater claim to unselfishness? And surely it will not be asserted that men and women have, without a belief in immortality, not done these noble deeds; at least the Spiritualist will surely not say this.

One of the spots on the Christian faith is its appeal to our selfishness for the performance of what is deemed by Christians to be the noblest deeds: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and its righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." I have a greater admiration for the saint, spoken of by Bulwer, who would not tell a lie even to gain heaven. The nobler man is he who acts nobly regardless of consequences, or whether there be consequences. But neither the conduct nor character of believers or unbelievers prove any doctrine true or false. Because all, or almost all, who depart this life from the gallows have a belief in a life after death, not only then, but also when they did the deed which brought them there, it does not follow that a belief in immortality makes murderers, though it does prove that such belief does not prevent murder and other crime, or, in such cases, furnish sufficient motives for better conduct, nor does it prove the soul's immortality false. Nor is Materialism proven to be false even were all Materialists "bald," selfish and grovelling, any more than Spiritualism would be false were all Spiritualists free-lovers and adulterers; or Christianity, were all Christians narrow-minded, bigoted and uncharitable. Fair play, friends. No good is done to any cause by libelling its opponents. Give the Devil his due.

ASTROLOGY—NO. 6.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

When I cast a Horoscope for the moment of one's birth, and calculate the Nativity, this is called "Genethliacal Astrology." When I hear that a house has been robbed, a man killed, or any important event, about which I desire further information, I note the time of hearing the news, and cast a Horoscope for that moment the same as though a child had been born. Then I read the Horoscope by rules entirely different from those that apply to Nativities. This is called "Horary Astrology." When, by still different rules, I calculate events for this earth, such as earthquakes, plagues, etc., it is called "Mundane Astrology," one branch of which, treating upon the rise and fall of empires, the overthrow of governments, etc., is called "Political Astrology." In this number I propose to treat upon

MUNDANE ASTROLOGY.

The dignitaries of the Roman Catholic church, especially the monks, preserved a knowledge of Astrology for hundreds of years before the revival of letters. Being quite expert in Mundane Astrology they often gained credit for being the prophets of God, through whom he breathed his holy spirit, inspiring them to foresee the future. So, too, by Horary and Genethliacal Astrology they were able to make predictions which in the course of time were so exactly fulfilled that the ignorant masses naturally accepted of them as the chosen servants of the living God. In order to keep up the deception, and pass for inspired prophets, these deceivers were the most determined enemies of all other Astrologers, declaring Astrology to be of the devil, and those who practised it, outside the church, were dragged to the dungeon, the rack, and the burning stake.

Evil for the earth is indicated by the evil configurations of the malignant planets, and good by a favorable configuration of the benefics. In order to determine the location on the earth where the effects will be felt, it must be known what part of its surface is ruled by each sign of the Zodiac. Thus, a train of aspects wherein Mars is chief, may indicate a conflagration. If this culminate in Gemini, I should expect the evil for the whole United States, and also for London, for Gemini rules both. If in the sign Cancer, then the city of New York will be threatened, for it is ruled by Cancer.

In the beginning of 1871, being in Oregon, I calculated a train of evil aspects which would culminate in Cancer during the latter part of June and fore part of July, indicating earthquake, money panic, riot and railroad accident. I stated the facts in my public lectures in Auburn, Baker City, El Dorado and Malheur, and also wrote them to an eminent banker of New York city, one whose name well is known on this coast, long before the time arrived for the fulfillment. I have a letter from this banker, subject to the inspection of any one, wherein he describes the fulfillment of my prediction, as nearly correct. There was this discrepancy, however; instead of an accident to a railroad, it occurred to a ferryboat, when hundreds were killed or injured. But this was quite similar to a railroad accident. There was an earthquake, a money panic and riot as predicted, the earthquake coming ten days before the time I set, the riot two days later, while the money panic was on time. This banker has paid me hundreds of dollars for calculating for him, but has a dreadful fear of being ridiculed, hence the reason that I withhold his name.

The predictions of M. L. Knapp, M. D., published in the Medical Journal in Oct. 1872, to which a correspondent of COMMON SENSE alludes, in the issue of Nov. 14, pertain to Mundane Astrology, and are doubtless correct in the main, so far as projected by Mr. Knapp. But there are two important omissions, namely, he does not name the sign of the Zodiac, nor the country ruled by that sign, in which the several planets will gain their perihelion. Hence, no particular spot of earth is indicated; so millions may be dreading the evil effects who are not in the slightest danger, and millions may not be expecting it on whom the evil is destined to take effect. I have waited for two years, hoping that some Astrologer more deeply learned in the science than myself would finish up the work of this prediction, but thus far all are mum.

I disagree entirely with Mr. Knapp about the effect of Jupiter's perihelion. He considers it evil, whereas I am positive that it is favorable. It is the conjunction, opposition or quartile aspect of Saturn to Jupiter which denotes evil, not Jupiter himself, who, uncontaminated by the evil rays of the malefics always proves the harbinger of good. But Jupiter, the sun or Moon afflicted by a malignant ever denotes evil, according to the sign in which the configuration culminates. This will be better understood by my stating the exact configurations on which I based my prediction for New York city in 1871.

The Sun and Jupiter in Cancer, the ruling sign; Saturn was in Capricornus, in opposition; Mars in Libra, in quartile to all three. The Sun and Jupiter denoted Money; Saturn rules land, the earth, etc., while Mars denotes all kinds of violence. Hence I predicted money panic, earthquake, riot and railroad accident. I fixed the scene for New York, because Cancer rules that city.

The perihelions of Uranus, Saturn and Mars will cause evil to such places on the earth as are ruled by the Signs of the Zodiac in which the planets are transiting at the culmination, but I look with more dread from the conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in the year 1881, occurring as it does when they are both so near their perihelion. From the time that Saturn and Jupiter are in conjunction till they gain an opposition, is about ten years, and ten years from opposition to conjunction. Thus, every ten years the Astrologer looks for important changes of some kind, usually evil, on the earth. So, too, in some Nativities, (not all,) where this configuration occurs in an angle. If on the Midheaven, the person is disgraced or becomes bankrupt, or something of the kind. If on the Ascendant, health fails or death ensues.

The next conjunction of these two planets will prove more serious than it has for hundreds of years. It culminates the last of April or first of May, 1881. I have not taken pains to calculate it accurately, but it will operate some months both before and after. It occurs in Taurus, which rules Ireland, Persia, Great Poland, Asia Minor, the Archipelago and Southern parts of Russia. Taurus also rules Dublin, Mautua, Leipsic, Parma, Franconia, Lorraine, the islands of Cyprus and Samos and the port and vicinity of Navarino. Hence I predict that these countries and places will be afflicted in 1881. Furthermore, persons having Taurus on the Midheaven of their Horoscopes suffer serious losses and misfortunes. Those with Taurus on the Ascendant will be in danger of sickness or death, and so on for the other ten points of the Horoscope, according to the place of each, some, in which the evil will scarcely be felt, and others where it will be serious. In my own Horoscope, evil is threatened for my wife in 1881: also that I shall have trouble in public matters.

POLITICS AND RELIGION IN THE GRANGES.

BY A. GAYLORD SPALDING.

It is evidently a wise regulation to exclude from the Granges all exciting and bitter debates and discussions of partizan politics and sectarian religion, which tend to distract and divide the Order; since the success and prosperity of any people or enterprise require a spirit of harmonic unity and co-operation, firm and unwavering, that the winds cannot shake. But the principles of true politics and true religion are very different things. We want a new political and religious dictionary for workingmen. When politics means home interests, and every day duties of labor, production, wealth and comfort, then it properly belongs to the Grange. We also need a new defining of religion. When that is made to consist of love, affection, brotherhood, sisterhood, it at once becomes most heavenly in its character, and fit for the Patrons and the family.

The politics of party, as understood by professional politicians, is of course wholly unsuited to Grange exercises, because the principle of equity and brotherhood is not its basis. Its motive is selfish, and its methods a continual conflict for personal station and aggrandizement and the spoils of office. It is rough, heartless, wrangling and unprincipled, and consists of cunning tricks of leadership and caucus management, election days, and counting votes. It is the politics of lottery speculators, and not of the common people; of salary grab and monopoly, and not of plain, honest production; of the small-souled trinket peddler, and not of the fair and sober farmer, mechanic and worker.

The religion of sect, like party politics, is a thing of popular aristocratic professional church leadership—of theological dogmas, controversy and speculation. It gives an easy living to men in high seats of sanctimony, who pick their bread from the hard toiling class. It is not the religion of humanity, and not the kind for the Grange. It dwells too much in the clouds of mixed and debatable theologies, and soars too far above the heads of common minds and common sense. We want the practical, with less theory and Sunday formulæ, and more real solid work of moral reform and social improvement; less of costly and gaudy steeples, and more of home culture. That is sensible Grange religion.

Partizan editors and leaders are highly gratified with the fact that the Granges are non-political, and expect, therefore, to retain their party leadership, as heretofore, and secure the offices and emoluments right along, under the old names. The late election is claimed as a glorious democratic triumph. But is it not a mistaken interpretation? Aye, that is the delusion of it. Certainly, it is a different sort of democracy, so far as the Grange vote is concerned. There has been a considerable of a land-slide under our very feet, and we stand on advanced ground. Some don't seem to know it, yet so it is, nevertheless. With the Grangers it is now a democracy with an equal rights plank. The reform element is infused, which commends it.

Woman suffrage is a grand and happy feature of the Grange. Woman, in the old parties, has no recognition as a part of the human family, except as a mere subject, but is kept down as something below the human. But now she rises up, and is welcomed to the Grange, to its politics and its new government. Her domestic services fit her most admirably for government housekeeping, and such a cleaning out of the Augean stables of masculine corruption will be marvelous in our eyes. Our bachelor-hall government will be changed by the new order from a house of moral disorder to a ladies' parlor and home of industry, refinement, frugality and economy. Man without woman is but half man. With her help corruption must fall, and monopoly cease.

The Grange philosophy remodels our old politics in all its practical arrangements, and brings the ruling power home to the people. It individuates them, and makes each one personally responsible. Home strength and manly dignity are self-sustaining, and more important to the country than any outside law. It is its own law, and if united it is public law. Unite then, workers—combine in a compact body. Organize, co-operate! We have sense enough among the people, scattered round, confused; but it must be transferred from the city to the country—from the delicate professionals to the rough-skinned industrials. The farmer's home is made his royal palace. The November election is past, and we wait a whole year for another. But the workingman can never wait so long for the political wagon. He requires his daily meals with his regular toil, and to depend on legislators and congressman is a discouraging life delay. The home is a little world—a kingdom—to every family.

Let us understand that co-operation kills all monopoly. The Grange saves the farmers, and all should therefore come into Granges and lodges. Dairy associations are co-operative, and when cows co-operate all can eat cheap butter and cheese. The world is a big monopoly of kings, presidents, governors, money and professions, to be subdued by co-operation. The post office is a grand example of universal co-operation, most perfect and beautiful. A letter goes thousands of miles for one cent, or three cents, when, if a man carried his own mail, his correspondence would cost a fortune! So all things are cheapened by co-operation. Banks are cruel monopolies; the few are rich; the many poor. Apply co-operation to finance, and every workingman will have plenty of work and money.

Love is co-operative. Marriage co-operates the sexes, and equal rights make it happy. Woman's ballot will equalize. Death, death to monopoly! Lawyers monopolize law, and doctors medicine, and rob the ignorant masses. The priest monopolizes religion, and lives nice and easy, fine and cozy, with very little work. Co-operation is our remedy. There is no monopoly in heaven. All are in the Grange. Anti-monopoly is the essence of Grange politics and Grange religion.

What a mighty revolution in a single day, as it were, and that without blood! Now, instead of a king, with his sword to awe his subjects, we have thousands of farmers with the plow, mechanics with their tools, and women with the needle, broom, cookstove and cradle—each and all armed with the ballot. The hand that holds the bread is the power that makes the law. The farmer's granary is his bank; he holds the key, and should govern the transportation. Under Potter law, or no law, the right belongs to the people—the common people. This is true democracy.

Now, it is plain that such discussion is eminently appropriate to the Grange in its county councils, and in the newspaper. It is friendly and brotherly, and requires unchecked and unlimited free speech. Let it rouse up the sleeping apathy of all drudged laborers over the whole land. The idea is strange and absurd, that Grangers have tied their own hands or choked their own mouths in any true sense of politics. The reform movement is really both political and religious, practically. Theologically, none but free religion can succeed in the Order. Toleration is freedom.

PROOFS OF ANOTHER LIFE.—No 3.

BY B. SHRAFL.

November 4th, 1867, the old lady, Mrs. Garland, gave the following communication through the Banner of Light circle, through Mrs. Conant, and which was printed in the Banner January 4th, 1868. I will give her own words with some omissions:

I want my children in Paris (Me.) to know I can come; they ignored the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism when I was here; they said I accepted a delusion, and that I should awake from the dream to be terribly disappointed. I want them to know that I have realized in my spirit home all I expected to, and all my angel guardians told me I should. I am happy here, oh so much happier than I should have been had I not had the beautiful faith before death that I did have. * * * I was sixty-nine years here in the earth life; I passed through many very trying scenes. I am glad I have suffered, for the joys of my spirit home now are so much greater than they would be had I never suffered. * * * I was Elizabeth Garland, and died in Rockland, Me.; I want my children always to look upon Mr. Shrafl as a friend; I died at his house; he was as kind to me as a son would be. * * * I was a medium; my friends in spirit talked with me; I used to hear them talk and sing, and had a variety of manifestations. (On the question by the chairman, Mr. White, if her friends persecuted her on account of her belief, she answered:) Oh! yes, they did, but they hurt themselves more than me; they drove me right into a pleasant place to die. I ought to be very thankful for their persecution; I am; and I want them to know that Spiritualism did not hasten my death, it only smoothed the way—Good day.

During her illness we often talked together of her change for the other life, of which she always spoke with pleasure, as one preparing for a pleasant journey. She promised me that if she found the other world a real natural world as this, (only spiritual) that she would communicate it to me whenever a favorable opportunity offered, especially at the Banner of Light circle, through Mrs. Conant, (who is a trance medium, and entirely unconscious when controlled by the invisibles. How well she kept her promise the two communications fully prove; the first through Foster, four months after her change, unthought of, and uncalled for by me; the second one two months later, through Mrs. C. as promised to me, but given when I was not present; in fact I had forgotten about it in the press of business. These two communications positively prove to me that we live after the change called death, and if one human being lives, all must live. Secondly, that we retain the faculties and characteristics which we possessed when in earth life, whatever they were, good or bad, that we carry them with us, and therewith proving our individual identities, which she in her case fully proved to me. I am aware of the objection some may raise, in asking what positive evidence I have that it was her? Suppose that it was not her, but some one else, that would not invalidate the positive evidence of an after life. But in this I am convinced it was her by the peculiar characteristics which I had known to be hers for many years; also from the evidences she gave:

First—The promise she made before passing over that she would communicate to me, which promise she fulfilled, verbally as well as by writing, giving in both instances her full name.

Second—Giving not only her name, but also my name and residence, and that she died at my house.

Third—That her children live in Paris, (Me.) and speaking of their opposition to her belief, which was true.

Fourth—That she carried the same affectionate feeling with her that she had towards me—like that of a mother towards her son—which she so strongly expressed in both communications.

Fifth—Proving also in her communication that she was a medium when in earth-form, and that she heard spirits sing and talk, which was true.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, JAN. 9, 1875.

Mrs. LAURA CUFFY SMITH lectures before the Spiritualists' Union, 911 Market street, to-morrow afternoon and evening. See notice of subject in daily papers.

FREE RELIGION.—"The Actual Religious Battle, or Free Religion versus the Old Creeds," is the subject of a lecture to be given at Mercantile Library Hall to-morrow evening, January 10, by Prof. Vander Naillen, Principal of the School of Civil Engineering, 606 Montgomery street, and late Secretary of the Free Religion Society of Chicago.

We this week send specimens of COMMON SENSE to many persons who are not subscribers, and we earnestly request all who would be glad to sustain such a paper to send us their names and the money. If you cannot send $3 send $1, or even fifty cents. The postage is paid at this office, but we are willing to accept it from our subscribers, if offered. It is only fifteen cents per year.

The usual Mediums' Seance will be held in Charter Oak Hall next Tuesday evening, under the direction of Mrs. Logan. The Sunday evening seances have been temporarily discontinued, partly on account of the ill health of Mrs. Foye, and partly to afford the spiritualistic friends of Dr. P. B. Randolph to hear him speak from a spiritual platform.

Another farce has been commenced in Spain. A proclamation has been issued informing the people that the nation has chosen Alfonso, son of the ex-Queen Isabella, seventeen years of age, to be King of Spain. Will the time ever come when the people will begin seriously to inquire who it is that assumes to act in their name and select their rulers, and why?

We received too late for this issue a communication from Geo. W. Lewis, entitled "Helios versus Hagios," being a reply to Prof. Chaney. It covers twelve pages of foolscap, and probably, when printed, will not be read by one in ten of our subscribers. Had we dreamed that Prof. Chaney's article would draw forth a reply so voluminous and so full of learned words, we would have rejected it, but having given one side we feel bound in justice to give the other, then shut down on the matter. COMMON SENSE is not intended to serve as a vehicle for long dissertations on mere words. It is a paper for ideas, and the more pointedly they can be expressed the better.

We are requested by Dr. Swain to give notice that he will receive and forward donations to Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly.

THE subject of Spiritualism has been under discussion before the Society for Self Culture during the last month, and is still up for consideration. A few good speeches have been made, for and against, but most that has been said is not worthy of report. There has been much denunciation, and very little calm comparison of views; not much apparent desire to get at the truth, but a great deal of effort to carry a point and get the better of an antagonist. The spirit that actuates most of the speakers is one to be deprecated, as tending neither to earnest inquiry and self culture, nor to the instruction of others. One of the best essays presented was at the close of last Sunday's meeting, an argument adverse to Spiritualism, by a young man named Hester. We regret our inability to obtain it for publication. Although opposed to our views, it was so fairly and so ably written that we would gladly give it greater publicity. To-morrow the discussion will be opened by Mr. Lundi, an opponent of Spiritualism. The question is, in substance, "Is the phenomena of Spiritualism worthy the attention of men of Science?"

Philadelphia journals speak in high terms of the inspirational lectures of J. J. Morse, of London, who is spending a few months in this country. He will speak in Boston, New York, Chicago and other cities. From reports of lectures given by Mr. Morse in England, and the favorable accounts of him since his arrival in the United States, we judge that his discourses are of a high order. We have several of Mr. Morse's orations in pamphlet form, also an essay on inspirational speaking, the latter containing so much valuable information that we shall, as soon as we can find space, give extracts for the instruction of our readers on this little understood subject. Mr. Morse, we believe, ignores some of the questions on which the Spiritualists of America are so divided, and consequently draws large audiences from all classes wherever he goes. He would without doubt receive a warm welcome in California, if his engagements permitted him to visit this State.

The Grangers Association of California has issued a large 24 page monthly, called the Grangers' Guide, which has some good matter very badly arranged. The "make up" of the paper shows a lamentable want of taste, and the editorial, if there really is any, is scarcely distinguishable from the advertisements. The entire sheet presents the appearance of a paper published for the purpose of making money by the use of the Grangers' organization; whereas it should be an exponent of the views and a defender of the interests of the laboring classes. It would exert more influence, and accomplish more good, if it did not advertise at all, but it certainly should not make advertising its principle object. The first number is not worthy the powerful organization under whose auspices it is published.

The California Agriculturist is the very best Farmers' paper published in this State. It is a monthly, only $1.50 per year. It is worth double the money. Address S. H. Herring & Co., San Jose.

MATERIALIZATION IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The seances of Mrs. C. M. Sawyer and Mr. Jones, now held at 1145 Mission street, are increasing in interest, and the manifestations gradually growing in power. The report published in the Chronicle of a seance at which Senator Jones, Detective Lees and others have attended, although in some respects true, was unjust in the intimation that there was any evidence of fraud. No "expose," as claimed, took place. The simple fact was that the party was composed of persons most of whom were fully convinced in advance that the demonstrations must be humbug; that they could not be anything else.

The spirit, of itself unfavorable to manifestations, led to tedious and in some respects absurd preparations to prevent fraud, lasting an hour and a half, during which the magnetic power, as well as the patience of the mediums, was exhausted, and of course the results were unsatisfactory. The "conditions" required were not there, nor could they be had in such a circle. The "investigators," if such they can be called, did not clasp hands as required by the rules, did not keep quiet, nor was any effort made to secure a calm state of mind and harmonious feeling, all of which are as essential to success as electric batteries and unbroken wires are necessary to secure the transmission of messages by telegraph. Nearly all the requirements for success were ignored, and then because the manifestations were not produced in the way they demanded, the mediums were denounced as humbugs. On an evening succeeding this, one of the attaches of the Chronicle was again present, and witnessed some excellent manifestations. When asked if he was not satisfied, he replied no, he was not, because he could not ascertain the modus operandi of the humbug. If he could have proved a fraud, he would have been satisfied. That is what he went there for, not to ascertain the truth, but to establish his own opinion.

Since the so-called "expose," the editors of this paper have attended a seance at the house, 1145 Mission, and the materializations were much more distinct than on previous occasions, while there appeared to be no reason for suspecting the mediums of fraud. Various faces appeared at the cabinet window, and answered questions by signs. One evening a spirit purporting to be the mother of a German present, spoke to him in the German language, which is not understood by the medium.

Some fault is found by skeptics because the cabinet is not placed in the room with the circle, so that it may be examined on all sides; and we admit that this would be far more satisfactory. Why it is not done has not yet been explained, further than that there is not room. We think that some time, when there is a small circle, the request should be complied with.

We do not say the materializations are genuine beyond a doubt, for we have not yet had sufficient opportunity for investigation, but we do unhesitatingly assert that no fraud has as yet been discovered. When such is the case, we desire to be the first to expose it.

THE HERRING-HATCH LIBEL.

In answer to inquiries for information concerning this matter, although somewhat late in the day, we give the following brief statement: S. H. Herring and others were publishers of a Local Option paper in San Francisco. In June last the paper gave publicity to a statement that the Rev. J. L. Hatch had been "twice packed home in a state of downright drunkenness." Mr. Hatch's request for a retraction not being complied with, suit was brought. Mr. Herring testified that his object in publishing the statement was to help Local Option and injure the Anti Local Option cause, of which Mr. Hatch was an earnest advocate. No attempt was made to prove the truth of the libel, in justification, but only lack of personal malice. This Judge Payne said, in passing sentence, was not sufficient. The libel was an atrocious one, and was utterly unsustained by evidence. The Judge said he would have considered it a public calamity if a jury had acquitted the defendant, because it would be virtually saying to the people, you cannot count on protection from libel, however grievous, by law, and must take redress into your own hands if you would make sure of it. But as the defendant had retracted his plea of not guilty, and finally acknowledged the complete falsity of the libellous charge in a public manner, satisfactory to Mr. Hatch, he would make the sentence as light as practicable—a fine of $350. The charge against Herring's partners—Markham and Casey, was dismissed, on the ground that they were not aware of the libellous charge till after publication.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE FESTIVAL.—What there may be in the signs of the times to call for a woman suffrage jollification at this early period in the struggle, we are not informed, but reason or no reason a rejoicing was held at Mayfield, on Tuesday, the 29th, and it was a real genuine good one, and was participated in by a large number of the friends of the cause from this city, as well as from Santa Clara, Sacramento and other counties. Mrs. Sarah Wallis, the President of the State Woman Suffrage Association, resides at Mayfield, and a large number of the visitors found pleasant quarters at her commodious mansion. The public meeting was held in the hall of the principal hotel in the evening. Brief speeches were made by Col. Heath, of Santa Cruz; Mrs. E. P. Kingsbury, of Reno, Nevada; Judge Wallis, of Mayfield; Mrs. Emily Pitts Stevens and Mrs. Boyer, of San Francisco; Mrs. Laura De Force Gordon, of Stockton, and Miss Sallie Hart, of San Jose. There was music and finally dancing, with a splendid supper at midnight, and a good social time. It is spoken of as the most enjoyable affair of the kind ever held in the State, and to Mrs. Wallis, the hostess of the occasion, belongs principally the credit of making it a success.

Number 12 of Sherman & Hyde's Medical Review, the December number, closes the first volume. The experiment has proved a great success. It is only one dollar per year, while the new music contained in it is worth five times that sum, to say nothing of the selections, art notes, poetry, editorial matter, correspondence, etc.

GOOD WISHES FOR "COMMON SENSE."

The editor is constantly in receipt of letters in which the paper is referred to in complimentary terms. We do not generally publish them, because it seems like self laudation to make such praise public. The following are specimens: W. B. Wilcox, of Boston, a practical helper in the work in which we are engaged, sends a large number of names of persons to whom specimens of the paper may be sent. While thanking him for this kindness, we suggest to others to do the same, and thereby assist in spreading a knowledge of the paper among the people. We desire especially names of Liberals residing in this State, those who may feel an interest in sustaining an exponent of Spiritualism. Mr. Wilcox says:

The Common Sense must and will live, and be a power in the right direction. The "invisibles" have it in charge. Mundanes must nurse the child, keep it free from disease, and ere long we will have a full grown man—a Common Sense worthy the broad and rich land of its birth.

A letter received by the editor from J. J. Morse, the inspirational speaker from England, expresses hopes for the prosperity and continued usefulness of COMMON SENSE. The following is an extract:

J. M. Spear gave me some late numbers of your paper, the first I have seen. I have read them with pleasure, and I trust so good a sheet may have the circulation it is worthy of. I am having splendid times here, and expect to be re-engaged. I am speaking to over 1200 people every Sunday. I contemplate re-visiting this country in 1876; should I do so I am desirous of coming on to your section. I should like to spend three or four months during the winter with you. Shall be glad to hear from you what prospects I might meet with. I should have my wife with me then. I trust the good cause goes bravely on with you; that the angels are working wisely and well. Common sense Spiritualism, free from all affixes or prefixes, is the thing we must labor for.

A Sacramento correspondent, whose letter we are obliged to hold over until next week, says a "dozen such papers as COMMON SENSE, well distributed in the Union, would bring about such a demand for reform in the political world that longer resistance would be impossible."

Rev. J. L. Hatch, of Santa Clara, who, by some oversight, has not recently received COMMON SENSE, writes to know the cause, and says: "I like your paper very much, and would gladly aid it pecuniarily," etc.

As our friend has already paid for his paper in advance, he probably means that he would be glad to give something extra. Gifts, from those who can afford to give, are acceptable, but what we would greatly prefer is aid in extending our subscription list. If our subscribers would each procure one more, the paper would be placed on a paying basis, and it would not need any gifts. Many thanks to our correspondent for other kind suggestions in his letter—hints that we have already acted upon. The article inclosed (concerning revivals) is in type, and will be published next week.

The "History of Culture" by John S. Hittell, is spoken of as an excellent work. It is full of facts.

A WELCOME CHILD.

Among the Special Notices, on page 410, will be found one announcing the birth of a child in terms so unusual that it at once attracted our attention. Very few publishers in California would give space to such a notice, even as an advertisement, but as it is a simple statement of a fact, and one certainly of some interest in social science, we did not feel disposed to exclude it. Being somewhat curious to know what Astrology has to say of one born under such circumstances, we submitted the time of birth to Professor Chaney for examination, without informing him of the child's parentage. The following is a brief statement based on the horoscope drawn by him:

NATIVITY.

Female child born in San Francisco, January 4, at 11:40 P. M.—The sign Libra, the best of the twelve, was rising, with Jupiter on the ascendant. Therefore Venus is her significator, or ruling planet, and Jupiter co-significator. The configurations are very favorable, indicating a good constitution, long life, amiable disposition, a lover of justice, generous, charitable, and very humane. The aspects of Uranus show that she is a natural skeptic and medium, endowing her with a knowledge at birth that is superior to any that can be acquired by study. The intellect will be much above average, but be somewhat eccentric. The position of all the planets, save Uranus, being under the earth denotes that the last half of life will prove more successful than the first half. Movable signs on the angles forshadow many changes in life, and that she will never be settled long at a time.

SPIRITUALISM IN CARSON CITY.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—You will see by the date of my letter I am in Carson City. Why it is called a city I have not found out yet, having been a resident here but a few days. I have met a few progressive Spiritualists here, and learn from them that there are many more, but it is the same old story; they are afraid to come out and show their colors. I shall do what I can to gather together the faithful, that we may hold sweet converse with the loved ones gone before. I learn many are ready if they can find some one to take the lead. I have never considered myself competent to be a leader, but will try to encourage some one who is. Mrs. Kerns is expected here some time the coming month to give a few public seances. I think she will meet with great success. I will write you from time to time of our progress. Yours for truth and fraternal love, Carson City, Dec. 30, 1874.

MARY A. STIRLING.

"THE ANCIENT BAND."—Is it a verity? Proofs of the identity, or personality, of this remarkable association of spirits are accumulating. Mr. Winchester has intelligence from Dr. Alonzo Denison, of Ridge Mills, N. Y., father-in-law of Mrs. D. H. Eddy, (now at Chittenden, Vt.) through friends in the East, that twelve of these Ancient Spirits have put in their appearance in a materialized form at the Eddy seances. Interesting particulars of this manifestation are expected from Dr. Denison in time for next week's paper. Photographs of the "Ancient Band" may be seen at this office.

A MONUMENT OF THE RIGHT KIND.

On Sunday last Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith gave two excellent lectures before the Spiritualists' Union, in the afternoon, "Our Obligations to Doubt," and in the evening, "The Promise of the Dawn." Both discourses are spoken of in high terms by those who listened to them. Being unable to attend we asked Professor Chaney to give us an abstract, but he said a mere abstract would be unsatisfactory, and he selected, instead, one point of the evening discourse, of which he says:

As I took no notes, and depend upon memory for the language used, I shall aim to give her ideas, as I understood them, rather than her words. She had been requested to exert her influence for raising a fund to erect a monument to the memory of A. B. Whiting, and this was her reply:

"No, I will do nothing of the kind. Not that I fail to appreciate the noble work he has done for the cause of Spiritualism; not because I do not cherish his memory as among the best and purest of reformers that I have ever met, one whose life was devoted to humanity; not for reasons like these do I refuse, but because I will not insult the pure spirit of Brother Whiting by aiding to squander money in the erection of cold marble over his ashes, when the same money might be employed for the good of humanity, just as he would have suggested, in raising up living, breathing monuments, an honor to themselves and a blessing to their fellows, not only in time but eternity. No, I am fully committed to reforms, in all directions, and cannot imitate society in its cold, mechanical method of honoring those who have won laurels of fame by devoting their lives to the good of mankind. But the kind of monument which I would raise to the memory of my Brother, and one that should win an approving smile from his loving spirit, would be to seek out some friendless orphan, some poor boy, struggling in rags and poverty, already clinging to vice and reaching forth for crime. I would find such a boy, and then in the name of A. B. Whiting I would baptize him at the fountain of Eternal Love; I would train him in paths that lead upward; I would educate him in wisdom; I would win him to virtue and goodness. His manhood should realize the full fruition of my labors. His life should be one of devotion and sacrifice, ever striving to alleviate the suffering of his fellows, and when at last his earth mission should be completed, his purified spirit should wing its way to the celestial abode, a glorious monument through all eternity."

I despair of conveying to the mind of the reader the emotions which I experienced as I listened to this strain of eloquence, pouring forth like a resistless torrent, every word falling clear and ringing like new coin from the mint. But after all it was not so much the words as the sentiment, so grand, so glorious, the very embodiment of true reform.

W. H. C.

We agree fully with our correspondent and the speaker on the subject of monuments to the dead, and we are glad to perceive also that the public sense is turning in the same direction on this subject. It was recently proposed to raise money for a monument to Ezra Cornell; whereupon the Golden Age says:

It is proposed to raise the money for a monument to Ezra Cornell by one dollar subscriptions. This is a species of nonsense that has had its day and might as well be abandoned. A man who needs a monument don't deserve one, and the man who deserves a monument don't need one. Mr. Cornell has built his own monument, and one of the noblest in the world. It wears his name and will perpetuate his memory and influence. If anybody has anything to give to show special admiration for his work it should be devoted to further endowment of the University he founded and did so much to build. A Cornell memorial professorship would be a fine thing to establish, particularly a professorship to develop marriage. Miss Plummer left Harvard an endowment for a professorship of the Heart. A Chair of Humanity would meet a needed want in every college we know anything about.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

LETTER FROM A MASSACHUSETTS LADY.

DEAR MRS. SLOCUM:—Please accept my (tardy) thanks for your kindness in sending me copies of your interesting paper, which I enjoyed highly—finding much that was congenial in various articles, and a broad, clear field, where I love to meet all who have conquered or outgrown the prejudices against the advancement of women.

The right of suffrage, to my mind, so clearly belongs to us, that I can hardly comprehend how any intelligent person can still adhere to the old narrow doctrine of the half making laws for the whole. But though this narrowness still exists in a degree among men and women, the final success of the cause is sure.

From Maine to California are the people rapidly awaking to the subject. In every state in the Union, somebody is teaching those men and women to think for themselves, and they have only to think, to be convinced.

We, of New England, have expected to be first to show that "consistency is a jewel" in governments as well as in individuals; but finally we yielded to Michigan—and prayed her success. Michigan had'n't quite light enough. She did all she could.

The friends of suffrage "at home" are looking hopefully toward California—the so termed most enterprising of the States. And California will not disappoint them. We have felt sure of this ever since reading Mr. Sargent's eloquent speech in Congress on the question, and learning on our arrival here that many other able men of the State are as firm and determined advocates as he.

This battle is not left for women to fight. Men see quickly and clearly that the suffrage is not only to benefit women, but the State and the country.

Society will teach better things than it now teaches, when women can be its pillar as well as its ornament.

Very Truly Yours,

O. A. S. BEALE.

Oakland, Cal., Dec. '74.

The Belfast News gives a lengthy account of disturbances in Cookstown, Ireland, supposed to be produced by mischievous spirits. The entire community was thrown into excitement by the demonstrations. The disturbances consist in stone-throwing from unseen hands, and the unaccountable movement of all kinds of furniture, kitchen utensils, etc. Clothing is destroyed, windows broken, etc., in the presence of watchers, but the power that does it is invisible.

CENTINELA LAND COMPANY.

The California Immigrant Union has lately been instrumental in the subdivision and sale of the great Lompoc Rancho, in Santa Barbara county, which has proved a grand success, and it is now engaged in the subdivision and sale of the Centinela and Sausal Redondo Ranches, six miles west of Los Angeles. The tract contains 25,000 acres, all level land, 300 acres of which are in orchard, containing 6000 orange trees four years old and 7000 orange trees three years old—1700 almond, lime and lemon trees, fig, olive, pepper and gum trees, et., etc. The purchase includes 14,000 head of Southdown and Merino sheep; the price for all is $300,000, or $12 per acre including the sheep.

In order to get the enterprise into practical working order, the Centinela Land Company, of Los Angeles, has been formed—capital stock $1,000,000—1000 shares of $1000 each. It is now issuing shares, and will call in $300 on each share to pay for the property; $100 cash, $100 in July, 1875, and $100 in January, 1876—this secures the purchase money. In order to benefit the many new comers to our State, who are looking for small farms, they are subdividing this rancho into 5, 10, 20 and 50 acre tracts, and the first auction sale takes place on the 18th of January, 1875, and another on the 8th of March, 1875. The sale and settlement of these tracts will greatly add to the taxable resources of our State.

Already a great number of new comers have visited the Ranch, and in almost every case have invested in a few shares of stock. A town site of 640 acres has been surveyed near the centre of the tract, with lots 31x135, streets 80 feet wide, and four avenues 100 feet wide. Blocks have been given to each of the Masonic, Odd Fellows, Templars and Grangers Orders, and a 40-acre tract for a college and farm school, one block for a public school, one block for each religious denomination, besides eight 5-acre parks, and a large plaza in the centre of the town. A wharf will be built immediately upon the company's property at the beach, midway between Truxton (Shoo Fly Landing) and Wilmington. The Los Angeles and Pacific Railroad Company has been incorporated to build a railroad from the wharf to Los Angeles, passing through the centre of the rancho. The Main Street and Agricultural Park Street Railway will soon be in operation, under the direction of Governor Downey, Gen. Baldwin, O. W. Childs and others; and as soon as sufficient settlers are located upon the lands, the road will be extended to the town of Centinela.

As a guarantee of success, we will mention the names of the company's directors, viz: F. P. F. Temple, of Temple & Workman's Bank; J. S. Slauson, Treasurer, President of the Bank of Los Angeles; E. P. Howard, Vice President, Apothecaries' Hall; Wm. H. J. Brooks, Secretary; J. M. Griffith, lumber merchant; O. W. Childs, nurseryman; D. Freeman, farmer; Gen. J. H. Shields, Managing Director, farmer; all of whom are fully identified with the greatest interests of our State.

Our citizens in subscribing to the stock will assist in building up one of the greatest interests of the Pacific coast—to wit: the subdivision of our large ranches, and the settlement thereon of a good class of Eastern and European farmers. Parties desiring to subscribe to this stock can call upon Wm. H. Martin, General Agent, 534 California street, San Francisco.

RADICAL LECTURES IN SANTA BARBARA.

Mr. York writes from Santa Barbara, December 28th, a cheering letter, from which we make extracts as follows:

"I have been blessed with great success here, have made a host of friends, and, I trust, have advanced the true interests of Reform. There is nothing wanting to make my work here a complete success. I had large and increasing audiences up to my last lecture, the thirteenth, given last evening. On Wednesday evening last my friends gave me a reception party, netting $50 for my benefit, but the best of all was the grand expression in favor of the principles of Reform, and the hearty response to the truths of our living faith. I love the faces of many dear good people in this little summer land of Santa Barbara. COMMON SENSE lies near my heart, and I have presented its claims both here and in Carpinteria, where I lectured two nights. I have bestowed some labor to secure subscribers for your excellent paper, and the names are all good for the money."

Mr. York sends us seventeen names, and refuses any compensation, having given his commission to those who subscribed, so as to induce friends to take the paper. We hope that our subscription list may in time be large enough to warrant not only reduction in price, but an enlargement of the paper. The more subscribers we receive, the better the paper can be made.

Mr. York's last lecture in Santa Barbara was given for the benefit of the Society, on Tuesday evening of last week. He then went to Ventura, and goes from there to San Bernardino.

Jennie Leys has gone to Santa Barbara, to succeed Mr. York. There is a great contrast between the two speakers, though both have their admirers. As Mr. York always speaks from the impulse of the moment, and his success depends very much upon the sympathy and kindly spirit of his audiences, his efforts are unequal, and we have never felt safe in promising strangers a perfectly satisfactory discourse from him; but with Jennie Leys it is different. Her "control" is so accommodating as to repeat "his" lectures word for word, wherever she goes, and as they were of good quality in San Francisco, we may assure the people of Santa Barbara that they have a treat in store for them.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE.—How few of our people ever think how it comes about that some can dress so fine, yet never work, live in splendid palaces and fine hotels, and fare sumptuously upon dainty viands and costly wines. These things don't grow on trees, neither do clothes, hats, boots and shoes; and if they did the trees would have to be planted, but these people would never do it. They would hatch some scheme to make somebody else besides themselves ply the spade and shovel. Why don't the working people wake up and enquire if God made them to toil for other people; and if so, why?

RESPECTABLE SPIRITUALISTS.

The following is a portion of a truthful letter, written by Madame Blavatsky, to the Spiritual Scientist:

Knowing this country to be the cradle of modern Spiritualism, I came over here from France with feelings not unlike those of a Mohammedan approaching the birth-place of his prophet. I had forgotten that "no prophet is without honor save in his own country." In less than fourteen months that I am here, sad experience has but too well sustained the never-dying evidence of this immortal truth.

What little I have done towards defending my belief, I am ever ready to do it over and over again as long as I have a breath of life left in me. But what good will it ever do? We have a popular and wise Russian saying that "one cosack on the battle-field is no warrior." Such is my case, together with many other poor, struggling wretches, every one of whom, like a solitary watch, sent far ahead in advance of the army, has to fight his own battle, and defend the entrusted post, unaided by no one but himself. There is no union between Spiritualists, no entente cordiale as the French say. Judge Edmonds has said, some years ago, that they numbered in their ranks over eleven millions in this country alone; and I believe it to be true, in which case, it is to be the more deplored. When one man—as Dr. Beard did and will do it yet—dares to defy such a formidable body as that, there must be some cause for it. His insults, gross and vulgar as they are, are too fearless to leave one particle of doubt that if he does it, it's but because he knows too well that he can do so with impunity and perfect ease. Year after year the American Spiritualists have allowed themselves to be ridiculed and slighted by every one who had a mind to do so, protesting so feebly as to give their opponents the most erroneous idea of their weakness. Am I wrong, then, in saying that our Spiritualists are more to be blamed than Dr. Beard himself in all this ridiculous polemics? Moral cowardice breeds more contempt than the "familiarity" of the old motto. How can we expect such a scientific slight-of-hand as he is to respect a body that does not respect itself? We ourselves brought upon our heads that shower of abuse lavished by his hand with the dexterity and ability of a drunken London cockney.

My humble opinion is, that the majority of our Spiritualists are too much afraid for their "respectability" when called upon to confess and acknowledge their "belief." Will you agree with me, if I say that the dread of the social Acropagus is so deeply rooted in the hearts of your American people, that to endeavor to tear it out of them would be undertaking to shake the whole system of society from top to bottom? "Respectability" and "fashion" have brought more than one utter materialist to select (for mere show) the Episcopalian and other wealthy churches. But Spiritualism is not "fashionable," as yet, and that's where the trouble is. Notwithstanding its immense and daily increasing numbers, it has not won, till now, the right of citizenship. Its chief leaders are not clothed in gold and purple and fine raiments; for not unlike Christianity in the beginning of its era, Spiritualism numbers in its ranks more of the humble and afflicted ones, than of the powerful and wealthy of the earth. Spiritualists belonging to the latter class will seldom dare to step out on the arena of publicity and boldly proclaim their belief in the face of the whole world. That hybridous monster, called "public opinion," is too much for them.

Half Christians and half believers in the new dispensation, the majority of those eleven million of Spiritualists stand with one foot on the threshold of Spiritualism, pressing firmly with the other one the steps leading to the altars of their "fashionable" places of worship, ever ready to leap over the protection of the latter in hours of danger. They know that under the cover of such immense "respectability" they are perfectly safe. Who would presume or dare to accuse of "credulous stupidity" a member belonging to certain "fashionable congregations."

A religious faith is like a language. We learn it so gradually that we do not know we have learned it. We think it is nature. We talk because we cannot help it, in a tongue that seems part of our original equipment for life. But when we are thrown into a company talking a language of which we are entirely ignorant, they appear like people drunk or mad. To learn what they say we must begin back at the cradle, and lisp our way up to articulation, a word at a time; and not until after months and years of trying, do we feel sure of our speech, and appreciate the full force and beauty of the language we have acquired. A new faith is a jargon to those who have just escaped from an old one, and have not mastered its terms. It is not surprising that men educated in a system which has been swamped by new discoveries, when they see their old beliefs tottering, and the arguments they have leaned upon break like reeds under the pressure of new demands, falter and gasp for breath. What they want, what we all want, is to see and feel that life has a meaning and a goal; that it is not a wild and purposeless waste of activities, thoughts and aims; that we were created for an object that will be realized at the last in some other world, if not here; and that all the evils and uncertainties and enigmas that overwhelm us now will eventually disappear. We want a great hope born out of convictions and brightening continually to cheer our hearts and nerve us to endeavor in order to gather up the fragments and broken ends of experience into a splendid and ever fulfilling design.—Golden Age.

LETTER FROM SAN JOSE.

MR. EDITOR:—I thought I would drop a line to inform your many readers that our Society for Free Thought still lives. My reason for giving the information is, that I find the impression has gone abroad that we were defunct, and not without reason, for our once prosperous Society has been nearly annihilated by having extreme radical views on the Social Question so continually presented during the last year, until people have become nauseated, although such speakers sometimes draw fair audiences from curiosity, and morbid taste for the vulgar, which to the credit of some of the speakers, it may be said, has not been gratified. Our experience of the past year has demonstrated that such teachings are not beneficial to our interests as a Society, as we have not gained one member, but on the other hand have lost heavily. And right here a hint to lecturers of the Moses Woodhull type: You may get audiences, but the article you labor for does not pay, as an examination of the hat at the close of the lecture invariably proves, and this Society will not, for some time at least, agree to pay any stated sums to speakers; but good speakers need not be afraid of support if they visit us, and save their "Free Love" for some other community. Hoping to report improvement in Society matters ere long, I am yours,

V. W.

P. S.—Brother Hammond, of revival notoriety, is after us red hot. He may have an opportunity to cool ere long.

[For Common Sense.]

MY QUEEN!

BY I. A. HEALD.

Had I the talent ambition might claim,
Or the genius to soar to the sun,
And could for myself win undying fame,
And a name that no mortal had won,—
And if in command of the armies of earth,
With the banner of freedom unfurled,
I would proudly do homage to woman's true worth
And acknowledge her queen of the world.
Yet no queen of a realm, or goddess more fair,
Nor an angel that comes from above,
In the soul of my soul can ever compare
With the beautiful girl that I love.
For she's like a heavenly star that we find
Of reflected in depths of the sea—
And hope, like a star in fond mem'ry enshrined,
Makes her presence a heaven to me.
If pleasures immortal await us above,
On the verge of a heavenly shore,
I would go with the one I most honor and love;
Yet if fate should command me before,
And by some magic its glories were shown
In bright splendors no mortal has seen,
E'en Paradise I would not enter alone,
But would wait at the gate for my Queen.

ATHEISM.

Now 'tis a term of art, a bugbear word,
The villain's engine and the vulgar's terror.
The man who thinks and judges for himself,
Unswayed by aged follies, reverend errors,
Grown old by traditionary dulness
Of school authority, he is an Atheist.
The man who, hating idle noise, preserves
A pure religion seated in his soul,
He is a silent, dumb, dissembling Atheist.
—Sewell's Sir Walter Raleigh.

THE LEVELER.

The king he reigns on a throne of gold,
Fence'd round by his "right divine,"
The baron he sits in his castle old,
Drinking his ripe, red wine;
But below, below in his ragged coat
The beggar he turneth a hungry note;
And the debtor is down with an aching head.
So the world goes!
So the stream flows!
Yet there is a fellow whom nobody knows,
Who maketh all free
On land and sea,
And foreteth the rich like the poor to flee.
The lady lies down in her warm white lawn,
And dreams of the pearly bride;
The milkmaid sings to the mild-eyed dawn,
Sad songs on the cold hillside,
And the bishop smiles, as on high he sits,
O'er the scholar who writes and starves by fits;
And the girl who her nightly needle plies
Looks out for the summer of life—and dies!
So the world goes!
So the stream flows!
Yet there is a fellow whom nobody knows,
Who maketh all free
On land and sea,
And foreteth the rich like the poor to flee.

THE GOLDEN SIDE.

There is many a rest on the road of life,
If we'd only stop to take it.
And many a tone from the better land,
If the querulous heart would take it.
To the sunny soul that is full of hope,
And whose beautiful trust ne'er faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright
Though the Winter storm prevaileth.

Better to hope, though the clouds hang low,
And keep the eye still lifted,
For the sweet blue sky will soon peep through,
When the ominous clouds are rifted.
There was never a night without a day,
Nor an evening without a morning,
And the darkest hour, the proverb goes,
Is the hour before the dawning.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO.

THE STUDY.

FAUST AND MEPHISTOPHELES.

FAUST—A knock! Come in! who wants to plague me now?
MEPHIST.—'Tis I.
FAUST—Come in.
MEPHIST.—Thrice, if you please, repeat it.
FAUST—Come in, then.
MEPHIST.—Well, you're quite civil, I'll allow.
I trust, my friend, you shall agree,
For to dispense your sore ennui,
I'm here, got up in tip-top style,
With scarlet and gold-laced surtout;
My cloaklet of stiff silk, brand-new,
A blue cock's feather in my tulle,
Armed with a rapier long and pointed,
And I'd advise you, for awhile
To get yourself likewise appointed;
And come with limbs untrammelled, free,
A little real life to see.
FAUST—Nay, in that dress too sorely should I feel
The pain of this vile narrow life of earth;
I am too old to join in childish mirth,
Too young, against all hope my soul to steel.
What now to me can yield this world of woe?
"Forego thou shalt!"—"Thou shalt forego,"
That's the eternal song in sooth,
That rings forever in our ear—
To tottering old, from stumbling youth
'Tis the refrain drooned by each creaking year.
Each morn with horror on my lips I wake,
I could weep freely bitter, scalding tears
To see, alas, another bright day break,
Which with no dawn of answered wishes cheers;
Which still the presaged hopes of every bliss
Lessens, with selfish critical detraction,
The bright creations of my consciousness
Hinders, with thousand needs for trumpery action.
And then when night her sable curtain draws,
I sink with drear forebodings on my bed,
E'en there, alas, unrest ne'er makes a pause,
But frightful dreams course shuddering through my head,
The God, who in my bosom reigns supreme
Can deeply move my innermost sensations,
But with the outside world no close relations
Exist in him who o'er my powers is king;
And hence existence is to me a peak,
I hate my life, and long for death and rest.
MEPHIST.—And yet death never seems a very welcome guest!
FAUST—Oh! happy wight, sung in heroic verse,
Around whose blood-stained brow his chilly fingers
Wind the green chaplet of victorious fight;
Whom, whilst the thrill of music round him lingers,
He finds pressed closely to some fair maid's charms
Whom the wild waifs hath left in amorous plight.
Oh! would the all-compelling master's arms
Had pressed my raptured soul 'neath the dark sea of fate.
MEPHIST.—And yet, methinks, upon a certain night,
Some one, I know, that crystal vase drained not?
FAUST—To act the spy it seems is your delight.
MEPHIST.—I'm not omniscient, yet I know a lot.
FAUST—If those sweet tones so loved before,
'Tis back my soul from its abyss,
If strains of happy days of yore
Decoys my lingering childishness,
Now I do curse those thralls that bind
One's silly soul with trick and sham,
And to this vale of woe the mind,
With flattering, blinding influence damn.
Curse first of all those grand ideas
With which one's spirit girds itself;
Curse those deceits which ever decoy us,
Yet cheat the sense with fancied wealth;
Curse those desires of fame and honor,
Which tempt with lasting glories dreams;
Curse all one holds beneath the sun, or
His own as wife, child, servant deems.
Curse be Mammon, when with treasures
He tempts us to rash enterprise;
Curse, when with golden rod he measures
The pillowed couch where idleness lies.
Curse on love's tender, fierce, careless,
Curse be Hope, Faith's buttressed wall,
And patience doubly cursed of all.

Special Notices.

BORN—In San Francisco, January 4, 1875, a daughter to James and Anna Richardson. During a wedded life of four years Mrs. Richardson (then Anna Smith) being in delicate health, lost two young babes, which experience, with other considerations, induced her to become again mistress of herself, as she was prior to marriage. This child, which was desired, and was deliberately begotten in defiance of established usages, bids fair to live, to be a blessing and a benefit to its parents.

Do not fail to read Dr. Docking's advertisement, on the last page.

For the very best Photographs go to Bradley & Rudolfsen's Gallery, with an elevator, 429 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Those suffering from that most annoying of the minor miseries of human life—cold in the head—or from catarrh in any form, should try Dr. Ewory's Diamond Catarrh Remedy. Just try it—that's all. Sold at this office, and by all druggists.

Signs of the Times.

Josiah Warren says that to "organize" working people before they have any idea of equity and liberty is simply to string them like dead herrings on a stick.

The explosion of a boiler recently in a foundry at Liege, Belgium, was caused, as shown on examination by the corrosive action of ferrous sulphate and sulphuric acid, derived from the sulphur in the coal fuel.

The paper barrel business seems likely to amount to something. A manufactory is being erected in Rochester which will turn out six hundred barrels a day. They are much lighter and more durable than wooden barrels.

A chain of compressed cakes of gun cotton tied around the trunk of a large tree and exploded will, it is stated, cut it down instantly by the violence of its action. The cut through the trunk is as sharp as that made by the keenest ax.

Dr. Child says the Holmes are cheats. Very well, but what then is Dr. Child, as a clairvoyant? Did not the Doctor see Katie King in a vision, and receive from her full confirmation of her materialization? Who is the cheat in this case? Will the Doctor please explain?

Lloyd, the map man, has invented a way of getting a relief plate from steel so as to print a map 40x50 inches in size on a power press. This will so much cheapen the price of map-making as to enable him to furnish an unmounted map on bank note paper, plain and unvarnished for 10 cents, or 25 cents colored and varnished.

Dr. Balmano, a London Surgeon, has successfully applied the magic lantern to the study of diseases of the skin. A transparent photograph of the skin is taken and then placed in a magic lantern. A strong hydro-oxygen light casts the picture enlarged on a white sheet, and in this way the smallest details are brought out with astonishing minuteness.

Miss Jennie Worthington of New Orleans, principal of the High School, protested earnestly against the expulsion of her colored scholars. She declared her inability to face her scholars and do so mean a thing, saying, "How can I order that bright-eyed little fellow never to return to this school?" pointing to an intelligent looking boy of twelve years of age, who was one of her smartest and best scholars. The Superintendent relieved her of the embarrassment. The little fellow, with tears in his eyes, begged to remain. Again and again he walked back to his seat, hugged his books tightly, and wept as if his heart would break.

The Hebrew Leader of New York states that in that city three-fourths of the Israelites are not connected with any congregation.

The people of England are rapidly preparing for the disestablishment of the church, a reform that is sure to come within a few years.

The California Agriculturist favors a law compelling owners of teams to lengthen the neck yokes so as to compel the horses to travel in the track with the wheels, thereby hardening and improving country roads.

There are seven girl students in the Colby University at Waterville, Me. The boys at first protested against the innovation, but the girls behave so well, and are so far above the average of their classmates in scholarship, that the prejudices against them are dying out.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who is now on trial for the seduction of Mrs. Tilton, recently caused to be published one of his gushing letters to Edna Dean Proctor, congratulating her on the termination of the Moulton suit, and her paroxysmal reply, both letters showing a good mutual understanding.

The Chicago Times is now publishing extended reports of materializations at the house of Mr. Mott, in Memphis, Tenn. Scores of spirits, who appear as "natural as life," have been seen and talked with by the Times reporter. The evidence is overwhelming in favor of the manifestations.

William Sharon has been elected to the United States Senate from Nevada. It may not be a bad choice, but it is generally admitted that had Mr. Sharon been a poor man, he would not have been chosen. He may have merit otherwise, but really it is his money that takes Mr. Sharon to the Senate. Is this a good sign?

The advance made in science and the arts, in general education and a knowledge of the rights of man, during the year 1874, indicates a steady march of the human race onward and upward in the scale of being. Spiritualism, also, notwithstanding the puerilities and frauds connected with it, has made more converts than during any previous year of its existence as a distinct faith.

Henry Bartlett, for a number of years manager of the Advertising Department of the Christian Union, is now one of the Directors of the Golden Age Publishing Company, and the business of the latter paper is beginning to look up. It is now in its fifth volume, is admirably conducted, and deserves all the support it receives. It is a good "sign of the times" that such a paper is appreciated.

PROOFS OF ANOTHER LIE—No. 4

BY B. SHRAFL.

Having been born with a skeptical mind, I commenced reading from my earliest recollection all works I could get hold of on the subject of religion, many years before I came to the United States. Being obliged to flee from my country at the end of 1848, I was obliged to leave all books and unnecessary baggage behind, with the exception of "Hours of Devotion," in two vol., of 600 pages each, written by Henry Zschokke, a Lutheran Protestant minister, one of the finest religious writers, who died in Germany in 1828. These books, the contents of which have given me much consolation in my dark hours, I have read through many times. Shortly after my introduction to Spiritualism, in 1856, I attended the second lecture that was given on that subject in the town of B., in Maine, through a Mrs. Haskel, a trance medium. After the lecture she stepped down from the platform with her eyes closed, and entirely unconscious, and walked along the aisle towards the door, near which I sat, stepped into the pew before me and commenced addressing me, as one who had personally known me for many years. She spoke of the dangers I had been in, and the many difficulties I had passed through in Europe, and detailed facts that no other human being in the United States knew anything about, and also of my hard struggles here. The spirit speaking through the medium purported to be that of Henry Zschokke. He said I must keep up courage, that better times were coming, and that he would protect and guide me, and avert all sufferings he possibly could. "It was I," he said, "who brought you here in contact with certain families; especially have I influenced Mrs. and Mr. Shaw, who have become such warm friends of yours." He then gave his full name, which the medium had never heard before, as I afterwards ascertained; also his death, which was a few months before I was born. He was attracted to me by my reading his works, which I admired so much, though incomprehensible as it was to me then, as I did not believe in Spiritualism.

In regard to Mendelssohn manifesting himself several times in the same manner, many years previous, as he did through Foster every time, without the slightest knowledge of myself or of the mediums, it was thus: The first time was in 1858, in Canton village, Me., where I had then just commenced teaching music, going there every week, and spending a day or two. I was a perfect stranger outside the six or seven families where I taught. One evening the father of one of my pupils asked me whether I had ever investigated Spiritualism? I told him I had a little, and he asked me if I would like to go to a circle? I said yes. On arriving at the house we found we were late, as the medium was already in trance, controlled by an Indian spirit. There was not an empty seat, so we stood up. Hardly had we entered when the medium, in broken English, addressed me: "This chief has brought lots of musicians with him; he is a musician himself." Then she described several, but most minutely Mendelssohn, precisely as Foster did (nine years afterwards) with the sheet of music in his hand, on which appeared one letter after another, and which she read off. Two years after that he was described to me again in the same manner by a Mrs. Faber, a perfect stranger to me, at my own rooms, in Paris, Me.; a year afterward, in Portland, Me., by a Mrs. Day, and again in Boston through another lady, also a stranger to me, nearly three years afterwards. Neither of all those persons knew me nor what my business was.

ASTROLOGY—NO. 7.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

But few persons are aware of the fact that our language is studded with Astrological terms, phases and principles of the science, transmitted by tradition from an age when every person, making the least pretension to scholarship, was presumed to understand the celestial science of the stars. Their romances, their science, their philosophy, and in fact every species of literature, abounded in Astrology, sometimes with no attempt at concealment, but usually the meaning hidden in an allegory. Space will not permit me to enter fully upon an account of these traditions, yet the few which I give will illustrate the subject.

TRADITIONAL ASTROLOGY.

We say, "a jovial man," which is equivalent to saying "a Jupiter man," jovial coming from the latin Jove, meaning Jupiter, because a Jupiter man is cheerful, merry, and quite free from the melancholy peculiar to the Saturn man. The "mercurial man" is a term derived from the same source. Mercury rules intellect and moves most rapidly in his orbit, performing a revolution about the Sun in 88 days. Persons born under Mercury are quick of motion, ready in speech, lively and stirring. Saturn moves very slow in his orbit, requiring 30 of our years to complete a revolution around the Sun. Persons born under Saturn have great gravity, slow to think and speak, slow to anger and slow to be reconciled. Hence the expression, "saturnine," is discovered to be purely Astrological in its origin and signification.

The word Hyleg signifies "Giver of all life," and it is a circumstance that the ancient pagans, when sick, were in the habit of praying to the Hyleg of their Horoscopes that that their lives might be spared, while, after a lapse of thousands of years, we find Christians addressing their God in the Astrological language of paganism, applying to him the exact definition of Hyleg, namely, "Giver of all life." The Hyleg is the Sun by day and the Moon by night, if in Hylegiacal places, first as we are informed in Genesis I, 16, "And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night." The word translated "rule," as well as the English word "rule," when used in the sense here expressed is purely Astrological, always was, and is today.

It is very easy to account for the expression, "Giver of all life," being found in the Christian solemnities and ceremonies, for Christianity is only a reconstruction of paganism, wherein was remodeled its forms and ceremonies.

Paganism contained far more than Christianity, yet there is not a holy day nor a ceremony in Christianity which did not exist in paganism. Even "the Lord's Supper" was celebrated in Attica more than thirteen hundred years before the Christian era. The pagan religion was founded purely in Astronomy and Astrology, the devotees always addressing their prayers to the Sun, Moon and stars. Hence, in the transition from paganism to Christianity, nothing could be more natural than the transferring of certain modes of expression, from one religion to the other, to be perpetuated by tradition, as in this case.

"I have a house not made with hands, eternal, and in the heavens." No language can be plainer than this. The Sign of the Zodiac rising at one's birth is called his or her "celestial house," to distinguish it from a "mundane house." Thus, in my own case, my "house not made with hands" is the celestial sign Libra; it is "eternal," and it is "in the heavens." The expression is very old, and was doubtless first uttered by an ancient pagan, shivering on the verge of bankruptcy.

"The star of Bethlehem." Nearly a hundred years ago Thomas Paine asked, "If they saw his star in the east, why did they not go east? Why did they go west? Yet no clergyman has as yet undertaken to solve these queries, because no one but an Astrologer can do so. The shepherds were Astrologers, and to this day, in England, an Astrologer is called "a wise man." Hence the reason of the present translation instead of "magii," which is more literal. The Astrologers had a theory that whenever a comet appeared, there would be a prince born in the country ruled by the sign of the Zodiac in which the comet was first seen. In this case the comet was seen in Virgo. Virgo ruled Jerusalem. Therefore the shepherds went to Jerusalem in order to verify their theory. They went west, because Jerusalem lay west of their camp. Had it been east, they would have gone east; or north, they would have gone north, etc.

Paul says he knew a man, fourteen years before, who was caught up into the third heaven and heard words not lawful for a man to utter. Well, twenty-nine years ago I knew a man who had a similar experience, and every man who has been "raised" to the third degree in Free Masonry can testify to the same thing. To show the connection and relation in this case, I must refer the reader to the Masonic Monitor where it says, Geometry and Free Masonry were formerly synonymous." Now Geometry was invented solely to measure the arcs in a Nativity, the same as Logarithms were invented by Lord Napier solely to calculate those arcs. Free Masonry was originally a scientific association, wherein was secretly taught "the seven liberal arts and sciences," chief among which was Astronomy. Hence, as Geometry was the hand-maiden of Astronomy, the saying arose very naturally that Geometry and Masonry were formerly synonymous. The furniture of the Lodge-room, carefully transmitted by tradition, furnishes ample testimony of the Astronomical origin of the order, aside from the ceremonies, which are pure

Astronomical allegories, so ingeniously constructed that even the most intelligent and thoughtful Mason never suspects it, although much of the language is so plainly Astronomical that it cannot be mistaken.

"In my father's house are many mansions." The Aryans of India, the Greeks, Romans and many other nations made Jupiter the "father God," although the two latter agreed in calling him "the god of gods and men," addressing Saturn as the "father," "father of time," "heavenly father" etc. The Jews imitated the Greeks and Romans in the worship of Saturn, but called him "Abraham," and pretended that they were descended from him. They also made his day holy, Saturn's day, Saturday. But the Christians substituted the Sun as the "father God," making his day holy instead of Saturn's, thus, Sun's day, Sunday. In the quotation at the beginning of this paragraph, it is the Sun that is alluded to as "father." As the Sun moves on the ecliptic, never having any latitude, and apparently transiting the entire circle of the heavens every year, this circle is called his "house." Now this "house" is divided into twelve equal parts, usually called "celestial houses," although the Scandinavians and some other nations called them "mansions." To avoid tautology the word "mansions" is here introduced, which also improves the euphony. So there are "many mansions," there being no less than twelve. Persons who sing about "mansions in the skies," are only repeating an old pagan, Astrological expression, adapted to Christianity.

DR. YORK IN SANTA BARBARA.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—Dr. J. L. York of San Jose, who is a prominent and popular lecturer, delivered a course of liberal discourses in Santa Barbara during the month of December. The lectures of Dr. York are somewhat radical, largely humanitarian, intensely practical, and are permeated by an exalted spiritual philosophy.

Dr. York is among the most eloquent and lucid of reformatory speakers, and combines harmonious personal magnetism, with earnest enthusiasm in his labors. It was a new departure for Santa Barbara and there was a warm response from the spiritualists and liberal element, which revealed itself as surprisingly large, and a power which cannot be ignored.

Dr. York was fortunate in his selection of subjects, and inspired his listeners with unfaltering interest and awakened a new zeal in the prominent investigations and reformatory issues of the age. Among the pleasant features of his mission in Santa Barbara was a reception at a public Hall, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion, and a most cordial enjoyment manifested by his many friends.

Dr. York will visit the more southern points of the coast, and Jennie Leyes will occupy an independent platform in Santa Barbara during the present month. S. B.

Santa Barbara, January 9th.

There has been instituted at the Cape of Good Hope, Cape Town, South Africa, a Progressive Library and Spiritual Institution. A collection of books is being made, and a weekly newspaper, the Cape Spiritualist and Family Medium, is being established.

HELIOS VERSUS HAGIOS.

REPLY TO W. H. CHANEY BY GEO. W. LEWIS.

Mr. Chaney, on page 390 of COMMON SENSE, sends up a wail of anguish because the platform at Charter Oak Hall is not free. Were it not for the misrepresentations in his article, I would make no reply, for the reasons:

First—Arguments relative to Latin and Greek roots, the ancient languages and philology are useless before those unschooled in ancient lore, and

Second—To those versed in the ancient languages, he stands convicted from his own showing. For he admits that he has not the remotest idea of the existence or use of one of the most simple adjectives in the Greek language, that he is entirely unable to find the word in a common dictionary, and proves himself unable to spell the word correctly after having heard it spoken. And yet, with this damaging admission on his part, he presumes to talk learnedly upon ancient lore. But first.

THE PLATFORM IS NOT FREE.

In the afternoon conference all persons, whether members or not, have the privilege of speaking upon the question before the meeting. And in order to guarantee this right to all, each speaker is limited to ten minutes, is required to speak to the question, and is permitted to speak but once the same afternoon, unless all others refuse to speak, when, by special permission of the president, he may speak a second time. And I fail to see that justice or freedom would allow one man to usurp the whole or a major portion of the time. And under these rules chronic speakers who infringe upon the rights of others, are usually reminded of the fact. And as a general thing, from a sense of common courtesy, they conform to these requirements. On the Sunday referred to the question was "Prophecy." Mr. Chaney opened the discussion, and by special permission was allowed thirty minutes. He argued that the Bible is an allegory; that its prophetic declarations, and all its teachings, can only be interpreted through Astrology, and the movement of the heavenly bodies. And as a final argument, by which he claimed to demolish the Bible, he made this very extraordinary assertion. I give it verbatim, for I wrote it down as the words fell from his lips, namely: "In the Greek language the word 'helios' means the Sun, and it also means holy. So that in Greek the 'Holy Bible' means the Sun Book, and the 'Holy Ghost' means the Sun Ghost or Sun Gust." Had the audience been composed of classical scholars I should have made no reply. But when a person makes such unwarranted and unscrupulous statements he ought to be exposed upon the spot. I, therefore, in justice to the audience, stated in reply that in no instance in the Greek language did the word "helios" mean holy. That such a use of the word could nowhere be found, neither in classical Greek in the Septuagint, nor in the New Testament. That in the Greek language the word for "holy" was hagios. That in Greek the expression "Holy Ghost" is pneuma hagion, and that "helios" is never used in any such sense. Mr. Chaney then arose and was allowed some eight minutes more, giving him about forty minutes in all that day. The following Sunday I missed the Oakland boat, and was almost an hour late in reaching the hall. The subject was "The Unity of Governments." But on arriving at the hall, at near 3 o'clock, I found Mr. Chaney speaking—not upon the regular question—but giving a rehash of his "Biblical Allegory," and reasserting that if "helios" did not mean holy, the English word "holy" was derived from an Anglo Saxon word that meant the Sun, and therefore he was correct on the former Sunday. I briefly reiterated my former statements, that nowhere in the Greek language did the word "helios" mean holy. He then arose, speaking a few minutes, going over the same ground that he had presented on several different occasions, when he was called to order by the presiding officer. Thus nearly half of the afternoon was again devoted to him, and no one had found opportunity to speak upon the question assigned for consideration. And yet Brother Chaney says he was unjustly restrained of his liberty, and calls us "iron-clad." But if it be "iron-clad" to give all an equal chance in these meetings, then I daily pray for "iron."

HAGIOS.

Referring to the Septuagint in Ex. 3-5, we find: "Ho gar topos en ho su hestekas ge hagia esti." For the place whereon thou standeth is holy ground. Again in Ex. 16-28, "Holy Sabbath" is Sabbata hagia. In Ex. 19-6, "holy nation" is ethnos hagion. In Ex. 30-25, "holy anointing" is chrisma hagion. Levit 8-9, "the holy crown" is kathegiasmenon hagion. In the New Testament, John 17-11, "Holy Father" is Pater hagio. Mark 13-11, "Holy Ghost" is pneuma to hagion, and in Luke 2-25, "Holy Ghost" is pneuma hagion. But further quotations are useless. I here challenge any person to produce a solitary quotation from the Greek language, ancient or modern, from the classical Greek, the Septuagint or the New Testament, in which the word helios means holy. And I further challenge any scholar to produce a solitary quotation from the Greek language in which the word hagios means the Sun, or has any reference to the Sun. Hagios means devoted to the gods, sacred, holy.

The Greek verb hazo, hazomai, means to stand in awe or dread of one's parents, of the gods. From the same root is derived, the Greek noun hagos, which means religious awe, pious dread, reverence, an expiatory sacrifice, a means of purification. The adjective hagnos, from the same root, means sound, undefiled, pure, upright, chaste. And from the noun hagos the adjective in question, hagios, is derived and means devoted to the gods, sacred, holy, (see Joannis Meursii Glossarium; Joannes Scapula; Liddell and Scott and Facciolatus, and other standard works in Greek). The Greek word hagios, from the Greek root hag, is derived from the Sanskrit "yag." In Sanskrit the primitive meaning of "yag" is to honor, to respect, to revere, to worship—especially the gods. "Yagya" means to sacrifice; "yagna" and "yaga" mean the sacrifice, and "yagvan" is the one who makes the sacrifice. Consequently the primitive idea is religious awe, sacred, holy. (My authority in Sanskrit is the "Glossarium Comparativum Linguae Sanscritae," by Francisco Bopp, which, with other Sanskrit books, I have in my library.) But Mr. Chaney says: "Brother Lewis evidently contradicted me because he did not know that 'holy' was derived from the Anglo-Saxon halig, which means the Sun or pertaining to the Sun." That is only a loop hole through which he desires to creep from his first position.

"HALIG."

The Anglo-Saxon noun "hael" means health, whole, care, safety, salvation. The low German, Freisic and Danish "heil," and the Icelandic "heil," mean health. From the Anglo-Saxon noun "hael" the adjective "hal" is derived, and means healthy, whole, sound, safe. "Halig" is another form of the Anglo-Saxon adjective, and means sound, whole, safe, pure, holy. And the Anglo-Saxon verb halgian, derived from the same root, means to consecrate, to become whole, without spot or blemish. And the verb haelan means to make whole, sound, to heal, to cure. And I know of no passage in Anglo-Saxon literature, or cognate languages, in which "hael," "hal" or "halig"—"hag" or "yag"—means the Sun, or has any reference to it. Among other Anglo-Saxon books, in my library, I have an Anglo-Saxon Bible, printed in 1665, from which I will make a few quotations, showing the use of "halig" in its various forms: In Matt. 3-11 He eow fullath on halgum gaste und on fyre. "He shall baptise you with the holy ghost and with fire." Matt. 7-6, Nullen ge syllan thaet halige hundrum. "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs." Mark 6-20, So-thice herodes ondrod Johannem and wiste thaet he was rihtwis and halig. "For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and holy." Mark 8-38, Halgum englum; "holy angels." Luke 1-35, Se halga gaste on the be-cymth. "The holy ghost shall come upon thee." Luke 9-26, Haligra engla; "holy angels." John 20-22, Tha he thaet cwaeth, tha bleow he on hi and cwaeth to him under-foth halige gast. "And when he said this he breathed on them, and said receive ye the Holy Ghost." From the Anglo-Saxon literature, and that of cognate languages, "halig" in its various forms, from the root of heal, hold, whole, all, and Greek "holos," seems to have the sense of whole, entire, complete, sound, unimpaired and perfect in a moral sense. Hence holy.

SANCTUS.

Again he says "sanctum sanctorum" means holy of holies, which is correct. But he adds: "Sanctus is the name of the Sun in the ancient Sabine language." Sanctus is a Latin participle, or verbal adjective from the verb "sancire," meaning to render sacred, inviolable, to decree, to sanction, to establish as sacred. The Latin verb sancire is from the root "sac," from which comes the Latin adjective "sacer," and the English "sacred." The root "sac" is kindred with the Greek root "hag"—"hagios"—and the Sanskrit "yag." So the word sanctus means sacred, inviolable, innocent, pious, just, divine, pure and holy. And nowhere in the Latin language does this word mean the Sun. Sanctus was not the name of the Sabine deity. It was "sancus," an entirely different word, as may be found from any Latin dictionary. And this deity, "Sancus," was the God of Truth, identical with the Greek Zeus pistos, the Latin Dius Fidius, and was worshipped at Rome. (See Livy 8-20: 32,1; Ovid's Fasti 6, 213).

HALO.

Again he says: "Halo is a direct transfer to the English language from the Anglo Saxon. Pictures of Jesus represent him with a 'halo' about his head, that is a circle of light, or the Sun's rays." The Anglo Saxon "halo" or "haelo" is an indeclinable feminine noun, and means health. It is only another form of the word "hael," already referred to. It is not, as Mr. Chaney assumes, the English word "halo," the luminous circle around the Sun or moon. The English word "halo" comes from the Latin "halos," a threshing floor. And the Latin "halos" is a direct transfer from the Greek "halos" of the same meaning, a threshing floor, and from the circular shape of the threshing floor the Greeks and Romans gave the same name—"halos"—to the Sun and moon, and afterwards to the circle of light surrounding them. (See Seneca's Naturales Quaestiones 1, 2; and also Aristotle's Mund, 4, 22. See also Webster's English Dictionary and the Latin and Greek Lexicons).

GAST.

"Ghost," from the Anglo Saxon gast, means breath, spirit, mind. The English word gust, meaning the sense of taste, is from the Latin "gustus," kindred with the Greek "geuein," to taste. But "gust," a blast of wind, is from the Icelandic "gustr," to blow cold, whereas the Icelandic "geistr," and not "gustr" is the word, meaning gast in Saxon, and ghost in English.

HELIOS.

The word "helios"—the Sun—is from the Greek forms "halea," "hele," "heile," meaning warmth, heat. Hence helios is the Sun, the word having reference especially to the heat of the Sun. And the Greek "helios" is derived from the Sanskrit "sura," meaning to shine, to be bright, to glitter, from the primitive Sanskrit root "sur." (See pages 423 and 439 of Bopp's Glossarium).

But I have already taken up too much space. I think that Brother Chaney, on due reflection, will conclude that there are some things in the world beside Astrology, and that Robert Taylor, writing in the spirit that he did, is not to be credited without the fullest verification of his utterances, from the original sources whence he claims to draw his information. Let truth and candor be uppermost, and let them never be sacrificed for the purpose of promoting a hobby.

FROM A MONEY-MANIAC.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—There is no use talking—there is but one cause of misery in this world at the present time: that is money; and there is but one way to correct the evil—crush the viper. We have the power to do it. Then, in the name of God, why don't we do it, and stop all manner of villainy and oppression at once. But the people chime in, "It can't be done; you would upset the whole organization of society." Let it upset; it can't be worse. If nothing better than the present can be had, the world had better come to an end now. But there is no necessity for such a catastrophe. A dozen such papers as COMMON SENSE, well distributed in this Union, would "make Rome howl" in five years, and bring about people's ears such a demand for reform in the political world, that longer resistance would be impossible.

Poor men, everywhere, drop your church, your religion, science, social reform, temperance raids, Trades' Unions—drop everything, and devote your lives, your fortunes and your sacred honor to the one and only object that can make your condition better. An election is coming soon to form a new Constitution. Let every one who has a vote in favor of reform be on hand, and see that the convention is called, and then see that persons are elected who will frame a Constitution worthy of the age in which we live, and under which we can pass laws to feed the hungry and clothe the naked out of the accumulated labor and surplus capital of the people, no matter what hands it is found in.

I see you speak of another brotherhood organization—not political. We have entirely too many of those milk and water institutions now. "Not political," indeed! that is all Money wants. Such societies can be praised; they don't interfere with "our prerogative," and they go on in their blindness, neither feared nor respected. Let them turn their attention to the only chance for relief. Let them say a homestead, not worth over one thousand dollars, should be exempt from taxation and execution. That taxes should be graduated, and the ownership of land should be limited, or that it should not be sold at all. Then the rich would gradually become poorer, and the poor would become richer. Anything short of this will not help the poor, or relieve distress. Let us try it. Let us lay aside all tomfoolery, nonsense and side issues "not political," and go to work with a will at the ballot box. Constitutions, like churches, professions and the ten commandments, are made for the rich, and must be changed before we can gain anything.

WILLIAM N. SLOOUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1875.

WE have not been able, from want of time, to attend any of the seances lately given by Mrs. Sawyer, at 1145 Mission street; nor for the same reason have we been able to attend the afternoon seances given by the same medium at the house of Mrs. Cotter, No. 10 Stockton, but we are informed that at the latter place the cabinet is placed in the same room with the sitters, and that all present can see around it, and know that it is impossible for any person to enter it without being seen. The tests thus given are highly satisfactory. The cabinet was constructed by order of Mrs. Cotter, without the knowledge of Mrs. Sawyer, and there is no opportunity for deceit, so far as that is concerned. The seances given at this place are on Tuesday and Friday afternoons, at 2 o'clock. Mrs. Sawyer will also hold special and private seances at Mrs. Cotter's, on any day parties of friends may desire. It is the best opportunity for investigation that has yet been afforded.

THE POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY for January is an excellent number, containing several articles of more than usual interest, among them "Crystalline and Molecular Forces," by John Tyndall, F. R. S.; "The Future of Chemistry," by Prof. Clarke, "Woman's Place in Nature," by Frances E. White; "The Emotions of Primitive Man," by Herbert Spencer, etc. Edited by E. L. Youmans; published by D. Appleton & Co., 549 Broadway, New York. Terms, $5 per annum.

The first number of The Spiritual Magazine has made its appearance, and is well spoken of, but has not, as yet, been received at this office. It is a monthly of 32 pages, and is said to be handsomely printed and ably edited. It is published in Memphis, Tenn., by Rev. Samuel Watson, a "Christian Spiritualist," and is designed to fill a place in the spiritual field not hitherto occupied. The price is $1.50 per year, or 15 cents single numbers. Address S. Watson, 225 Union street, Memphis, Tenn.

WOODHULL & CLAFLIN'S WEEKLY.—An easy way to help the Weekly is for every one of its readers to determine to obtain one new subscriber. Each person who is interested in the solution of social problems, and who discusses them to any extent, knows some one he or she can induce to subscribe. Double the number of its subscribers, and the Weekly can return at once to its original size and live.

T. S. JOHNS, late editor of the Figaro, who died suddenly on Saturday night last, of cancer of the pancreas, was buried on Tuesday. The ceremonies took place at Pacific Hall, under direction of the Bohemian Club. The choir sang the tender melody, "Come unto me," from the Messiah. Brief speeches were made by several of his friends, and a few remarks by Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith, who alluded to him as a true friend of woman, and that it was fitting that a wife and mother should speak at his funeral: Mrs. Johns, widow of deceased, spoke briefly of his physical sufferings, and said that death came as a happy release. The beautiful song, "Flee as a Bird to the Mountains," was sung by J. G. Russell. No priest took part in the exercises. Mr. Johns was the son of a clergyman, and was designed for the church, but not being able to accept the Christian dogmas, he became a writer for the press. Being a genial, kind hearted man, he made many friends, notwithstanding he was outspoken in his views, and generally on the unpopular side of religious and social questions. He told the writer that he based his belief in a future life entirely on the evidences offered by Spiritualism.

THE latest developments in the "Katie King exposure" tend to show that the woman who declared herself to be the spirit is a greater fraud even than she confessed. The Holmes deny her statements, and have succeeded in demonstrating the absurdity of some of them, such as concealment in the bolster, etc. Meantime the manifestations are proceeding as usual with the Holmes' and the cabinet is in the room with visitors, and can be inspected on all sides. Mrs. White has never entered this house, but "Katie" has re-appeared, and has been recognized by many who saw her before. Other spirits, friends of visitors, have also been recognized, and the manifestations promise to be more satisfactory than ever. Mr. Owen has written several very lengthy letters, in which he throws very little light on the matter. He is an honest man, but does not seem to be clear in his statements. If there is such a woman as Mrs. White, why has he not had an interview with her? And why does he not tell who the friend was who found her out? There are quite too many matters left in the dark in this affair to satisfy either Spiritualists or opponents.

A year ago a motherless girl of sixteen years, of feeble intellect was sent by her step-mother to a boarding house in Salem, Mass., where she was seduced, went home and gave birth to a child, which was only two weeks old when the young girl was forced by her step-mother to start off with it to a Boston poor house. Bewildered and weak-minded, the girl threw her baby into the dock. She was charged with murder, and is now in jail awaiting trial, while her seducer, a boy of 19, was fined $25., and allowed to go free, and the cruel step-mother was not even arrested. Such is "justice."

Mr. Heywood, of the Word, says "Free Love is not the advent of dissoluteness in domestic life, but that of reason and continence."

THE DEVIL IN THE PREACHERS.

"Clerical errors, of the scandalous sort, are reported from all parts of the country. The devil seems to be getting into the preachers."—S. F. Alla.

Unhappily facts seem to warrant this seemingly harsh statement. The Glendenning case in New Jersey is hardly closed by the whitewashing report of the Presbytery, which really amounts to a verdict of "not guilty, but so near guilty that the interests of the church require his expulsion," when Pennsylvania presents two Presbyterian ministers whose robes are sadly smirched. The first is the Rev. Thomas Cooper, of Frankford, Pa., who is arrested and charged by one of his parishioners with an attempt to forcibly ravish his young daughter, Flora May Peters. The sworn complaint of the parent alleges that, as pastor of the church, Cooper was accustomed to visit often at his house, and on account of this relation, his daughter had been "led to feel that she could unsuspectingly, unqualifiedly and absolutely trust herself to his care and confidence." He then proceeds to depose that, on the first of July last, Cooper met Flora on the street, and invited her to go with him to his study in the rear of his church, where he amorously and forcibly assaulted her; and that in consequence of the injuries received she has been ill ever since. Cooper denied his guilt, but Judge Briggs held him in $5000 bonds. He is a married man and a talented preacher, says the Chicago Tribune, and was formerly settled in Maine.

The other case is somewhat similar. The Rev. Joseph Stittum, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Westchester, Pa., has been arrested for the seduction of Miss Sarah Hall, the young daughter of one of his church members, who had gone to his study, at his request, and with her parents knowledge and approval, to receive religious instruction, when and where he succeeded by art and persuasion, in effecting her ruin. In this case the pastor did not use force, but, as her affidavit alleges, he "quoted the Bible to prove that his conduct was in accordance with the Word of God." Such is the indignation of the community that legal protection was necessary to prevent the lynching of the accused. The church officials, it is said, are inclined, "for the sake of the cause," to let their pastor off, but the friends and relatives of the young lady say openly that if he escapes other punishment, they will take the law into their own hands and teach him not to play the wolf in his own sheepfold, and serve the devil of his lusts under the cloak of religion.

The Belfast (Me.) Age says that Rev. T. T. Merry, pastor of the Congregational Church at Machias, in that State, has confessed to an improper intimacy with his housekeeper, and has voluntarily retired from the church.

Rev. Dr. Fisk, pastor of the Universalist Church at Grand Rapids, Mich., has confessed that he has seduced the organist of his church and deems it desirable, under the circumstances, to step down and out.

The Providence Journal gives another instance of alleged clerical delinquency, the transgressor in this instance being a Seventh-Day Baptist, who was formerly employed by the Young Men's Christian Association as a missionary.

Rev. John A. Hudkins, who has been preaching to a United Brethren congregation in Mt. Ayre, is a bigamist. He married a young maiden from Pennsylvania last summer, and it was said she was wife No. 8. He has departed for Canada.

The Rev. John Bobeart, a Methodist clergyman of Boston, has been arraigned at Malden for bastardy. The complainant is a former domestic in the family of the accused. The defendant gave bonds for his appearance.

REVIVAL TACK(TICS).

The devices of sensation revival preachers to draw and interest a crowd are sometimes exceedingly absurd. A letter from San Jose, where Rev. E. P. Hammond has been holding revival meetings during the past week, informs us that on one occasion the preacher illustrated the readiness of little children to respond to his appeals in the following manner: Using a magnetic tack-hammer, and presenting it with a flourish that would have done credit to a slight-of-hand performer, he showed how the little tacks jumped up to meet it, and clung hold of each other in their eagerness. Just so it was with little children, 5, 6, 7 and 8 years old—they would fairly jump up to meet Jesus. Then using larger tacks, which did not respond so readily, he said these were the older boys and girls of 14, 15 and 16 years. They came to Jesus, but not so many and not so eagerly. Then taking a large nail, that would only be lifted up a little way and then let go, he said this was an old sinner. Surely this is object-teaching with a vengeance. Another absurd device was to assure the children that he would make each one of them a present of a valuable gold chain—not a cheap, bogus affair, but a genuine, beautiful, costly chain. After dwelling on its value and beauty until the little ones were big with expectation, he told them that the first link of that chain was Jesus, and he hoped they would all reach out and get hold of that link to-night. Ah, how disappointed the little ones looked. And such is Revivalism in the 19th century!

In the opening of the trial of Tilton against Beecher, Judge Morris, Tilton's counsel, produced a letter of resignation, written by Beecher in 1878, which he was prevented by Moulton from presenting. It was as follows.

MAY 13TH, 1878.—To the Trustees of Plymouth Church: I tender herewith my resignation of the sacred ministry of Plymouth Church. For two years I have stood with great sorrow among you, in order to shield from shame, a certain household, but a recent publication makes this no longer possible. I resign my ministry.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

This was written in dread of the prospect of Tilton publishing the famous letter of contrition. Tilton had threatened to shoot him if he resigned his ministry with such a stain left on his, Tilton's, family. Moulton's courage alone saved Beecher from resignation and ruin.

MRS. SMITH'S LECTURES.

Those who filled the hall of the Spiritualists' Union in the early part of Jennie Leys' engagement, but have ceased their attendance since, and are now in the habit of going elsewhere, have missed some of the finest discourses ever given there—those that have been delivered by Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith on the last two Sundays. They are full of good thought, well expressed; and the speaker is so earnest and truthful that all who are tired of namby pamby utterances, should go and hear this plain spoken, truth-loving woman, and be refreshed.

On Sunday afternoon, her subject being "The Price of Truth," she spoke of the labors of various reformers, and the return received by them from the people for whose benefit they worked. She referred to Austin Kent, his life of physical suffering, his radical writings, and the neglect which has followed the efforts of this good old man to aid his fellow men to a higher plain of life. (Her appeal we are informed resulted in a small contribution for Mr. Kent, several persons giving one dollar each.) This poor, white-haired, decrepid man, over seventy years of age, is called a sensualist, because he has dared to advocate the release of our mothers and sisters from the worst features of our marriage institution, as at present constituted, and has favored, not the abrogation of true marriage, but the purification of our marriage system. What hypocrisy! We cannot give Mrs. Smith's language, and our report must necessarily do her injustice, but we know she is charitable enough to overlook such short comings. She spoke also of Walt Whitman, of his dismissal from the Treasury Department by Mr. Harlin, of Whitman's pure, unselfish life, of his service in the hospitals during the war, and of his present poverty—a man who loves truth better than pecuniary gain, a lover of his brother man—yet by his brother man neglected.

What Spiritualism wants to-day is love of truth, and those who do not stand up for truth, will in the end see recorded against them "mene mene tekell upharsin." She said she did not regret the division in the Spiritualists' ranks. It is better even for a few to remain steadfast to the right than that all surrender to the demands of a time serving, popularity seeking class. Perilous times are coming to us as a nation, and the people will learn that justice is not dead; God rules, and the right will finally prevail. The oppressions of the rich, the outrages on the unprotected, the miseries of the destitute—all these cannot endure forever. Spiritualists should unite against oppression in every form, political, religious, social—they should seek for the truth, and ask not that respectability may be retained, but that humanity may be lifted up. "For myself," she said, "I ask nothing; for me death has lost all its terrors, life all its charms; I only ask your co-operation in the cause of truth and humanity. Let us stand together, and do our duty." Spiritualism, she said, is being weighed in the balance, and it will either pass away, its mission ended, to give place to something better, or it will become the grand gospel of humanity.

During her discourse Mrs. Smith referred to the frequency with which young girls are led astray in this city, and cautioned mothers against permitting them to go out to places of amusement without attendance. It is, in fact, hardly safe for our daughters to go to and from school, so many designing men are lying in wait for them; and yet any attempt to find a remedy for this deplorable state of society subjects those who seek the remedy to abuse and misrepresentation.

THE EVENING LECTURE.

The subject of Mrs. Smith's discourse in the evening was "Humanity or an Ism—Which?" The arguments used tended to prove that Spiritualists are in danger of becoming as narrow and creed-bound as the churches; that seeking for popularity, instead of holding to principle, will kill all that is of any practical value in Spiritualism. She traced the history of Methodism, Universalism and other religious organizations which have grown into popular favor, showing clearly that just as fast as they gained in respectability they lost in the features that formerly distinguished them from the orthodox churches, in fact Methodism is now exceedingly "orthodox," and a stranger entering a Universalist Church can hardly distinguish between the doctrines there taught and the dogmas of the evangelical Christians. There are some liberal ministers, but most of the graduates of our theological schools are prepared to defend their own creed, right or wrong. They do not seek for truth, but are educated to sustain the dogmas of the church.

Spiritualists are in danger of seeking popularity to the exclusion of truth. The time was when "Spiritualist" was a term of reproach, but they held together then better than now, when so many are trying to make Spiritualism conform to public sentiment, instead of endeavoring to lift public opinion up to the level of high spiritual requirements. Some scientists are becoming Spiritualists now—some of the nobility of England and a few Congressmen in this country, and Spiritualists are fearful these new converts will be driven away by our advocacy of radical ideas. We must not give the truth too freely for fear of shocking these people. Most of those who are convinced of the truths of Spiritualism, keep aloof from our organizations. We are not yet popular, and it is to make ready for this class that we are asked to sacrifice truth, to put on an appearance of conservatism, and to play the hypocrite generally. An effort must be made to bring the rich and the "respectable" within our ranks.

True Spiritualism knows no difference in men—it embraces all of humanity; it distinguishes not between the rich and the poor—it looks steadfastly to the worth of every immortal soul. We are one great brotherhood; we have no ministers ordained of God; every one who works for the good of humanity is a "man of God," and is worthy to be our teacher and exemplar. If Spiritualism is a truth it does not need such careful nursing and jealous guardianship. It will survive all assaults, and in rising to its full strength will lift humanity with it. If it is based on principle all the adverse powers cannot overturn it; and if it has not truth and principle for its foundation we do not want it.

LYCEUM FOR SELF CULTURE.

Spiritualism still retains its place as the principal topic of discussion. On Sunday last, prior to the debate, Mr. Vincent recited an original poem, entitled "Courting Sarah Nevada." "It was a "Dream of Love," but the object of adoration was the gold in the Comstock lead.

Mr. Lundy opened the discussion with a 30-minute speech, chiefly repeating extracts from a Second Advent tract on Spiritualism in a very ludicrous manner, then attacking the morals of the Spiritualists. He did not attempt to prove that spiritual phenomena is not worthy of scientific investigation.

Dr. White, the President, said that there had been some disorder in the Lyceum during the past few weeks, for which the Chairman was as much to blame as anybody, but he had recently purchased a Cushing's Manual, and would endeavor in the future to obey its rules in governing the assembly.

Mr. Matthews proceeded to show what Spiritualism had done for the emancipation of woman, and gave some sound lessons as to the necessity of a perfect acquaintance before marriage, all of which was good in its way, but was far from the question at issue.

Mr. Knight again reiterated the kind of evidence which must be produced to substantiate the so-called facts of Spiritualism, and again asserted that the facts had not been supported by such evidence, therefore the spiritual delusion is unworthy the attention of scientific men.

Mr. Kemper positively asserted that he had seen the materialized body of his deceased wife, and grasped her arm. Not only did he recognize her, but several of her acquaintances recognized her under conditions which precluded the possibility of deceit. After giving several cases of this kind, he challenged the scientific world to account for the phenomena except by the philosophy of Spiritualism.

Mr. Bailey, a young man, apparently not more than 18, fresh from the classical walls of a Pennsylvania Medical College, asserted that all the phenomena of Spiritualism had been exposed again and again, and gravely told the audience that the Rochester knockings were produced by a shingle—a statement that seemed novel to most of his hearers. He detailed the expose of a medium at a Pennsylvania college, and assured his hearers that the Katie King affair was a humbug, that he could prove by letters, which unfortunately he left in his valise.

Mr. Healy did not prove anything nor deny anything. He insisted that Spiritualism should be judged by the same standard that is applied to any other religion. Some Spiritualists claimed materialization of departed spirits to a limited extent, but does not the Roman Catholic claim that the ministers of his religion can materialize their Lord Jesus Christ a million times all over the globe at the same time, and can repeat the operation daily? Here is materialization on such a large scale that it paralyzes the intellect to think of it, and yet the Roman Catholics have eminent scientists and philosophers in their ranks, and Christendom dare not ask them to give a scientific reason for the faith that is in them. In alluding to the morals of Spiritualists, he thought they might compare favorably with Plymouth pulpit and surroundings, Rev. Glendinning, Rev. Fisk, and other small fry that have recently been spewn up from the mountain of corruption that overshadows our social fabric.

Mr. Harper could not see how Protestants could deny the facts of Spiritualism. He admitted that Catholics did not deny them. He asked if the resurrection of Christ was not a clear case of materialization, and went on to show that the Scriptures furnished abundant argument for spiritual phenomena.

Mr. Battersby was sorry that the discussion took the course it did. He thought the strong points of the Spiritualists had scarcely been touched, and related some of his own experience, which proved that if he does not believe in Spiritualism, he must accept what is known as clairvoyance. The discussion is to be continued, and will be opened next Sunday by Mr. French.

THE FREE THOUGHT SOCIETY OF SAN JOSE.

FRIEND SLOCUM:—To one who has been deeply interested in the Society of Free Thought at San Jose—in its success—the statement of your correspondent, "V. W.," that "extreme radical views on the Social Question, so continually presented during the last year," had nearly killed the Society, provokes a smile of skepticism as to the earnestness of the writer—whether or not it is not one of his jokes he so much delights to perpetrate. Just as though extreme radical views on any question could kill a Society of Free Thought. Free thought flourishes best where all questions are freely advocated and agitated. If the Society at San Jose can be killed in the free discussion of any of the live questions of the day, it is a Society of Free Thought only in name. Those of its members who would be driven away in consequence of the presentation of "radical views," lack very important qualifications to make any Liberal Society a success. They would limit the lecturer in the presentation of subjects to the narrow range of their own opinions. Such persons would be quite at home in an orthodox church, and I venture the prediction that should they fail to control the speaker in the choice of subjects for discussion before the Free Thought Society they affect to love so much, they would immediately "walk off on their ear" to some less liberal but "respectable" society. To my knowledge the speakers who have drawn the best houses before the Society of Free Thought at San Jose, and who have been the best remunerated, are those who believe in and advocate radical views on the Social Question. I may mention C. Fannie Allyn, Prof. W. H. Chaney and Miss Jennie Leys as being the most successful as well as the most radical of those who have lectured before this Society. The success of a Society does not always depend upon numbers. It is quality rather than quantity that guarantees success. One true and loyal soul in a community, who dares to "follow wherever the truth shall lead," and to live the truth when found, will accomplish more for true reform, and the elevation of humanity, than all the respectable Societies that hypocritically flaunt a free and liberal name.

Hoping that your correspondent may be able to report "improvement" in the quality as well as quantity of Society matters, I am yours,

A. C. STOWE.

ASTRAL INFLUENCES.

REPLY BY W. H. CHANEY TO "VOX STELLARUM."

Perhaps I was wrong in affirming that the enemies of Astrology first committed the error of considering the stars as the causes instead of the indicators of the event. Most certainly Ptolemy declares the influence of the stars, and so does the Bible, for God himself is represented as saying: "Can'st thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?" Job xxxviii, 32. Now this would be a very silly question to ask if "the seven stars" had no influence. But neither Ptolemy nor the Bible are very good authority upon some points, for both maintain that the earth is the center of our solar system, and since they are in error in this particular, they may be in the other. But passing by this point, let us consider the real issue, namely: Do the planets exert an influence in making us what we are, (some great natural philosophers and some great natural fools) or was it the ante-natal influences surrounding conception and gestation?

This is the true issue, and a question of vital importance. If the planets are the causes, then no matter how evil the ante-natal influences, if the child is only born under a "lucky star," all that evil is cured. Or, on the other hand, parents may take the greatest precautions, both may be in most excellent conditions, physically, morally, mentally, at the time of conception, and the best of care be taken of the mother during gestation, yet the child may be born under an "unlucky star," the influence of which will utterly destroy all the good which they had a right to expect. If this be true, humanity should know it, and then goodbye to law and certainty; we will revel in chance and glory in blind fatality. The person who really accepts this hopeless philosophy has lost all stimulant to action, for only an idiot would strive for a particular result if either fate or the stars had already determined what that result shall be.

Accept for premises the "starry influence," and "inexorable destiny," and the foregoing conclusions are unavoidable. Are they true to Mother Nature? Perhaps so to the standpoint of some minds, but not to mine; and my brother, "Vox Stellarum," does injustice to his intelligence by harboring such a thought. Saturn on the ascendant of his horoscope must make him skeptical, as the same malignant, in opposition to my ascendant and close quartile of Mercury, does me; but I find that by resisting skepticism, instead of harboring it, I am able to accept immortality and deny fatality more than half the time, although I have had a period of three years, during which I was a rank Atheist all the time. "Resist the devil and he will flee from you," is a beautiful philosophical maxim, if understood in its logical sense, and having tried it myself I can commend it to Brother "Vox."

Adopting the doctrine that mundane events are due to mundane causes, but foreshadowed by "the heavenly hosts," by virtue of that law of sympathy which pervades the vast universe, we then have everything to encourage us to action. If it rains, and there is nothing to prevent, we will go under the shelter, instead of saying, "If it is to be fate for me to be wet, I shall be wet anyhow, even though I go into the house." Besides, we shall not attempt to excuse our misdeeds on the ground of fatality, but acknowledging our individual accountability, be ready to exclaim with Pope:

"Yet gave me, in this dark estate,
To see the good from ill;
And binding nature fast in Fate,
Left free the human will."

CREDULITY.

Who are the credulous? It is charged that Spiritualists are peculiarly afflicted in this way. It is claimed that only the gullible of our race are Spiritualists at all. And now that Katie King has been played in a private theatre in Philadelphia with success, our wise people all exclaim, "I told you so." The logic of these wise people, however, had no place in the conceptions of Mills or Whately. These gentlemen would say that the only inference deducible is that Messrs. Owen, Childs, et al, were in that instance deceived. But our wise men of the East, and West also, jump to the inference that all other spiritualistic phenomena are, by this deception, proven false also. And yet these people complacently consider themselves qualified exclusively to decide aright in this momentous matter! And these same people who don't think the modern materializations possible, believe that a couple of antediluvians were translated, body, boots and all, direct to paradise! And this notwithstanding that the Talmud says it was't so. And that a couple other antediluvians materialized on a certain mount in Christian times. In a word, they don't believe that what hath been may be again. They believe that the alleged spiritual phenomena are electrical, but they cannot produce a rap by electricity; and, applying the process of exclusion, electricity is excluded by the fact of the presence of intelligence in the phenomena. They ascribe the phenomena of intelligence to unconscious cerebration, although the experience of all mankind is against it, and the fact that the communications are often foreign to the medium and to all in the house, and only verified afterwards, which disproves the theory.

I may admit that there are a great many silly people who imagine themselves mediums, and who sit by the hour or day and write communications from any quarter to their own injury, and the injury of others. But while our medical fossil, Dr. Gibbons, who, I believe, has never changed his opinion on anything since he was born, was gravely decanting on this evil, he might have alluded to the hysterical convulsions and catalepsy produced by the revivalist, and the physical evils produced by a belief of prospective hot quarters in the five mile level of hell! Indeed I suggested recently to a Methodist divine the advisability of showing up, by means of a magic lantern, some of the winzes of the famed locality, a la Sutro. It really seems a pity that the spiritualistic phenomena cannot be ordered out of existence by people who are continually confounding the impossible with what is merely beyond the limits of their very limited experience.

In conclusion, the millions who now avow a belief in the spiritualistic origin of the phenomena in question, have not done so by aught that Messrs. Owen, Childs, Edwards or Davis, or others, have said or done, or left undone; nor shall they disavow it, though all these, and the world besides, should be deceived in the premises every day.

THE INFLUENCE OF REVIVALS.

BY THOMAS STARR KING.

I. REVIVAL METHODS ARE RADICALLY VICIOUS.

The speeches and prayers, limited to three minutes, and stopped, by a tinkle of the conductor's bell; the reading of notes for the conversion of indicated persons, and the offering of supplication for them as though prayer were a method of sacred sorcery; the asking of young persons if they "know the Lord;" the solicitation of people to publish their most sacred feelings of penitence, or their equally sacred glooms and distrust and skepticism; the flitting about of experts in the system of evangelical pathology. If one can contemplate such methods of dealing with the religious nature, in a season of excitement, without feeling that permanent harm must result to those who conduct the system and those who are the victims of it, he must hold a conception of religion and the religious sensibilities, that needs, I think, to be enlarged and refined. Safety is still the word and motive that is executed with all possible modulations and variations in the whole fantasia of praying, note-reading, and appeal. "Come to Christ;" "Get an interest in Christ;" "Fly to the Cross;" "Find the Saviour;" "Delay is dangerous, for death may overtake you to-morrow;"—these are the characteristic calls and warnings of the movement.

This shows its radical vice. Its working force, so far as the instruction and the teachers give it character, is not the glory of the truth, the beauty of holiness, the need of human nature for its health, to begin to serve God and be educated in a spiritual estimate of all nature and all life. The long arm of its lever is selfish fear. Its fulcrum is the death bed. Its aim is the swinging of men from the edge of the grave, over the abyss, into a mechanical heaven.

II. REVIVALS POISON MANHOOD.

I cannot do anything else than say that this is poison. The religious emotion that goes to the meetings may be pure and hopeful. But when it is met by this kind of instruction, or is stimulated thus to more intense vitality, a bane is taken into the spiritual blood that I believe almost neutralizes the good effect of a renunciation of open sins. Just to the extent that this doctrine is absorbed into character, the manhood is injured. The person may not be a gross offender, as before, against the commandments, he may be a frequenter of prayer meetings, and a sincere exhorter to flee from the wrath to come, but he is converted to bestunted; he is inoculated with a virus that chills and shrivels his humanity; he is turned from a careless and perhaps generous hearted sinner, into a miserable, starveling dwarf of the spiritual order, on the side of the Lord.

III. REVIVALS CORRUPT YOUTH.

Not long ago I read a volume containing twenty-five sermons, recently preached in New York and Brooklyn with reference to the revival, by the most distinguished and cultivated ministers of those cities. Some of the most powerful of the discourses, I read in my library till past midnight. The air at last seemed full of infernal terrors and woes, and I shut the dreadful book.

I said to myself then, in excitement of soul, what I will say here with seriousness and deliberation, that rather than my child should have the awful theology of the average of that book stamped upon her heart, I should unspeakably prefer that she should grow up an atheist. As an atheist, the best currents of human nature would not be corrupted in her. Believing what that book teaches, and having her whole nature cramped and distorted into its mould, it would not be possible that her spirit could have any religious beauty, cheer or peace.

IV. REVIVALS DISHONOR THE DEITY.

A large number of men and women, no doubt, do reject most of this venom. They are sound and noble in spite of their theology. Their spiritual sense is instinctively so delicate and healthy, that the leaven of Satan in the bread of life offered to them, is quietly cast out before it can pass into their moral blood. But the majority take it into their constitution. It becomes their wisdom, their motive, their measure of God's character. And then what can they know of the Infinite Perfectness? Believing that God has appointed a terrible and irreversible final doom, that yawns just beyond this sepulchre, for every man that has misused the opportunities of life; that he will never pity or forgive any spirit he has made, on the most thorough repentance, through eternity, what can they know, under such instruction, of that perfectness of God which is more than the sum of all the holy and lovely qualities of human character on earth.

Make God just as good in eternity as he is in time. Put religion on its natural basis, and you kill the revivals, you shrivel the inquiry-meetings.

V. REVIVALS REPEL FROM RELIGION THE YOUNG LIFE AND THE BEST INTELLECT OF THE LAND.

Let any man go through the West, and talk with the men who represent the energy and future of the great rising States; let him hear their lamentations over the dreariness and huskiness of theology that is poured from the pulpits, their confessions of the inward rebellion and loathing with which, when they go to church, they listen to its effete traditions, its ghastly philosophy of life, its artificial terrors, its theories of the government of the moral world, so discordant with the simplicity of science, so foreign from the clearest insight which our best literature reveals; let him hear them utter their fears for the effect on society, after two generations more of this dismal parody of a gospel, and ask if some nobler administration of truth cannot be inaugurated soon and widely.

WOMAN'S LOT.—At best, life goes ill with women in the main. Affectionateness is her strong-weak side, and man unremittingly attacks it. She has a haunting apprehension that in some great prevailing love, thrilling her blood and brain, her nerves and heart, lie her safety and peace. But she never can anticipate it, nor measure its force. It may not come. To many it does not; to others it comes too late; whence agonizing repression, or broken vows—tragedies without end, sometimes without name.

Nevertheless, woman's original stock of hope, elasticity, and cheerfulness is so greatly in excess of ours that, in the third, fourth and fifth acts of the tragic comedy, hers is the ampler residue. Nature, who allotted her the larger share of suffering, in mercy granted her superior endurance. It is particularly hard that she should be beset in her youth by the hunger of the heart, and persecuted through man by the hunger of the senses. As respects her sins, no sin is so sinless as her fall, and none so inhumanly punished. On him who betrays her through her deepest trust and holiest feeling, the world yet refrains from placing the responsibility. So foul and unjust an act cannot withstand much longer the wave of progress.—Junius Henri Browne.

Mr. John Vincent, familiarly known as the "One-eyed Scissors grinder," who keeps a stand o' nights on the corner of Pine and Kearney streets, besides being a poet and scissors grinder, has also proven himself to be an inventor. He has invented a dry ore concentrator for which he has applied for letters patent, through the Mining and Scientific Press Patent Agency. The machine is very ingenious and appears more than ordinarily effective.—Mining and Scientific Press.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO

THE STUDY.

FAUST AND MEPHISTOPHELES.

CHORUS OF SPIRITS INVISIBLE.

Woe! woe!
 Thou hast shivered it:
 The universe
 With powerful fist
 Thou hast severed it;
 It falls, it breaks,
 A demi-god.
 Now hath withered it;
 We bear the load
 Of fragments over to
 Nought, and bewail
 Its beauty as lovers do.
 Mightiest one
 Of all earth's children
 Rebuild the undone,
 In thy bosom rebuilding.
 A new life course,
 With senses lightening,
 Begin, new verse
 The inception brightening.

MEPHISTO.—These are my merry ones,
 List to their cheery tongues;
 Action and pleasures
 They praise in wise measures.
 Out of dull solitude
 Where ugly cares intrude,
 Where the blood drones along
 And the sense all goes wrong;
 In the wide world to play,
 They would tice thee away!

Cease, cease to dally with your grief my friend,
 Which, like a vulture, eats into your life,
 E'en company which must your tastes offend,
 Proves you a man still, if with men at strife;
 But still I never meant
 To thrust you amongst the rubbish,
 I'm not myself so very upish,
 Yet if, as was my sole intent,
 You'll walk through life in company with me,
 How gladly I'll conform myself you'll see,
 And your compeer to be
 I'll on the spot agree;
 Nay, should you prefer it,
 I'll be your valet or flunky, or servant.

FAUST.—Pray what am I for you to do in payment?
 MEPHISTO.—Oh! put that off a long time if you list!

FAUST.—No, no! the devil is an egotist,
 And never yet much out of his way went
 To serve another, simply for God's sake:
 Let your conditions plainly be expressed,
 For such a servitor 's a dangerous guest.

MEPHISTO.—I'll bind myself your servant here to make,
 And at your wink hither and thither go;
 When we've been ferried over Styx's lake,
 Why you shall do the like for me below.

FAUST.—About "below" I need not fash my wife,
 When you've knocked this world into little bits,
 The other may arise, or not;
 From the green world all my delight out flows,
 And you round sun shines down upon my woes.
 When this dear life my soul no longer knows,
 What happens next I do not care one jot.
 About a future I've no care to bear,
 Whether on that side we shall love or hate,
 Or whether we shall find in that next sphere
 An over and an under. I can wait.

MEPHISTO.—In such a temper you can surely venture,—
 Come, bind yourself. You will not censure
 The arts that I will treat you to anon;
 You'll see what no living man has done.

FAUST.—Poor devil! what have you to give to me?
 Was ever human soul in its high flight
 Dragged down by such an old man of the sea?
 Yet you have dishes impotent to blight
 The might of hunger! You have ruddy gold
 Which without rest runs from one's hand untold,
 Like quicksilver! A play at which none wins his end!
 A maiden who, whilst lying on my breast,
 Exchanges loving glances with my friend!
 The thirst of honors godlike fierce unrest,
 Which, like a meteor, perishes in smoke!
 Show me the fruit that rots before one saps it!
 The tree that daily buds to him that plucks it!

MEPHISTO.—E'en this commission doth no fears provoke,
 And such small trifles are to me a joke.
 Yet, my good friend, the hour's fast growing nigh
 When we, at ease, our own fat fish may fry.

FAUST.—If on a bed of idleness I e'er stretch
 My limbs contented, send me to the crows;
 If you can ever flatter this poor wretch,
 Or galk him to complacency, suppose,
 If you can sate woe with enjoyment, then
 Dawn the last day for this most wretched man!
 That bet I offer!

MEPHISTO.—Done!

FAUST.—And done again!
 Find me the moment, tempter, if you can,
 To which I'll cry "oh stay, thou art so sweet."
 Then you may clasp the gyves about my wrists,

Then will I gaily go my fate to meet.
 Let the sad death bell toll then, if it lists,
 For this poor parting soul—then too you shall
 Be free for ever from your ministry:
 The clock may stop, the minute hand may fall
 Since Time for ever will have done with me.
 MEPHISTO.—Bethink it well! be sure we won't forget.
 FAUST.—No doubt you'll have the best right to remember,
 For I've no too rash measure on me set,
 Should I continue I'll due service render;
 What care I if your flunky or another's?

BOUGHT AND SOLD.

I stood to-night in my foam-white lace,
 With pearls in my shining hair,
 And I hid my heart with a smiling face,
 And the gazers said, "How fair—
 How blithe and bright is the maid to-night,
 Who stands at the altar there."

And I heard them praise the costly things
 That purchased my nuptial vow;
 Praise the jewel that clings and stings
 And burdens my finger now;
 The milk-white pearls that twine in my curls
 And hang like a burden on my brow.

Praise as we praise the frozen tree
 That the hoar-white frosts begem,
 And the cold cuts keen; but we only see
 The glittering diadem;
 And the leaves beneath, in the cruel wreath,
 We've never a thought for them.

Bought with a heap of shining gold;
 Bring hither a red hot rod,
 And brand my forehead, write there "Sold,
 And lost to Heaven and to God."
 Yet, weak heart, wait! you chose your fate,
 All jeweled and golden shod.

THE VOICES OF NATURE.

AN EXTRACT FROM "THE REVERE," A POEM BY EDWARD MAAC DORROW.

The moanings low of distant seas,
 That saddened splash along the shore
 Against great rocks, all grey and hoar,
 The sighing winds within the trees—

Old Ocean's mountain waves sublime,
 That chase each other o'er the deep,
 And round the World in grandeur sweep,
 Alike, defying Death and Time—

The thunder shocks from out the gloom
 Of raging storms that tortured groan
 Across the Globe from zone to zone—
 The hidden secrets of the tomb—

The dreary wastes, and deserts vast,
 That robe old Africa in white,
 The movements of the stars at night,
 The solemn wonders of the Past—

The grey, bleak cliffs and crags that lift
 From out the sea, and sullen loom
 Along the shore athrough the gloom,
 Until the clouds from off them shift—

The planets yet unknown above,
 The brook that winds through wood and field,
 The years to come—what food ye yield
 For Meditation and for Love!

Special Notices.

Do not fail to read Dr. Docking's advertisement, on the last page.

For the very best Photographs go to Bradley & Bulofson's Gallery, with an elevator, 429 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Subscribers and Advertisers who change their residence without notifying the Business Manager are expected to pay the full amount agreed upon.

A purchaser is wanted at this office for a Sherman & Hyde Piano—the best instrument sold for the price—entirely new; also one of the celebrated Standard Organs, manufactured by Peloubet, Pelton & Co., New York. Inquire of A. M. SZOCUM.

Those suffering from that most annoying of the minor miseries of human life—cold in the head—or from catarrh in any form, should try Dr. Evory's Diamond Catarrh Remedy. Just try it—that's all. Sold at this office, and by all druggists.

Send Austin Kent one dollar for his pamphlets on Free Love and Marriage, etc. He has been seventeen years physically helpless, confined to his bed and chair, is poor and needs the money. He sends four or five well-written essays for one dollar. His address is AUSTIN KENT, Stockholm, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., Box 44.

Signs of the Times.

George Jacob Holyoake, editor of the London Reasoner, is to contribute one article each month to the columns of the Index, Boston.

Science, not faith, is to be the guiding star of coming generations. The significant facts of our daily experience prove this beyond a doubt.

The amount paid by the Russian Government for war purposes in time of peace is sixteen times that expended for the education of the people.

Eight hundred young girls lately applied for positions at a Philadelphia theatre, in answer to an advertisement for 200 ballet dancers.

Mrs. Anne B. Richardson, wife of the Hon. Daniel S. Richardson, of Lowell, has been made a trustee of the State Industrial School for Girls, at Lancassar, Mass.

Notwithstanding the fears of many people that trouble will grow out of the efforts to put "God in the Constitution," it is a fact that the late convention in favor of that movement, held in Boston, was very weak, and that the appeals it made to the people have as yet awakened no decided response.

Rev. L. P. Hickok, D. D., LL. D., the author of "The Logic of Reason," admits the necessity of some new mode of reasoning to successfully carry on the contest Christianity is waging against skepticism. The Boston Advertiser says the book is a more open and utter confession of defeat than has yet been made by anybody holding similar views.

Rev. W. S. Bell, a young man of more than ordinary ability, graduated two years ago from the Divinity School at Cambridge, and entered upon the ministry in the Universalist Church, he believing that to be the most liberal; but he has recently severed his fellowship and is now preaching to independent congregations, including Spiritualistic societies.

Dexter A. Hawkins says "illiterate adults in this country produce thirty times as many paupers and ten times as many criminals as the same number of adults, under similar conditions, with such an education as may be obtained in the free common schools. The cost of taking care of our paupers and criminals, though comparatively few in numbers, is as large as the whole cost of a good system of free common schools and the vigorous enforcement of the law to secure to all children the benefits of elementary education.

The American Unitarian Association has just issued Channing's complete works, in one volume of 631 pages, which is to be sold at $1. per copy.

Printing in colors is now done by preparing blocks of coloring material, so cut as to fit into each other, and giving all the colors required at one impression. The process effects a great saving in press work.

Religious newspapers generally are complaining of lack of adequate support. Some of them with a circulation of eight or twelve thousand fail to pay expenses, in consequence of the delinquencies of subscribers. Is this a good sign?

The New York Children's Aid Society found homes for 3400 children during the past year, the majority of them being of American parentage and more than one thousand having both parents living.

A new system of utilizing steam power has been discovered by which a great saving is effected. It has been found that an engine can be worked from the escape pipe of another engine with an increase of power, and so far as experimented upon any practicable number of engines may be so attached.

A hanging railway car, suggested by Mr. Bessemer's steam system, has been tested with success on the northern railway of France. Seated in this car, which hangs on elastic springs, the traveler experiences the sensation of a hammock, free from vibrations and bumping. The movement is described as very gentle.

A London inventor has secured a patent on a new India rubber tire for wagon wheels, which is claimed to be capable of wearing as long as, or longer than an iron tire, and to have the great advantage of perfect noiselessness and absence of injurious jar. The draft of the carriage is said to be reduced by the use of this tire nearly one-third.

A French chemist professes to have discovered the secret of a chemical composition which has the property of giving to glass extraordinary hardness. Immersed in a bath of the new invention the ordinary material acquires such a degree of cohesion that it opposes to shock of hard bodies or action of fire a resistance ten or fifteen times greater than before. A sample of only three millimeters in thickness resisted the weight of 100 grammes falling from the height of five meters. Thrown on the ground with force it rebounded without breaking, and emitted a sound like a leaf of metal. The company will first introduce it in kitchen articles. This seems to be the re-discovery of one of the lost arts.

THE FALSE PRETENSIONS OF RELIGION.

BY E. VOGEL.

All the influence and importance of religion rest on the belief that it is the manifestation of the will of God. Under the claim of divine authority religion has controled, and, to a great extent, still controls the destinies of mankind, undertakes to establish a standard of ideal excellence, to provide the impulses of noble and exemplary action, and, in short, has extended, or is still trying to extend, its jurisdiction over the human interests both of this and of a future life. A claim of this magnitude, involving as it does the whole of human happiness, deserves well to be subjected to an earnest and close investigation.

The basis of all revealed religion is tradition, existing, if not orally alone, in the shape of some so-called sacred writing; that of Christianity is the Bible. The signs or words contained in the Bible are the whole and the sole foundation of Christianity; whatever power or superiority there may be in it, it must be in those dead letters, it can be nowhere else, because in them all is included. Is it possible that dead letters can establish divine authority? We can conceive how such divine agents as heat, light, hunger, thirst, etc., make themselves felt and understood by men always and everywhere; but letters or words have no vital force of their own, their only natural property consists in producing impressions of sight, and man is no automaton, moved at the sight of letters. He acts, in conformity to the laws of his organization, from motives acquired by the instrumentality of the senses, being guided by his experience of the means of his welfare. If, profiting by the experience of his fellow men, he adopts and follows their suggestions and counsels, it is only when his own experience justifies him to conclude that the offered opinions are correct, founded on natural events and confirmatory of his own views. The man who allows himself to be guided by others without good reason and conviction, is a mere tool or slave, liable to the grossest errors and abuses.

Divine authority over men implies then God's influence determining human experience, understanding or reason to acknowledge such authority. But religion, resting on letters and words alone, establishes divine authority by human agency, in the following manner: First—The letters or words of the Scriptures meet the eye of some man. Second—He, by his experience, recognises them as the signs of a language, expressing the ideas of the writer. Third—He further finds that the writer's ideas are to the effect that they constitute the will of God. Fourth—He concludes, from his own experience and conviction, that the writer's views are correct, and thereupon proclaims the will of God on the authority of the Bible.

This explanation shows the line of demarcation separating religion and science, and the ground on which rests the distinction of spiritual and temporal things. Both religion and science are established by, and depend on, human experience, understanding or reason; but, while religion stands on the frail support of dead letters, science reposes on the broad basis of life and nature, and spiritual things are different from others only by the arbitrary assertions of ecclesiastics.

And it further shows, with mathematical certainty, the utter groundlessness of the claim of divine authority. All human knowledge is derived, directly or indirectly, from the impressions of the senses; there is no means of communication with man except through the senses. If there exists anything outside of nature, it can never be an object of human experience, the human faculties being adapted only to the perception of natural things. We may perceive indirectly, by inference, such as the waves of sound and light, the analogy between heat and light, the physical constitution of the sun by the aid of the spectroscope, etc.; but these indirect perceptions are deductions from real experience, and correct only when so founded. It is therefore impossible for man to know, or even to imagine, anything not natural, and all that has been put forth as divine and spiritual in opposition to nature, is but illusion or deception.

[For Common Sense.]

RE-INCARNATION.

"That alone which moves itself can never cease to be moved, because it can never desert itself. Moreover it must be the source and origin and principle of motion in all the rest. There can be nothing, prior to a principle, for all things must originate from it, and it cannot itself derive its existence from any other source, for if it did it would be no longer a principle."—Cicero.

Individual immortality must depend upon a principle inherent in itself, or be conferred and sustained by a power possessing that principle. In either case the principle itself is eternal without beginning or end. If a principle so exists in us, and philosophy asserts there is, then are we immortal, self-existent, corporeally mortal but essentially immortal.

The Materialist is said to deny individual immortality; the Christian to have it dependent upon the will of an eternal God; the Spiritualist to affirm individual immortality in the future, but denying it in the past, giving a beginning to eternity; another to place the origin and destiny of the soul in deity. With the latter view we will linger a little while, not to speculate on the nature of deity, to decide in favor of polytheism, monotheism, pantheism or atheism; whether the soul will, in its apotheosis, retain its individuality or be absorbed in the infinite ocean of self-existent being; but to sit at the feet of the ancients and learn the lesson of spiritual progress in every form of animated being.

Eternal progression was not considered by the ancients to be an attribute of deity, nor of those destined to be gods; but the spirit, the deity in man, possessed in itself absolute perfection, and as the deity could only manifest itself through the medium of matter, to use the language of Scripture, it had to leave the bosom of the Father, become God manifest in the flesh and pass through various, forms and conditions of being, till it arrived at the measure of the stature of those in whom dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and then return to the possession of the glory it had with the Father before the world began. This divine incarnation was probably the result of an inevitable law of the divine nature, by which the spirit had been eternally passing through cycles of living experience. Every star in the firmament had been its battlefield, and the star indicated the progress of incarnated deity towards the goal of its emancipation from corporeal limitations. The universe was the school of the soul; to understand the soul it was necessary to understand the universe. We will therefore hastily glance at the views anciently held regarding the universe.

Belonging immediately to the world were four elementary spheres, earth, water, air and fire—solids, fluids, gases and electric agencies. From these came the mortal part of man, and at his dissolution each part went to its place. Thus in the atmosphere dwelt mortal spirits—demons quickened only with a passing vitality, the reflection of the divinity which brought them into being, or souls of men unworthy of a higher state.

"Four things of man there are, spirit, soul, ghost, flesh;
These four, four places keep and do possess.
The earth covers flesh, the ghost hovers o'er the grave,
Orbs hath the soul, stars do the spirit crave."

Then followed the seven planetary spheres, the fixed stars, the crystalline sphere and the primum mobile the abode of the Supreme. As man was a microcosm, he also possessed the nature and arrangement of the spheres—four elementary temperaments subject to the higher planetary temperaments, all ruled by a vague indescribable longing to reach the infinite—to be home again with God.

The following table, prepared from Claudius Ptolemy, illustrates how the seven ages of man accord with the planetary arrangement and predestined progress of the soul:

SPHERES.	PLANETS.	AGES.	YEARS.	DEVELOPMENT.
First	The Moon	Infancy	4	Physical
Second	Mercury	Childhood	10	Mental
Third	Venus	Puberty	8	Amative
Fourth	The Sun	Responsibility	19	Social
Fifth	Mars	Manhood	15	Individual
Sixth	Jupiter	Wisdom	12	Philosophical
Seventh	Saturn	Retirement	Death	Spiritual

From the planetary spheres the spirit progressed through the three deific spheres and rested from its labors. But progress from sphere to sphere was not continuous. Upward progress depended entirely on the spirit's fitness to ascend. Socrates, in Plato's Phaedrus, says:

"But whenever from inability to keep up it has not seen any of them, (true essences or truths,) and from meeting with some misfortune has been filled with oblivion and vice, and so weighed down has lost its wings and fallen to the earth, then there is a law that this soul should not be implanted in any brutal nature in its first generation, but that the soul that has seen most should enter into the germ of a man who will become a philosopher, a lover of the beautiful, or a votary of the Muses and Love."

After describing the other inferior grades of being, he adds:

"But among all these whosoever passes his life justly afterwards obtains a better lot, but who unjustly, a worse one. For to the same place whence each soul comes, it does not return till the expiration of ten thousand years; for it does not recover its wings for so long a period, except it is the soul of a sincere lover of wisdom, or of one who has made philosophy his favorite."

The spirit born into this world partook of the nature of the planet from which it came, as Socrates in another place illustrates: "Such as are in the service of Mars, and went round heaven with him, when they are caught by Love, and think they are at all injured by the object of their love, are bloodthirsty and ready to immolate both themselves and their favorite."

Astrology teaches that the ruling planet must either be in the ascendant, or in aspect thereto, or a sign in harmony with the planet must be on the ascendant; therefore a spirit could only take possession of a body when the ascendant was in harmony with the planet from which the spirit came. The horoscope of an individual always indicating the sphere his spirit came from. Perhaps it indicated the status of the spirit when in that sphere, as the horoscope at death might be the indicator of its destiny in the following sphere. This is neither affirmed nor denied. It is the ancient theology of Astrology. It is not in accordance with modern thought. The geocentric disposition of the spheres will seem an insurmountable difficulty, but not really so. The sun and earth only change places. The sphere of the earth being the sphere of authority claimed formerly for the sun. And undoubtedly authority is the life and curse of the world. The heliocentric arrangement would simply indicate that the sun, when in the ascendant, stamped the character of each planet upon those born therein, and the primary sphere would be the satellites of those planets possessing them.

Prof. Chaney gives to Uranus the quality of imparting mediumistic power, that is rising higher in the spheres than Saturn it is more spiritual. Can the Professor say whether Neptune in the ascendant does not confer mediumistic power of a still higher grade? It will now be readily seen why Astrology and magic, or Spiritualism, used to go invariably hand in hand. The magician who would communicate with the spirits of the starry realms, had to select a time when the planet of the spirit invoked was in harmony with his own nativity. This faith, though almost unknown to the 19th century, has never been without a representation. Lieutenant R. J. Morrison, of London, the zadkiel of astrological celebrity, has devoted the last and best forty years of his life to the religion of the stars. He is now an ardent defender of the Ptolemaic or geocentric theory of the universe. His New Principea is well worthy the attention of the disciples of Newton, as every proposition is backed by figures, which, common report says, cannot lie. The following, taken from his Almanac, is a good illustration of the nature of this belief:

"The first vision I ever had was on the 29th of January, 1850, as follows: A tall man appears with a helmet on, and in armor. * * * He is fierce looking, but has a pleasant smile. He calls himself Orion, and has written on his breast, Sent from God. * * * I ask, Art thou a spirit of the Moon? He says, No, I am not; I come from the atmosphere. Having been shown other planets, I ask to see Jupiter. He says, You can have a spirit from Jupiter, but you cannot see Jupiter; you will go to Jupiter when you die."

Mr. Morrison's nomme de plume, Zadkiel, is the planetary angel of Jupiter, he having Sagettarius on the ascendant at birth, had in consequence Jupiter as his ruling planet. It is not improbable that this faith may yet obtain while the present spiritual tidal wave continues its influence over the world. At any rate it will hurt no one to be acquainted with ideas akin to those now agitating the thinking people of this age. In the meantime let each one

"Be worthy of death; and so learn to live,
That every incarnation of thy soul
In other realms and worlds and firmaments,
Shall be more pure and high."

ED. COMMON SENSE:—The spiritual public circles, at Charter Oak Hall, on Tuesday evenings, are distinguished by the great variety of tests obtained, and by the fact that different Mediums go around the circle, taking the hand and giving timely council and words of cheer to nearly every person present. The large attendance is harmoniously arranged, by forming circles within circles to the apparent convenience and satisfaction of all. W. H.

ASTROLOGY—NO. 8.

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

I was often disgusted, when a young man, at hearing people talk about weaning children "when the sign was right," planting seed, slaughtering animals for food, etc. True, I had never tested any of these sayings in order to determine the truth or falsity involved, but, like all bigots, I assumed that such things were against reason, and therefore false. Reader, whenever you meet with a person whose standard of logic extends no higher than this, waste no time with them in argument, for depend upon it, in their contracted ideas, there is no possible room for inductive truths. Those who say, "I don't know anything about it, and I don't want to," are so weighted down with bigotry, that no amount of reason and philosophy can ever unload them. Let them pass as incurables, and devote your spare time to such as are willing to investigate and test the truth or falsity of any doctrine.

SUPPOSED WHIMSICAL ASTROLOGY.

In this paper of my series, I shall deal with every-day facts, which the presumptuous wise denounce as whims and superstitions. Every one having any knowledge of Natural Philosophy, knows that it is from the attraction of the Moon and Sun, principally caused by the Moon, that the ocean tides ebb and flow. Moreover, that the Moon exerts a different influence at her quadratures, than at her conjunctions and oppositions. Here, then, is admitted the very principle, which, among the forces of Nature, contributes to the events, the cause of which I once denied, doing so, however, through ignorance.

If the Moon exerts an influence upon the water, why not upon the land and all other objects? If her influence is different upon the water, in her quadratures, from what it is in her conjunctions and oppositions, why not the same rule follow upon other things, since Nature is universal, always acting upon fixed laws? Among intelligent people, there can be but one answer to these questions, and based upon those answers we proceed with the investigation.

We observe that lunatics are worse at the new and full Moon than at other times. The ancients observed this fact, and under the mistaken idea that the Moon alone caused insanity, they called the insane "lunatics," from the Latin Luna, "the Moon." This, however, was a mistake, for in a Nativity, the position and aspects of Mercury, are sought for as much as those of the Moon, in order to determine whether the person will be subject to lunacy.

If a man falls to sleep with the full Moon shining in his face he is likely to awake partially idiotic, and is called "Moon struck." A brother-in-law of mine had that experience while a soldier, and for several weeks afterwards he was quite foolish. The Moon, when new, or in her quadratures, will not produce this result.

In the tropics, fresh meat exposed for a short time to the Moon's rays, will become tainted, while fresh fish will begin to decompose in a few hours after being so exposed, although the same fish would remain untainted for twelve hours, if kept out of the Moon's rays.

These facts, and many others which might be adduced, establish two points: First—That the Moon exerts an influence, not only upon the water, but upon other objects. Second—That the influence is different according to her position with reference to the Sun, from whom she receives all her light. Here, then are the logical facts which prove beyond cavil, that the "whims" to which I have alluded, may be logically true. Whether they are or not, requires demonstrative proof, and this the reader must seek for, as I have done.

These so called "whims," were formerly a part of astrology, which leaked out to the common people, the same as certain points of law, or the secrets of medicine, are known to the people of the present day. Once known, the facts were transmitted by tradition, till the origin became lost. Now these "whims" are not true, because they originally belonged to astrology, nor because they have been preserved for thousands of years. Points of law have been perpetuated for generations among the common people, after they had ceased to be law. For instance, even to the present day, many people think that a witness will not be allowed to testify to what he has seen through window glass.

I would caution the reader not to be too credulous, and to accept as fact, only that which is proved. I shall not furnish the demonstrative proofs, but will give a list of some of the "whims," nearly all of which I have demonstrated to be true.

Stock that is being fattened, thrive better in "the light of the moon," so called, that is, from the conjunction to the opposition, or from new to full Moon. From the full to the new, is called "the dark of the Moon." The flesh of animals slaughtered in "the light of the Moon," will swell when cooked, the fat of pork seeming to project beyond the skin; the fat of beef remains firm, cooking out but little. If the animal is slaughtered in "the dark of the Moon," the flesh shrinks when cooked, the fat of pork draws together so that the skin projects beyond it; the fat of beef nearly all cooks out, leaving it shrunken, stringy, and unpalatable. Nearly all persons have observed these different phenomena, and although aware that there can be no effect without a cause, have never thought to enquire into these causes.

Fences built in "the dark of the Moon," especially if she be transiting in an earthy sign, always tend to sink into the ground. The reverse in "the light of the Moon," especially if she be in an airy sign. In "the dark of the Moon," and she in an earthy sign, sod should be broken, a roof shingled, and all seed planted which you desire to take deep root, or the yield of which is the root itself. This is also a favorable time for killing weeds, but not the most so. Trees and roots may be transplanted under this aspect, but should not be trimmed. The trimming should be done in "the light of the Moon," while she is in either Aries or Sagittarius. When in "the light of the Moon," and she transiting in an airy sign, plant all seeds which you desire to have large tops or grow good vines.

During "the dark of the Moon," while the Sun is transiting in Leo, all vegetable life is tender, but more especially when the Moon is also in Leo. Under this aspect, in "the dark of the Moon," a single stroke of an ax is said to destroy the life of a large tree. This aspect only occurs for a few days each year, and when it does, farmers should improve the time to destroy obnoxious weeds. I have not yet calculated upon this aspect for 1875, but may do so, and publish it for the benefit of the public, although that same public never thinks of doing anything for me as a remuneration for the information which has cost me years of study and thousands of dollars, in time and money, and which I impart gratuitously. That the reader may understand what I mean by an "airy sign, etc.," I subjoin the following:

Fiery Triplicity—Aries, Leo and Sagittarius.

Earthy Triplicity—Taurus, Virgo and Capricornus.

Airy Triplicity—Gemini, Libra and Aquarius.

Watery Triplicity—Cancer, Scorpio and Pisces.

Here is the origin of the "four elements," earth, air, fire and water.

THE PATRIOTIC ORDER OF SONS OF AMERICA.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—Neither in "qualification for membership" in the Constitution, nor in "form of application for charter" of the P. O. S. of A., is the Bible mentioned. In the former, however, one of the necessary qualifications is the belief in a Supreme Being, but nothing in regard to a personal God, the "personal" being prefixed by the writer of an article in the November number of the Camp News, entitled "Our Faith versus Skepticism," to which the editor refers, and evidently endorses. I was somewhat surprised at his reply in the same number to questions submitted to him in regard to the principles of the Order, and to which you refer in your issue of December 12th. Having a few months ago instituted Camp No. 1 of California, located in San Francisco, I am well aware that there are various opinions there, as elsewhere, among the membership, in regard to the inspiration of the Bible, and its removal from the public schools, etc. That there are good, bad and indifferent passages in the book, every intelligent person knows, who reads it, the difference between us, being, some of us have the moral courage to acknowledge it, others have not. If an ordinary school boy of the present day should attempt and fail to write a more interesting composition than much that can be found in the Old Testament, he would deserve to go to the foot of his class; while if a man were to print in pamphlet form, and attempt to sell in your streets, some of its nastiest passages, how long would it be, think you, before the Y. M. C. A's. would have him arrested and imprisoned like George Francis Train, not for peddling "the word of God," nor obscene literature even. Oh, no! that would not do—it would knock the foundation from under Christianity—but for "insanity!" However, I see no reason why the writers of the better portions of the Bible were not as really inspired as writers of equally as good things are at the present day. I was educated to believe the whole book to be the inspired word of God, but having little or no superstition in my composition, reason and common sense soon got the better of me, and I cannot now entertain such a mean opinion of a Supreme Being as to believe him to be the direct author of the obscene and contradictory passages in the Bible, for whatever may have been my belief in the past, I have recently received an eye-opener in the form of a pamphlet containing 144 contradictions quoted from the Scriptures, many of which are as plain as can well be expressed by the English language.

The Order referred to, though not in every respect as liberal as the most radical friends of freedom could wish, yet as far as it has a tendency to inculcate the spirit of patriotism among its members—to oppose Romanism, or any other ism, as far as it would interfere with our liberties, or their basis, the public school system—and opposed to a union of church and State, or any undue foreign interference with our free institutions, is doing a good work in its own way, and is deserving of the support of every true friend of freedom and progress, and has my best wishes for its prosperity. But if, in the future, I see anything in its obligations or declaration of principles to seriously interfere with my individual rights as a free thinker, as an advocate of truth as I now see it, or any attempt on the part of its members to meddle in any way with my prerogatives as such, I shall endeavor to stand by those rights as becomes an American freeman, regardless of consequences. If this be considered treason or heresy to any Order, institution, church or government, let such make the most of it.

Yours for freedom at whatever cost, I. A. HEALD.

FROM ONE WHO IS NOT AFRAID.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—I feel disposed to express my opinion through your paper about the lecture which was delivered by Laura Cuppy Smith, last Sunday evening, on the subject, "The Clergy a Source of Danger." After a lengthy discourse, and summing up of criminal acts of our so called religious preachers, in different parts of the United States, and also of our priest-ridden city of San Francisco, the speaker expressed a fear that the time is not far distant when our General Government will ask its people not to send any other members to our Legislature and to Congress excepting believers of the orthodox faith. I have a different opinion. Danger of that sort has reached its highest point when a tyrannical preacher, like Dr. Stone, stands before an audience and tells the people, as he did a couple of years ago, that there would be a good many poor landlords, if it wasn't for the intelligent Chinamen in this city. I then began to think about our thousands of poor mechanics, and of our boys and girls who are deprived of the opportunity of learning a trade, and are driven to destitution and misery through the influence of this Chinese slave labor. I could no longer respect any institution which our reverend gentleman has a position in; for I have too much love for my own race of people, and I will especially see to it, that none of my children shall ever enter any orthodox church where such demoralizing principles are taught. I therefore say that the time is not far distant when we will ask the question, before we go to the ballot box: "Is that an orthodox headhanger? [I don't know one of them who is straight and beautiful.] If he is, scratch him." This is all I wish to say at this time. As a bootmaker my time is short, and my hours are fourteen every day. Such labor is necessary for my wife and six children

The waters of Salt Lake, Utah, are evidently rising year. Thousands of acres of farming lands have been submerged along its shores. It is believed that the settlement of the country has caused greater moisture and an increased flow of water into the lake.

Those people who deride woman suffrage, and regret that they were not original abolitionists, may yet have reason to mourn that they did not greet the last reform any more warmly than they did the first.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOOUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, JAN. 23, 1875.

NEITHER the editors nor the correspondents of COMMON SENSE are responsible for any opinions expressed in its columns by others. As it is intended to be a Free Thought Journal, it must necessarily contain views which no one person can wholly approve.

DURING the last four weeks our subscription list has largely increased, although comparatively few subscribers forwarded the money. During the same time we have stricken from the list many names of those who have failed to pay. Some of these have had the paper from the first number, and have not remitted a dollar. This does not speak well for people professing to be Liberal. Hereafter, we shall not continue the paper more than one month without payment, or at least a definite promise to pay soon. Come friends, let us hear from you. We cannot very well send bills in the paper. The address itself is a tanding statement of account, and it should be a rebukes to those who are able to pay to see "May '74" still standing opposite their names from week to week.

BROTHER YORK has given twelve of his soul stirring lectures in San Buenaventura, and the result is a thorough awakening of the Free Thinkers of that place, and an addition of nine to the subscription list of COMMON SENSE. As usual our friend and co-laborer in the good cause declines to receive the commission due him for his services. If we had a few more such workers as friend York it would not be long before the paper would have a subscription list running up into the thousands. He has now gone to San Bernardino, and will probably remain there a week or two, thence to San Diego or Los Angeles. Success to him.

Dr. Draper goes further than to say there is an impending conflict between religion and science. He predicts the issue of the struggle as follows: "Whatever is resting on fiction and fraud will be overthrown. Institutions that organize impostures and delusions must show what right they have to exist. Faith must render an account of herself to reason. Mysteries must give place to facts. Religion must relinquish that imperious, that domineering position which it has so long maintained against Science. There must be absolute freedom for thought."

REFORM LECTURES.—The discourses now being given by Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith, at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union, 911 Market street, are too good to be lost by our readers, and all who can should endeavor to attend. A brief sketch of last Sunday's evening lecture is given in this paper, but it necessarily fails to express the earnestness and force of the speaker. Her afternoon discourse, which was also excellent, is spoken of by a friend, who is endeavoring against adverse circumstances to live a pure and upright life, as a great consolation. It depicted the compensations of life in hopeful language, giving assurance that our efforts for the right, however hard the struggle, are sure to meet with reward in the formation of a noble character, which is of far more value than material wealth. To-morrow afternoon Mrs. Smith's subject is "Bigotry in Reform," and in the evening, "Is Spiritualism a Delusion?"

Some of our wise newspaper men condemn the growing tendency of young women to engage in business for support thus neglecting their duty to enter into marriage relations. They would have women confined to the arts of husband-catching. It is well known that it is the hope of getting a husband to support them that usually makes girls so inefficient in all the work they attempt to do, and it is only when they give up the thought of marriage as a means of support that they really become worth anything in the world of work. Women who learn trades, or compete with men in business, are condemned for their inefficiency, and failure to perfect themselves in their calling; yet those who do perfect themselves, and in order to do so give up all thought of getting a man to support them, are by the same critics condemned for forsaking domestic life—for not becoming wives and mothers. Well, it is difficult to please some people. The truth is, a certain class of men, and a very large class, desire to keep women in a dependent position.

Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, and Mr. Jones of Chicago, are now giving seances for materializations at the rooms of Mrs. Cotter, No. 10 Stockton street, where arrangements may be made for private sittings at any time during the day. Public seances are given every evening. The cabinet is in the same room with the sitters, and is on castors so it may be moved to any part of the room. As there is an open space over and under the cabinet, no person can enter it unobserved, and during dark seances, a circle may be formed, if desired, entirely around the cabinet, though in that case those at the rear could not see anything, unless the spirits walk out of the door, a feat which has been promised but not yet performed.

Referring to the God in the constitution movement, the Golden Age says "you can't take the rascal out of a man by altering his door-plate." Very true, but you may put a little more of the hypocrite into him by doing so.

The penitentiary at Albany, N. Y., cleared $30,000 over expenses last year.

A LESSON FOR THE SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.

The editors of San Francisco have not generally exhibited a friendly spirit towards "Prison Reform;" on the contrary some of them have more than once sneered at the idea, and have asserted that the discipline of our prisons is already too lax, that the prisoners are treated with too great leniency, and that prison life is not made sufficiently burdensome to be a terror to evil doers. But the coldness with which "prison reform" has been treated by the hypocritical, time-serving newspapers of San Francisco is genial compared to the frigidity with which some other phases of social reform have been frowned upon by the immaculate press. In the Bulletin the very name "social reform" has been tabooed, lest some readers might suppose it referred to the sacred institution of marriage, or to sexual relations—a subject quite too indelicate for discussion in the columns of that Miss Nancy sheet. Occasionally, however, it becomes necessary for a journal which pretends to give the news of the day to make mention of a fact which has a bearing on one of these tabooed subjects, and the manner in which the feat is accomplished is sometimes highly amusing. For instance, the Bulletin of Saturday last had occasion to mention the fact that Dr. Harris, of New York, in his investigations into the criminal records of that State, had made a remarkable discovery, which is that hundreds of criminals and paupers in one county descended from one woman—a "mother of criminals," who was born a hundred years ago. The Bulletin does not give the full facts, but Dr. Harris says he discovered that from a girl named "Margaret"—who was left adrift, nobody remembers how, in a village of the county, seventy years ago, and, in the absence of an almshouse, was left to grow up as best she could—have descended two hundred criminals. As an illustration of this remarkable record, in one single generation of her unhappy line there were twenty children; of these, three died in infancy, and seventeen survived maturity. Of the seventeen, nine served in State prison for high crimes an aggregate term of fifty years, while the others were frequent inmates of jails and penitentiaries and alms-houses! The whole number of this girl's descendants, through six generations, is six hundred, and besides the two hundred who are on record as criminals, a large number have been idiots, imbeciles, drunkards, lunatics, prostitutes and paupers. The Bulletin copies merely the following, from the New York Evening Post:

The girl began her career of illegitimate maternity very early, some eighty-five years since, but the six generations of criminals and paupers of which we spoke have appeared within seventy years. The descendants of this girl and of two neglected sisters count up 480 criminal or pauper persons. These have inter-married with 143 others of like wretched character, and the total number of descendants now known, both living and dead—mainly convicts, paupers, criminals, beggars, and vagrants, is 623.

From this lesson, so full of meaning, so striking in its proof that right generation is the all important question of this age, the Bulletin affects to see nothing more than an argument for prison reform! Well, really, we are thankful that something has at last forced from that cold-blooded sheet a word in favor of prison reform, though it does happen to be a fact which has about as much connection with prison reform as it has with the conversion of the heathen.

Here is a woman, who, neglected by society, scorned and outlawed, becomes hardened and desperately wicked. She gives birth to those of her kind. It could not, under the circumstances, be otherwise. We do not look for lambs among the whelps of a wolf; why should we expect a virtuous progeny from the pariahs of society? Children take on the conditions under which they are born, and inherit the tendencies of their parents. If a mother is forced by society to evil courses for a livelihood, her children will be evil, and if they are in turn neglected, their children will be as bad or worse.

No, it is not prison reform, but social reform that this lesson teaches. It proves the vital importance of that most neglected of all subjects, the science of stirpiculture, a subject which more urgently than any other demands the attention of a people boasting of its civilization. It is a lesson also in favor of the education by the State of all the children of the State. It is a disgrace to modern civilization that the children of the poor and degraded are suffered by society to grow up in misery and vice to become the enemies of that society which so neglects them.

It is another proof also of the duty of our public instructors, physicians, ministers, school teachers and others, to foster a public sentiment in opposition to the production of children by parents beyond their ability properly to rear and educate them. So long as the State refuses to care for the children of the poor, it is a sin to bring them into the world to become first the victims, then the enemies of society. But who dare preach this vital truth from the pulpit, and what secular paper gives it a hearing in its columns?

Our daughters are taught that to become wives and the mothers of families is a duty paramount to every other; and many a one sinks her womanhood in the bitter struggles of the overburdened wife and mother, and consoles herself with the oft repeated lie that she is doing her duty. When will these shams of society cease, and woman learn that her first duty is to herself, to make her own nature purer, richer and more capable? Wifehood may be well, and motherhood necessary to the complete rounding of womanly character, but when the wife becomes a slave, and the mother shrinks with dread from the contemplation of again taking upon herself the burdens of maternity, it is time to inquire if there is not something radically wrong in a social system that produces such results. Two or three children, well developed mentally and physically, are a blessing to the parents and to society, while a dozen puny things born in defiance of the soul protests of the mother, are a curse; yet how few women are encouraged or even allowed to resist the forced maturity that is the rule, not the exception, of the ordinary marriage state. It is also a question worthy the attention of students of social science, whether nobler and better children cannot be produced by women who are, in a measure at least, independent of a husband's control during the period of child-bearing. Yet because COMMON SENSE barely mentioned a fact of this kind a couple of weeks since, merely recording the birth of a healthy child by a woman living independent of husbandly dictation, who had previously lost two children in the marriage relation, a great hullabaloo was raised, and one subscriber (who by the way is one of the editors of the Bulletin.) stopped his paper with an indignant message, the most important part of which is as follows:

"Friend Slocum: You will favor me by discontinuing sending 'COMMON SENSE' to my address, and by striking my name from your list. When such disgusting paragraphs as the following find their way into its columns, even under the head of 'Special Notices,' the paper ceases to command my respect, and has no further claim upon my sympathy."

Here follows the notice of the birth of a child to Mrs. Richardson, as follows:

BORN.—In San Francisco, January 4, 1875, a daughter to James and Anna Richardson. During a wedded life of four years Mrs. Richardson, (then Anna Smith) being in delicate health, lost two young babes, which experience, with other considerations, induced her to become again mistress of herself, as she was prior to marriage. This child, which was desired, and was deliberately begotten in defiance of established usages, bids fair to live, to be a blessing and a benefit to its parents.

Now in spite of this proof that our disgusted friend has a great deal yet to learn in this world, he is really a man of more than ordinary ability and kindness of heart, but he evidently looks at the notice in question in the light of his prejudices rather than of his reason, and refuses to calmly consider a fact, merely because it appears to militate against one of the sacred institutions of our social system. Really it does not reflect in the least upon true marriage, but only on a sham, falsely called marriage. Legalized prostitution is not marriage, and the time will come when it will not be dangerous for any "Common Sense" editor to so declare.

From a half column notice of COMMON SENSE in the Post it appears that the editor of that paper is weaker mentally and much more debased morally than our friend of the Bulletin. The Post copies from COMMON SENSE the notice of the birth of Mrs. Richardson's child, and then says:

"Precisely what this means we do not know, but evidently something utterly nasty and vile."

This is an admission that the editor, being too weak mentally to comprehend a plain statement, is base enough morally to imagine that it is vile; and he further shows his lack of judgment, as well as purity of mind, by copying this "utterly nasty and vile" thing into his paper—thus giving to his readers "something utterly vile" and to COMMON SENSE an advertisement without charge which we would gladly have paid for, provided the Post does not falsify concerning its circulation as it does about other things. There is certainly one dilemma from which the editor of the Post cannot escape, which is, that he does not believe the notice in COMMON SENSE is as vile as he pretends, or he deliberately serves up to his readers that which he knows to be demoralizing. He can take either horn of this dilemma he chooses.

The Post gives this extract and our editorial comment as specimens of the "advanced ideas of people who rail at Christianity as unworthy the belief of intelligent men and women." If it will now give the vilest specimen that can be culled from the Christian Bible, it will be able to show its readers which of the two is most worthy "the belief of intelligent men and women;" but before doing so, the editor must take care that some zealous member of the Y. M. C. A. does not cause his arrest for publishing obscene literature.

SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.

On Saturday last, a meeting of a "chosen few" was held at the Chamber of Commerce, for the purpose of organizing a Social Science Association. There were present: President Gilman, of the State University, Rev. H. Stebbins, Dr. G. A. Shurtleff, W. W. Crane, Rev. A. Williams, C. T. Hopkins, Rev. J. Eels, Rev. O. Gibson, Dr. Gibbons, J. T. Doyle, Warring Wilkinson, W. C. Bartlett and J. Preston Moore. D. C. Gilman was asked to preside, and W. W. Crane elected Secretary. Mr. Gilman stated that the organization is intended to be free from church and political parties—composed of men who are willing to devote their time to maturing plans for the better administration of public affairs, to investigate all methods of modern science, and collect facts from all parts of the world, compare them and deliberate upon them, and spread their views for the benefit of society. It is not to be a moral reform association, but a body for the purpose of scientific investigation. Such a society was organized in Boston two years ago, and more recently similar societies have been organized in other cities.

Rev. A. Williams submitted the report of a committee that had been appointed to prepare a constitution. Its principal features are as follows:

This society shall be known as the Social Science Association of California, and shall consist of not to exceed two hundred and fifty members, who shall be distributed in sections as hereinafter provided.

The objects of the Congress shall be to investigate questions of social science, and collect and publish mature views regarding such subjects, with reference to a determination of the true and safe principles which underlie the industrial, economical and administrative interests of the commonwealth.

The subjects to be considered shall be distributed under the following sections, viz: 1. Production and commerce. 2. Jurisprudence and legislation. 3. Crime and its treatment. 4. Education and health. 5. Municipal administration.

Members of the Association may select the section or sections to which they shall belong, and each section may appoint its own Chairman, and shall have power to provide rules and regulations for its internal government.

This is very well, so far as it goes, but there are some important subjects omitted, and why the society should consist of any particular number of people, is not apparent to ordinary minds. There are always in such societies a few active members, who constitute its vitalizing force, but whether the main body be large or small, should depend entirely on circumstances.

Mr. Stebbins very properly suggested that it is not best to be in haste in adopting a code of laws, and that it would be well to communicate with the British and American Societies, and obtain their publications, and avail themselves of the experience and wisdom of other societies of this kind.

The constitution was approved, but may be hereafter modified. It seems that invitations had, prior to this meeting, been sent to sixty gentlemen, asking them to become members. By vote these invited persons were requested to attend the next meeting, and to sign the roll of members. The meeting then adjourned for four weeks.

A Social Science Association, founded on a liberal and sensible basis, would be an excellent institution, but there are indications that this movement contemplates an organization contracted both as to its membership and its objects. It looks as if it is to be fearfully respectable. There is nothing in the list of subjects which embraces the most vital question of the age: that is, the scientific propagation of the human species. This question underlies all others, it being that on which all others depend. It goes back of education, back of the science of government, of labor and capital, of commerce and of legislation. It is the basis of society, and if its laws were understood and regarded, a few generations would show such a change for the better, in social order, domestic happiness, public education and morality, that nine-tenths of the evils of society would disappear, and many of the questions that now agitate such learned bodies as Social Science Associations would not longer have to be discussed.

Another bad feature of this society is the exclusion of women, as if our mothers and wives could have no ideas on such subjects worthy of respect; while the truth is, their quiet contemplative lives, their intuitive nature, their personal experience, their higher morality, and greater personal purity, all give them an advantage over men, in the task of comprehending the principles of true social science, and in devising means for lessening the evils that under man-rule have for ages afflicted the human race. There never will be any real social or political reform, until women are admitted as an element in the government of affairs, and the exclusion of women from this new society is indicative of an old foggyism that argues ill for its usefulness.

In conclusion we respectfully suggest the admission of a live element into this society of savans, in the shape of a few practical observers of men and things like Prof. W. H. Chaney, a few thinkers like J. W. Mackie, and some earnest laborers in reform like Laura Cuppy Smith. We have had quite enough of pseudo scientific bosh in the history (in former years) of our Academy of Sciences, when it was composed in the main of a few antiquated doctors, briefless lawyers and self-satisfied theorists, who thought it a fine thing to be a member of a society with a big name.

THE CLERGY A SOURCE OF DANGER.

Mrs. Smith has grown since she left us in 1869. Her lecture on Sunday night was marked for its great intensity, warmth and womanly earnestness. She chose a theme full of interest to free-thinkers, to American citizens who value the liberty for which blood will be shed before another decade passes, or American thinkers will be abject slaves, cringing to their master, the Y. M. C. A., who in their turn will be swallowed up by the Catholic Hierarchy, if Infidels are afraid to do their duty.

After music by Mrs. Mathews, Mrs. Smith read a poem on an auction of pews in Plymouth Church, by an uninspired sinner. She believes, with Mr. Jameson, that the clergy are a source of danger to the American Republic—that they are the most dangerous class in the community, because they do the people's thinking, and are the keepers of their conscience, and the controllers of those nurseries of bigotry, the Sunday-schools, from the chains of which the freest of us are not entirely free. She read extracts from the Index of November 17th, 1874, showing the designs of the clergy in relation to the "God in the Constitution" Amendment, by which the Infidels are to be disenfranchised, and said if it were put to the vote of the whole people, the Amendment would carry; that while radicalism talks, conservative acts. She gave evidence upon evidence that the clergy consider that Infidels have no more rights than "other lunatics;" that it is their purpose to suppress Infidelity at any cost, and to support and defend the representative clergy at all hazards. The conscientious clergy are sent to the backwoods and rural districts, where, if caught upon the "ragged edge," they are made examples of. The unscrupulous defense of Beecher is not for Beecher as the man, but Beecher the clergyman; for as sure as Plymouth Church goes down, so sure would the underpinning of respectable Christianity give way.

The clergy now have entire control of our jails, houses of correction, and schools of reform. She read a letter in which was told the story of a female prisoner (her first offense) who broke one of the rules of the school by speaking out of hours, and was ordered into the dark cell for 24 hours, and was forgotten. She lay there in the winter time four days, living on a crust of bread, on a cold damp floor, having only for clothing, a chemise, cotton petticoat, and calico dress; undermining her constitution for life, and this in Christian Boston!

She spoke of the Methodist Church as the State Church, where Grant attended when not engaged with his dogs, and listened when the fumes of champagne permitted.

California, she said, is terribly priest ridden, which was not the case when she left us. She had told the people in the East there was one State where people are not under the thumb of the priest, but she did not know what she was talking of. She referred to a physician who had ordered the COMMON SENSE to be stopped, because his wife was kept in constant perturbation, by the frequent recurrence of the word "sexual." No doubt the Bible lay on his table, from which were culled passages by George

Francis Train, that were declared obscene by the court, and not fit to be read before ladies! Women whose minds are held in pawn by the church, cover themselves with fig leaf modesty, and permit their sons and daughters to grow up in ignorance of their bodies, and go out into society the imbecile victims of self-abuse and other malpractices.

She ended with an eloquent appeal to Infidels to rise in the name of common sense and reason, and become iconoclasts in destroying their common enemy, clerical bigotry.

THE TEMPERANCE LEGION.

The managers of this Society aim to make their meetings so instructive and amusing that those who have been accustomed to seek for happiness in saloons, and other vile places, may be constrained to come in and catch an inspiration of something better. Some long-visaged, church-going people stand aghast at so much, which to them seems irreverent on Sabbath evening, but I regard it as a long step in the scale of progress, to be able to reach those whom their prayers and church ceremonies fail to attract, and I feel like extending the hand of fellowship to all societies, of whatever name, who lend a helping hand to the young people who have left home and friends in the East to come here. Home comforts are not theirs to enjoy here. A lodging house, meals at restaurants and no parlor amusements—is it a wonder that some become hoodlums and inebriates? Let us consider that each is some mother's son, and do by them as we would have others do by our sons so far away. If each saloon keeper, each gentleman and lady, and each church member, would put into practice this "Golden Rule," California would be the better for it. F. A. LOGAN.

In Scotland, where pauperism has always been most economically managed, poor children have always been boarded out in families, in preference to congregating them in institutions. Efforts to introduce a similar practice in England resulted in the appointment by the Gladstone administration of Mrs. Nassau Senior, the first woman ever thus commissioned, to investigate and report the condition of the pauper girls of a portion of London 'from a woman's point of view.' Mrs. Senior called some associates of the same sex to her aid, and spent a year in examining the character of the girls' schools, homes and reformatories, and in tracing the after life of their graduates. In her report to Parliament, just made, she discloses the plentiful lack of 'mothering' which characterizes all the institutions, and which rises to a frightful climax when, as is sometimes the case, from 1000 to 1600 girls are herded under one roof. Although the English experiments of boarding out in homes have succeeded admirably, the managers of the 'institutions' will make a sturdy fight against any change.—Springfield Republican.

You wear upon your spirits the impress of your thoughts, deeds and utterances; even false communications prove the undeniable fact of life beyond, and if you desire to have all truthful communications from the spirit world, be truthful yourselves.

The French government has appointed a commission to conduct experiments upon a steam organ—the Calliope—heard 15 leagues in fine weather at sea. These new experiments are to be made during the period of the equinoctial gales.

SCIENCE AND SPIRITUALISM.

DISCUSSION BEFORE THE SOCIETY FOR SELF CULTURE.

The discussion of Spiritualism still continues at 39 Fourth street. The meeting on Sunday last was opened by Mr. French. Our reporter did not reach the Hall until after 8 o'clock. When he entered Mrs. Chaney was speaking. She argued that Spiritualism is worthy of scientific investigation, and that the mere fact of the existence of spiritual phenomena, in however crude and insignificant a state, establishes its right to the consideration of science. That this phenomena does exist no one will attempt to deny. No matter whence its source, whether good, or evil, whether emanating from spiritual or material force, it stands in our midst an unexplained fact. Science must take hold of it, and give it a willing and thorough investigation. The mere existence of the phenomena entitles it to consideration, even though it had given no signs of continued life. How much more, when, in all its varied phases and startling characteristics, it is shaking time-established usages to their very foundations.

Although a quarter of a century has passed since the advent of modern spiritualism, we have not scientifically considered it. First the rap. The world (not Science) proclaims it electricity. But this is not true. Since our finest electricians fail to produce similar results. That there is an intelligence controlling these raps, who will deny? Whether this intelligence is the spirits of the departed, who through some occult law in Nature are thus enabled to communicate with the living, remains for scientists to prove. It is an intelligence, and Science must sooner or later decide as to its nature. When we consider the fact of a Newton toiling for seventeen years to determine how much the moon's path around the earth curved each second of time, a fact which not one mind in a million would conceive, much less be interested in, can we question the right and importance of spiritual phenomena to scientific investigation. When millions of minds are anxiously waiting its solution? Even though it should prove a fraud, Science owes it to humanity to prove its truth or fallacy.

Let us wash ourselves clean of isms. It is not the individual belief of persons, whether they be Christian, Infidel or Spiritualist, that is at stake, but a new problem, a fresh leaf as it were, which Nature has turned in her wondrous volume for our deciphering. Let us exercise patience in the reading, and like Kepler, "be content to wait a hundred years for a hearer, as the God of the universe has waited his thousands for an observer." In conclusion Mrs. Chaney deprecated the use of personalities in the debate, saying: Personalities can never be made the basis for the establishment of truth.

Remarks were made by Mrs. Cummings, A. F. Smyth, Prof. Chaney and others, and the same subject was continued for further discussion, T. D. Rumble having consented to open the debate to-morrow afternoon.

The fact is daily becoming more apparent that Christianity and modern civilization are radically antagonistic.

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS.

A late number of the Clinton (Iowa) Herald contains a letter from a German free thinker, P. L. Schmitz, in reply to one Rev. Charles Trimble, who preached a sermon in favor of the Bible and prayers in the public schools, in which he asserted that the Bible is needed in the schools as a teacher of morality. Mr. Schmitz says:

It may be admitted that the real moral teachings contained in the Bible are desirable, but no more so than real moral teachings in any other book. But the real objection to the Bible in our schools is its immoralities. In it there are stories so revolting and language so obscene that Mr. Trimble dare not read them before his audience, much less to innocent children.

First—The Bible incites to drunkenness; Jeremiah, chapter 25, verse 27. Second—to robbery; Exod., chapter 3, verses 21 and 22. Third—to vagrancy; Psalms, chapter 109, verse 10. Fourth—to bigamy; Deut., chapter 21, verses 15 and 17. Fifth—to slavery and the slave trade; Lev., chapter 25, verses 44 and 46. Sixth—it encourages falsehood; 2d Thess., chapter 2, verse 11; 2d Chron., chapter 18, verse 21. Other passages could be cited to show that the book has a bad moral influence, but the above are sufficient. Strip the Bible of these immoralities and it will be a much better book.

To the next assertion, "That the Bible, as a reader and speaker, has neither a superior or equal," and that "it contains the most sublime oratory and happiest melody," I would reply that it is used for neither, even in Christian colleges, and there is not a single note of music in the book.

Correct grammar is entirely out of the question when speaking of the Bible. The speaker is further represented as asking, "As an ancient history, where is a volume more complete, more reliable or which reaches further back towards the beginning of creation?" I answer, it is principally a history of the Jews and their plundering and murdering of other nations. As for the "story of creation" no scientist nor even the best theologians of modern times give any credit to it. Better and more reliable histories are used in our colleges and schools. The Bible does not give the day, week, month or even the year in which its principal personage (Christ) was born.

I come now to the most astonishing assertion of the speaker, viz: That, as a philosophy of modern science, the Bible has no equal. I ask the gentleman to point out a standard work on modern science that teaches the possibility of having three days and three nights before the Sun was created? that there is water enough to cover the earth to the height of the highest mountains? that the earth stands still, and the Sun and Moon move around it, or that a man can live three days and nights in a fish and come out alive.

Finally, to the objection that the introduction of the Bible in the schools would commit the Government to the support of an established church, Mr. Trimble answers that our Sunday laws, and chaplains for Congress and the army, show that the Government is thus pledged. But does this prove that it is right and just? Mr. Trimble believes in prayer. I do not. By what right under the Constitution, which guarantees to all religious liberty and equal rights, could Mr. Trimble tax me for the support of prayer? would it be considered just to pay a person a large salary to read a portion of Mr. Paine's "Age of Reason" at the opening of Congress or in the army?

The State has a right to teach morality but not religion. The Bible contains a system of religion about the meaning of which very few agree. Would it not be better to banish it from the schools and let all send their children to learn those things about which we all agree? I have no objections to others teaching their children religion. But I do most emphatically protest against their assumption of the right to teach mine. Christian claim and exercise the right to teach their children in matters of religion. I claim for myself the same right and have no desire to interfere with theirs.

P. L. SCHMITZ.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS AND THE BIBLE.

BY ANNA BESANT.

The following is an extract from a lecture in London, in answer to the avowal that Woman's right to independence is denied and condemned by the Bible:

The Bible! why, it has bolstered up every injustice—it has bulwarked every tyranny—it has defended every wrong. With toil and pain and bloodshed have the soldiers of Liberty wrung from the reluctant hands of priests and Bible-worshippers every charter of our freedom, every triumph of our cause. Every step in science has been won in despite of the Bible. From the stake where Bruno stood and died, from the dungeon where Galileo knelt and trembled, a voice has rung out that every advance of science has been struggled against by the Bible and the Church. But take heart, you who cling to your Bibles; as soon as we have gained this one step forward, as soon as women are no longer in subjection, you will be able to claim as the offspring of your Christianity that which, at its birth, you anathematized. Each trophy of advancement, each symbol of triumph, is claimed by the bibliolator as his as soon as it becomes popular. You will be able to find in your Bibles a sanction for the free development of womanhood, even as you have found room in the six days of Genesis for the vast æons of geology, and space in the petty firmament of Moses for the mighty facts of astronomy. The Bible is claimed as the true parent of modern freedom, as the striker-off of the chains of the slave, the guardian of the feeble from the tyranny of the strong. It is the spirit of Christianity that has done it all, you say; when the letter said "kill," it meant "preserve;" when the letter said "obey," it meant "resist;" when the letter said "enslave," it meant "set free." So take courage, ye worshippers of a book; your idol will be shattered once more, but it can once more be re-mended; it will fall once more before the trumpet-blast of Freedom, but once more it can be raised. We mean to set women free; free to follow the guiding hand of Nature; free to fulfil every fair capability of her being; free to develop every noble intellectual power, and every passionate longing of her heart; free to expand in every direction; free to grow, to strengthen, and to rise. Little care we whether or not our work square with the rules of an old Eastern civilization; let those who are anxious about it see to that. Our work need not in itself trench on religion; but if Religion and the Bible grapple with us, and try to stop and destroy us, then Religion and the Bible must either stand aside or else they must go down.

Unless what was right once is wrong now; what was truth once is a lie now; what would save a man once will damn him now; and unless what was once in harmony with the divine nature is opposed to it now, the Plymouth pastor stands exonerated on bible grounds.—Truth Seeker.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO

THE STUDY.

FAUST AND MEPHISTOPHELES.

MEPHISTO.—I will to-day, at once, your footman be,
And wait at table just like all the others.
One thing I beg, just two lines write for me,
Your black and white all apprehension smother.

FAUST.—What then, a writing do you, Pedant, need,
Have you nor man, nor man's word ever known?
Is 't not enough that my words' steadfast tone
Of all my days forever shall dispose?
Doth not this world thro' all its streams rush on,
And shall a promise hold me, d'you suppose?
And yet this madness makes all hearts its home,
Who willingly would free his soul therefrom.
Happy the man, who, in a bosom pure,
Carries fidelity; no sacrifice
Will ever scare or grieve him truly wise,
But a stiff parchment, all engrossed and sealed
A spectre is all shun. The ink 's new,
And yet the word dies out from the dry pen,
And wax and leather must bear rule o'er men!
What would you, evil spirit, I should do,
On what inscribe this bond, that I renew?
Brass, marble, paper, parchment, which of these?
With graver, chisel, pen, or what you please,
I give you freely choice of all.

MEPHISTO.—Now why, my friend, this furious breeze
Of eloquence anent a thing so small?
Why any scrap of paper's good; you should Sign your name clearly with a drop of blood.

FAUST.—If you're content that this shall make it good,
I can have no objection to the whim.

MEPHISTO.—Blood is a juice quite sui generis.

FAUST.—Well, have no fear that I shall e'er break this,
The force of every power, of every limb
Is just precisely what I swear to give.
I've puffed myself up far too high I know;
Down to your level must I live.
The great omnipotence hath cast me low,
And nature shuts her secrets from my sight,
My thread of thought is torn apart,
I've long been sick of reason's scanty light.
Let glowing passions rock my restless heart
And still my soul in depths of sensuous night;
Let every wonder be at hand
In magic domino concealed,
And let a train of wild adventure yield
Its fierce intoxication. Let Time's wand
Turn with cold touch events to sad or glad,
Chagrin or pleasure, fortune good or bad,
May shift and change their features as they please,
So that this man ne'er grows a man of ease.

MEPHISTO.—To you no measure, and no goal is set.
You're free to slip "from every opening flower."
Snatch on the wing from every haunted bower,
I only trust you'll like all that you get.
But don't be timid, try them one and all!

RECIPE.

To make one mythic orthodox god:
First, take one mythic heathen god,
(Be sure to make your numbers odd.)
Add defiled son of man.
Make them both one as best you can.
Now mix with this one holy ghost,
And you will have one god, almost;
Now make three one, then one make three,
And you will have a trinity.
Now fill this up with attributes,
To sink it far below the brutes;
Put in dire vengeance, anger, hate,
Enough to make it reprobate,
Add jealousy, malice, deceit,
Infernal war; but not complete
Without folly and self-conceit,
And with most horrid crimes replete;
Add weakness and omnipotence,
Ignorance, to match omniscience,
Omnipresence—all seeing, too—
Which Adam hid from, and be true
Assured writ. Add pity, love,
Justice, and mercy, to the above.
Put in some strong delusion here
To make his attributes appear
In a strong light, with unstable,
Changeable and unchangeable
Mind; with all other bible stuff.
Or he will not be queer enough.
Then, make him like a portly man,
"Without body or parts," if you can;
A voice of thunder for him make,
That lightning rods from him can take.
Also a buzzard nose, to smell
Burning flesh, blood, bones, fumes of hell,
Dung, hides, hoofs, horns; to please him well
Add incense, too. When this is done
Call him Triune, Father, Son,
And Holy Ghost, God, Three in One,
And make him damn, curse, swear, and run
Mad every day, and kill his son,
That a few in heaven can dwell,
While all the rest he sends to hell.

SPARTA, TENN.

DR. LAIRD—In the Truth Seeker.

I WISH IT WERE RESPECTABLE.

BY MRS. L. E. DRAKE.

I wish it were respectable to lead an honest life
To speak the truth at every turn, no matter for the strife,
That bibles, books and selfish priests, have taught so very long;
I wish it were respectable to sing another song.

I wish it were respectable hypocrisy to shun,
And let the world know what we are, by what we've said and done;
To teach the little children they are not all defiled,
Because Eve ate that apple where knowledge sweetly smiled.

I wish it were respectable an infidel to be,
To every false theology, on ocean, land, or sea;
To loose all chains of slavery, that custom's laws have forged,
And pull down every throne on earth where sits a mortal lord.

I wish it were respectable for women to be free,
To own the soul God gave to her, and from all bondage flee;
That man no more shall be her lord, to tell her when and where,
She may learn wisdom from his lips, and when she must forbear.

I wish it were respectable for man to learn the cause,
That woman, too, is human, made so by Nature's laws;
And so amend his customs, his prejudice forsake,
That she may be a helpmeet in all the laws he makes.

I wish it were respectable to reason out the plan,
How Nature caused this earth to be, and how the law made man;
And if the true philosophy should kill the Brama God,
I wish it were respectable to put him 'neath the sod.

I wish it were respectable to love all days alike,
And not on Sunday preach and pray, and Monday morning fight;
To know that all the week is good, was so by Nature given,
And Sunday not the only day to learn the way to heaven.

I wish it were respectable for Freedom to be bold,
To grapple with old Tyranny that long has cursed the world,
And hurl him from his gilded throne to unknown depths below;
Oh! if it were respectable it shortly would be so.

I wish it were respectable to strangle gray-haired lies,
And not because they're old and gray, applaud them to the skies;
To place all dogmas, books and creeds, upon their real worth,
And if they do not stand the test, count them of good a dearth.

I wish it were respectable to own we don't believe
That Jonah lived in whalehood, so long, and took his ease,
Or Elijah, with his fiery coach, went up to Heaven so high,
Oh! I wish it were respectable to say, "That is a lie!"

I wish it were respectable, when women tell the truth,
And place before the people all the page of written proof,
For men to have some honor then, and love of human right,
And not, because exposure comes, get mad and try to fight!

But deal with women justly, when coward hosts assail,
And hunt them down like beasts of prey, or shut them up in jail!
Oh! I wish that men could act like men, at least when honor calls,
And let the truth be ever proved, though priests and lords should fall!

I wish it were respectable for ministers of grace,
If they have loved another's wife, and kissed her out of place,
To be no cowards at their posts, but own the truth as well,
And let the world say what it will, or send them straight to Hell!

ALONE.

I seek, O Solitude, thy mute caress:
Thou gracious Queen of that sweet realm of Hush,
Where from my languid brow the locks I push,
And taste the luxury of loneliness!
I love the world, and shrink not to confess
Belief that healthful souls all find it good,
And need, to aid their perfect fruitfulness,
The sharp attrition of the multitude.
I of the world am proud to form a part;
Yet, is it sometimes sweet to feast a mood
Born of the deep self-searchings of the heart,
At the abundant board of solitude.
One needs, at times, to pause in life's swift race,
To look one's own soul calmly in the face.

Signs of the Times.

Robert Collyer, Chicago, received a $1,000 Christmas present.

Professor Gilman has decided to accept the Presidency of the John Hopkins University at Baltimore.

A congregationalist church in Boston has revived the old practice of electing deaconesses. Four women were recently chosen out of six.

Lucy Stone thinks that as the women of Michigan almost succeeded in securing the franchise without a suffrage party, Massachusetts might succeed with one.

The trial of Beecher is still proceeding. His friends make great demonstrations of sympathy in Court, for the purpose of having an effect on the jury. It is not at all probable that the jury will agree.

The Kingdom of Heaven says, "Most Bible believers expect a great awakening—a great revival of spiritual power on the earth—and people of no defined faith see, in the signs of the times, the unmistakable evidences of great radical revolutionary changes."

Over one thousand girls appeared at Barnum's hipodrome to secure situations in the ballet, in answer to an advertisement, and as not one-third of the number were required, many had to go away disappointed. Two of the number determined to commit suicide by jumping in the river, but were saved.

The Watchman and Reflector says that a German scientist in 1788 wrote as follows: "The sun is really a kitchen fire, and the spots are great clouds of smoke and heaps of soot; consequently where there is a kitchen fire there must be meat to roast—such as godless people, Universalists, Atheists,—and the devil is the cook who turns the spit!"

A young woman of Evansville, Ind., recently, while on a visit to Philadelphia married against her parent's wishes, and her husband being unable to support her, after coming to the verge of starvation, she entered a house of prostitution. Here a brother, who happened to visit the house, found her, and she returned with him to her home.

It is a mistake, holds the Milwaukee Sentinel, to suppose that education alone, unless it embrace some specialty, fits the possessor to secure the prizes for which men contend; and it thinks furthermore that it could hire ten thousand thoroughly educated men in the United States, at the present time, to work for $50 a month, but that it could not hire mechanics for that price.

Prof. Tyndall has written a preface to a late edition of his Belfast address, in which he explains his belief of the origin of man—that our sun and planets were once diffused through space as an impalpable haze, that loss of heat caused a condensation, and after millions of eons animal life appeared, which in time developed into its higher forms. The nebula and the solar system, man included, stand in the relation of germ and finished organism. Very well, so far as this theory goes, but we trust that man is not yet "finished."

The prospect is good that an unusually large number of immigrants will find homes in California this year.

Rev. Mr. Ames, of Harper's Ferry, has procured a divorce from his wife, Mrs. Mary Clemmer Ames. Mrs. Ames now writes under the name of Mary Clemmer.

The burgler Mosher, killed at Bay Ridge, was a man of striking appearance, and seems to have been well educated. He never used intoxicating liquors nor tobacco, and according to his sister-in-law, was very pure in his speech. His only disposition to steal existed from childhood, and was undoubtedly the result of pre-natal causes.

Concerning the question of Church Disestablishment, which is year by year more and more discussed in England, the London Inquirer says "The great obstacle to a free national church is the bigotry of the sects. While this spirit rules the idea of a comprehensive church is a dream. Meanwhile the solution of the question becomes daily nearer—the placing of all denominations in the same position, that of independence and religious equality."

The New York Freeman's Journal, perhaps the ablest Catholic paper in the country, says: "One thing is certain. Archbishops and bishops may be multiplied, and priests ordained, and thousands of churches built; but if our bishops do not, following the Vicar of Christ, forbid Catholics sending their children to godless schools, in fifty years from now the Catholic Church in the United States will be a shrivelled and ghastly skeleton—a dry waste after a wave of European migration,—a scattered flock that false shepherds fed and fattened on, and left unsheltered from the wolves."

MONOPOLY ETHICS.

The agitation respecting railroad freights and fares brings certain grave questions of morality into discussion, and will ultimately force upon the public conscience their consideration and settlement, in spite of the earnest efforts to ignore them. The railroad men are great sticklers for "vested rights!" We ask, who vested them, and for what? Was there not a contract, by implication at least, between them and the vesting party, (the people) which guaranteed certain things, as a quid pro quo for the rights so vested? And, when complaint is made that the "rights of property" are invaded by the tariff bills of Wisconsin, and some other states, are we not justified in pushing our inquiries farther, and asking, What is the fundamental principle of rightful ownership? Simple profession is not sufficient. It must be ownership justly acquired, and justly retained; whether of houses, lands, money, or franchises. The railroad men, in addition to their road-bed and rolling stock, profess certain franchises as incorporated companies. And, if the attainment of the same involved certain reciprocities between the parties, it is difficult to see how complaint of infringement of rights can be made with any grace whatever, when only those reciprocities are sought to be obtained. Or, to make the case still plainer, we may affirm that the question of the ownership, or confiscation of property, is not involved in this discussion. The ownership is not challenged by the States in question. But, it is the mode of their use. Their franchises are "vested rights," to be sure. But, there can be no rights without correlative duties. These "rights" were vested for a purpose. That purpose was the use which they were to subserve to the people who conferred these franchises. No people could be so stupid as to bestow such favors with no prospect of benefit therefrom. The people complain that their gifts are used to oppress rather than aid them. They demand a remedy, and put their demand in the form of authoritative regulation of railroad tariffs. The owners demur, and ask, May we not do what we please with our own? The answer is easy. To a certain extent, we may use our own as we please, but there are limitations to this rule. Let our railroad magnates essay to convert their fine offices in our city into nuisances, and they will soon see them abated, no matter what the amount of money the nuisance might yield them. We may not use our own to the injury or annoyance of another.

Railroads, and all means of transportation, are largely communistic in character. Men do not build railroads for their own private use. They are for the use of the public, and the conditions created by their existence compel their use. To dispense with them is simply impossible. They are individualistic so far as property ownership is concerned; that is, individuals have paid for their construction and outfit, with the exception of those aided by subsidies and grants of the public lands. Still there is a form of ownership retained by the people as an equivalent for the franchises conferred; and that ownership is the right of equitable use. The right to use a railroad is as perfect as is the right of the public to the accommodations of a hotel, and even more so. But the people complain that their rights are infringed by the imposition of extortionate rates for fares and freights. The railroad men reply that it is simply a question of profit, and belongs exclusively to themselves. They demand to know who has any right to define the limit of their profit. And this challenge brings the ever recurring, but never adjusted, question of rent, profit, and interest, before us for solution. If the money lender may exact one, two, or three per cent. a month for his loan; if banks and other monied institutions may make their twenty per cent. dividends; if the trader may impose twenty-five or one hundred per cent. profit on his goods, or the landlord receive ten to fifty per cent. rent on his houses and lands; why may not the railroad men demand such profits as please them? All of them take advantage of people's necessities; and "fair profits" are just what can be realized by the skillful arts of extortion. It cannot be denied that the same principle is involved in all these cases. "Things are worth what they will bring," states it with sufficient clearness; hence: if money will bring five per cent. a month, in consequence of the desperate condition of some debtor, it is worth that rate of interest! Or if misfortune compels some houseless wanderer to hire a dwelling, paying fifty per cent. rent, it is worth that amount! Or any price, which the needs of the people and the rapacity of the trader may make possible, is, according to this theory, only the just value of the goods sold. This may be correctly termed the "moral standard" of all existing monopolies, whether railroad or others. Were it the "standard" of monopolies only, the remedy for present social evils would be easily found and applied. Unfortunately, however, the masses of mankind adopt, without question, the same code of social morality which we have designated as "Monopoly Ethics." And it is impossible for us to see the difference in principle between the railroad which absorbs in freight all the surplus of the farmer's fruit and grain, and of that same farmer who absorbs all the products of the laborer's toil, except what is necessary to support him in a working condition. Can any one? The transportation monopolies and the distributing ones—the go-betweens—are accused of nearly or quite robbing the producing classes. How do they do it? By carrying out the principle that "a thing is worth what it will bring;" hence, if their services in carrying and distributing can be made to bring them all, or nearly all, the surplus products of the country's labor, then are they justly entitled to the same. If scarcity, on the one hand, and necessity on the other can justly regulate the price of labor, commodities, money, etc., then the course of railroads, and of all other monopolies, is right and good; and we have no just cause of complaint. Can any one show the contrary? We defer to another article farther discussion.

INSPIRATION.

FRIEND MACKIE:—I think I will not be able to return to the philosophical plane of thought for some time. If there be "royal roads to knowledge" by inspiration and intromission, by which some have only to open their mouths in order to have words of wisdom flow as waters from a perennial spring, why should I dig and delve in past and present lore, to expert every faculty in producing an essay or a lecture, costing often months of labor and years of thought to mature, when I am told that the best speeches containing the most living truths come inspirationally without effort or premeditation?

I fail to see, however, that we can add to the sum of knowledge only by individual effort and experience. The repeating of inspirational utterances may be useful as reflected light, and tend to soften the too deep realities of truth. I may also be like those laborers in the parable of the vineyard who complained because the eleventh hour hirelings received the same pay as those who had borne the burden and heat of the day. I think mental as well as physical health is best preserved by proper exercise and assimilation of food and knowledge obtained by hard labor. It is a law of nature that any faculty will become weak if not used and finally become paralyzed.

I would be pleased to have you elucidate the subject of normal vs. inspirational speaking and intromission of ideas. The only inspiration I ever felt was in relating a fact of truth of my own received through my own or other's experience, when a wave of magnetic thought would illumine my mind, causing me to feel the joy or sadness of their first impressions. I may be made of duller clay than the favorites of inspiration, and I think the law a little partial which bestows upon some universal knowledge without labor, while others labor a life-time for a little in some one department. With inspirational advantages why do they not add to the sum of human knowledge where the unaided intellect of man fails?

But as I have not heard for myself, only seen reports of such speeches, I may not have been able to catch the real effervescence of them. Yours for Truth, L. HUTCHISON.

REPLY.

MRS. HUTCHINSON, Dear friend:—Your letter interests me, and I regret that Inspiration did not befriended you sufficiently to enable you to elucidate the subject from your own standpoint. I agree with you that there is no royal road to knowledge. But some have to travel father over rougher roads than others. Admirable Chrichtons are exceedingly rare, yet here and there are found musical prodigies, like Blind Tom, and mathematical and other prodigies testing our credulity to the utmost. Others possess memories so extraordinary that they appear super-human. From these heights of human capacity there is every grade down to prodigies of stupidity. But in no case is there acquisition without effort, so far as I know. For my own part I feel like one who said, If God should give me the choice of Truth or Search for truth, I would choose the Search for Truth. To this I would add the capacity and opportunity.

Other engagements prevent me from complying with your request at present. The subject is a very important one, very little understood, very much abused, and a great deal of fraud is practiced in its name. This will continue as long as there are audiences with itching ears for the wonderful, rather than inquiring souls earnestly asking for Truth, whether it be palatable or not.

I would advise the perusal of an excellent little work, "Issues of the Age," by Henry C. Pedder, as pertinent to our present inquiries. It is begemmed with rich quotations from the best authors, the entermediate suggestive thoughts are worthy the opposite quotations in the little book, and a rare feast may be enjoyed by thinkers of every grade. Hoping that ere long you will be inspired to write your own views on Inspiration, amid the solitudes of the everlasting hills. Yours for growing thought,

J. M. MACKIE.

THE STARS AND FATE.

"Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief."—HOLY BIBLE.

"Do the planets exert an influence in making us what we are, (some great natural philosophers and some great natural fools) or was it the ante-natal influences surrounding conception and gestation?"—PROF. CHANEY.

Suppose both be true, and also that other influences are at work to make us what we are. If it be granted that the stars do influence us, not only at birth and before birth, but all through life, will the concession neutralize the doctrine of hereditary transmission or gestative influences? I think not. And I dare say that Prof. Chaney has, in his practice, found cases where hereditary and other mundane influences were so antagonistic to the influences of the ruling planet that even the Prof. would be puzzled to point out the slighted trace of the planet's characteristics. There are powers on earth as well as in the heavens; and mundane as well as celestial influences may so co-operate

"That the best laid schemes of mice and men Gang aft agley."

Nor will the best of care taken of the mother during gestation be utterly destroyed if the child be born under an "unlucky star" any more than it would if born in an unpropitious climate, season, soil, or any other "unlucky" circumstance, though it would have been better had circumstances co-operated with ante-natal care and culture.

Fate, that dread word which seems to paralyze the energies of some people, is dreaded because misunderstood. Everything, so far as we know, pertains to the domain of cause and effect, and cause and effect are invariably co-ordinate in their relations. So, whether we like it or not, or though it should deprive us of all stimulant to action, yet future effects are already pre-disposed by present and past causes. We are the creatures of circumstances, nor is this less true when we are viewed as centerstances. For there is no cause which is not also an effect—no effect which is not also a cause, and together form links of inexorable destiny which no power, mundane or celestial, can disturb; for even if omnipotence interfered it could only interfere as a cause and become a link in the eternal chain of cause and effect. It is true Saturn was in my Ascendant at birth; it is also true that I am by nature skeptical. But faithful skepticism is better than simulated or stimulated faith; for faith in our present darkness can only rest on skepticism; he who never knew doubt never knew faith. But the Prof. commends the "trying to believe" practice to me, as if my belief were at the command of my will.

Christians recommend the same. It will astonish some that "Saul is also among the prophets"—that Prof. Chaney is making common cause with Christianity in decrying

"Doubt as devil damned."

A rank Atheist must be a curious thing. How would it sound to say a rank Christian, a rank Theist or a rank Astrologer?

With faith enough to carry me on in the path of duty, in the ranks of doubt and honest inquiry, I remain faithful to myself and

CHRISTIANITY VERSUS SPIRITUALISM.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—It is too much the fashion, in these days of strife and acrimony, to praise or condemn in unmeasured terms, without reflecting that perchance there never was a religious system yet that did not have much in it that was good, though mixed also with some evil. There are those who see no good in the religion of Christ. They look round upon our fashionable churches with their polished and well paid preachers, reared among the wretched huts of squalid and neglected poverty, and they say, "What good does this thing do?" They point to the rich and oppressive church of England, whose pampered bishops live in splendor on the enforced contributions of the striving poor; to the false and presumptuous pretensions of the pope; to the persecutions and burnings that have disgraced humanity; and charging the religion of Christ with, these cruel wrongs, they declaim against it, as though it were an unmitigated coil. They forget the pure and gentle character of its founder. They forget the many broad principles of good and right it has enthroned, as it were, in the very being of society, and that have made possible and inevitable, the progress we have made in the past. They forget the institution of the Sabbath day, that made sacred to every serf, and slave, however poor and debased, one day in seven, for thought and social recreation. They seem not to see that the dogma—error though it may be—that that every human soul must be converted or damned, was perhaps the cause of that general culture and awakening of the mind that has placed the Christian world in the van of civilization. They do not now realize that in thousands of barbarous tribes, the christian missionary was the first to take thoughts of love and justice, of domestic peace and security, of God and heaven, of Sunday and its rest, of schools, churches, colleges and universities. They see Christianity in its old age, debauched by long contest with human corruption, cursed with popish pretensions, allied with kings and oppressors, a thing of fashion, empty and hypocritical, the opponent of science and progress, the conservative defender of every social abuse. They forget the purity and usefulness of its earlier days. They do not see that though it may no longer be needed for the future, it has done a glorious work in the past. It has brought us to the point at which we may dispense with it, just as the old cart helps to make the railroad and is then laid aside forever. We do not anathematize the old wagon road with its deep ruts and impassable bogs, though we have got beyond it.

In the affairs of this world science is fast taking the reins in its own hands. It is telling us of the age of the earth, the origin and history of man, and daily adjusting our social relations on a system derived from observation and experience. It is looking higher. It declares that each of us derives his emotions, sentiments and thoughts from his surroundings, and believes or disbelieves as he is impressed. It is beginning to be understood that heaven is for the truly good, who are thus fitted for its joys, and not for the votaries of any particular faith, or dogma. These truths are creeping into the churches. They have dethroned the pope already. They will soon make the Catholic church a thing of the past. They will invade our other churches, and revise their rituals till they all stand upon this plane.

Spiritualism, in this work, is the handmaid of science. It accepts its teachings. It coincides with its conclusions. It does more. Where the scientist says "I do not see God! I cannot find the soul! I know nothing of this immortality!" Spiritualism supplements science. When materialism had well-nigh rejected and overthrown the supernaturalism of the past, spiritualism came, with its new wonders, to demonstrate the existence of the soul, the communion of saints, and the life everlasting. It does not curse or denounce Christianity, but thanks it for its past services to humanity, and supplants it for a higher and purer progress. Let spiritualism have place! Nay it must have place. The constitution of our country requires that it have a respectful attention. Let us watch its effects, and judge of it by its fruits. If, after eighteen centuries of trial, aye, even one century, it prove as inadequate to make men love each other as christianity has done, then let it be condemned and cast into the fire. But we cannot see how a human being can be made worse in this world by the belief that as they cultivate and refine the soul here by deeds of grace and love they fit and prepare it for the kingdom of happiness hereafter. It is surely more moralizing to believe that an entire life of goodness is essential to salvation, than that the great boon is to be bought by a momentary death-bed repentance, or belief in any peculiar dogma whatsoever. A CHRISTIAN SPIRITUALIST.

We do not agree with our correspondent in conceding so much to Christianity. It is true that Christian countries lead the world to-day, but the same claim might have been put up for Pagan nations at one time in the world's history. Christianity has supplanted the heathen faiths in the most enlightened countries, but it will in time itself give way to a better, or it will be so changed that its adherents will no more recognize it as the Christianity of to-day, than Christians of to-day acknowledge as true the absurd dogmas and unnatural asceticism of the middle ages. Many conditions have combined to produce the prosperity of the Christian world, and Christianity has meanwhile been constantly changing. In fact instead of civilization being produced by Christianity, the Christianity of our day is the outgrowth of civilization. Poor as this religion is, it has been accepted as most favorable to freedom.

We hardly know what our correspondent means by "the earlier days of Christianity." It is hardly possible he can refer to the period immediately succeeding the reign of Constantine, during whose rule Christianity may be said to have been established. The truth is "the progress of Christianity corresponded with the decay of intellect, and its complete ascendancy was succeeded by a night of mental and moral darkness." The worst features of Pagan society were retained, and religious freedom was immediately done away with. It is not creditable to the church that all learning was confined to the clergy, for the cultivation of letters outside the pale of the church was impossible. It is true the "sacred writings" and other manuscripts were preserved in monasteries, during the dark ages, but the age would not have been so debased had not the church kept all means of education from the people, and finally, when the manuscripts did come to the light, they were found to be altered, interlined and otherwise corrupted by the monks who for hundreds of years alone had access to them. The gross ignorance of the middle ages, says Hallam, are in great degree assignable to the practice of the priests locking up all means of knowledge, and Lecky says of the Byzantine empire, which was founded by the first Christian Emperor: "The universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, without exception, the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed."

The struggle between the church and science has been going on continually, until now the latter has virtually triumphed, and wherever science advances there Christianity declines, until now those countries admitted to be the most enlightened are the very ones in which Christianity has been most modified, and has been forced to conform to the new order of things.

THE MONEY QUESTION.

MR. EDITOR:—In your issue of the 16th of January, is an article headed: "A Money-Maniac." Its contents are of importance to every workingman. The author, in accusing money as the cause of all social misery, fails to propose remedies which are compatible with republican and individual freedom. Graduated taxation, limitation of land property, etc., are inefficient. I know of a remedy which does not in the least interfere with justice and freedom, and that is: The diminution of the high rate of interest on money. Every well ordered community creates laws to prevent highway robbery; and the same right empowers her to suppress all other kinds of theft. Where is a nation on this planet which has a law for so high a rate of interest on money as the United States? High interest involves the necessity of a protective tariff against all other countries. [1]

The accumulating power given to money by the high rate of interest, increased after our civil war by the premium on gold about 50 per cent. has deprived ninety-nine of every hundred persons of the power to consume in a proportional measure as previous to the war. The consequence is a continual business crisis. To bring this accumulation to the climax, the industrial workers invent labor-saving machines which capital only is able to acquire, and thereby deprive the masses more and more of labor. [2]

Trades Unions have proved inefficient to counterbalance this power, and have shown that our legislatures only are the competent bodies to keep this power in proper boundaries. Senator W. Kelly from Pennsylvania has proposed a finance bill which would relieve the business stagnation, but the majority of our legislators seem not prepared to climb to such an elevated stand-point of morality. With their caucus finance bill they expect to do enough soft-soaping to induce the people to put faith in them again; but they may be mistaken.

As soon as we can get relief from the above mentioned system of legalized robbery, just so soon we will have every comfort of life cheaper: all kind of rents will come down in proportion as the rate of interest gets lower.

The contrary effect will be produced on the prices of labor. Supply and demand being the regulator of it, money being as cheap as in other countries; America will be able to undersell, because she has better resources and a richer country, consequently we can manufacture cheaper. The result will be, our tariff must give way to Free Trade; most of our imports will be changed into exports; our drydocks will become again alive with ship carpenters, and our commerce on the high seas will be re-established. But a far greater demand in the labor market will be brought on by the laboring men themselves, because these 99 per cent. of our people who were deprived by the stringency of the money market of their proportional share of comfort, will quit living in starvation economy. The poor man who was before reduced to four days' work in a week will get six work days and better pay; consequently he will become the consumer of the overproduction of which the manufacturer is complaining at present.

It is to be hoped that the moral principle, "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you" will take the lead in our legislative bodies in place of the present party legislation, and the quicker this is done the sooner the millenium will be at our door.

A WORKINGMAN.

1.—How does our "workingman" propose to prevent the collection of interest for the use of money? Is not money subject to the same law of demand and supply that labor is or any article of commerce?

2.—This objection to labor-saving machinery is not only old, but it has been exploded by experience. What laborers need more than anything is intelligence sufficient to enable them to co-operate. They could then make use of labor-saving machinery for their own benefit. [Ed.]

ARE WE REALLY PROGRESSING?

In the Marine Court of New York city, Judge McAdam presiding, in a suit between Mrs. A. M. Truman vs. Woodhull, Claflin & Co., a few day since, Joseph Treat was prohibited by the Judge from giving evidence in the case; not because he was an incredible, untruthful witness, nor because his statement of a fact is not just as correct as another person's, nor because he is not a citizen of the State, or the United States, but because he did not subscribe to such a religious belief as the judge thought he ought to, or that he did not believe in such kind of a God as is prescribed by others.

This ruling in a court of justice (?) seems more fitted to the times of religious intolerance, a few centuries back, or in the Dark Ages, than to this advanced part of the Nineteenth Century, when the teachings of science and increasing knowledge is more and more shaking to the very foundation, the creeds and superstitions of the past; when the teachings of Humboldt, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Mill, Draper and many other scientific minds are being accepted by intelligent men in all parts of the civilized world? Is it still to be the ruling of our courts that, in order to be allowed to bear testimony in an ordinary suit, a person must believe in a Pagan God, a Jewish God, a Christian God, or some other God that is a person, having body, parts and passions, and occupying, as such a being must, but a single point in the entire Universe? In short, must he subscribe to any particular set of opinions before he can give evidence in our courts? Are we really advancing with science, reason and intelligence, or are we groping backward toward superstition, proscription and intolerance?

To the questions from the attorney, "are you an infidel?" "are you an Athiest?" Dr. Treat admitted that he was what is commonly understood by those terms. The Judge then asked, "Have you any religious ideas?" and the reply was, "I am a scientist, and accept that postulate of science which makes the Universe the only Infinite, Eternal and self Existent." "You cannot testify," was the immediate decision.

We hope all our judges are not to be McAdams, or so Mac-adamized that a person who honestly believes the inherent powers and forces of the Universe are eternal like the Universe itself, will have equal privileges in court, and elsewhere with those who imagine God to be a person in the form of a man, occupying a throne somewhere in the etherial regions of space, and governed by the passions and incentives of anger, cruelty, vindictiveness and revenge.—Truth Seeker.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, JAN. 30, 1875.

THE Kingdom of Heaven is not dead, as recently announced. Number 1 of Vol. 5 has just been issued, and it is more spicy than ever.

THE OVERLAND.—This representative magazine, the voice of the Pacific Coast, appears for February in good time, and as usual well filled. Among its contributors are Joaquin Miller, Charles Warren Stoddard, T. M. Brown, J. L. Van Mehr, Mrs. O. A. S. Beale, Wm. M. Turner, Walter M. Fisher and J. T. Harcourt.

The following is an extract from an address by Lizzie Doten before the Free Religious Association three years ago. "When I consider the signs of the times, I feel as though I would like to shut my mouth, and remain silent until I could finish thinking. That, I know, never will be done; but the signs of the times are so significant, that I tremble before them. I know that there is to come a greater revelation of the truth than we have known in the past, and it is to be born out of the great heart of humanity. Not of Christianity, not of any ism; but to be born of human needs, and to lead forward, by that great law of spiritual progression which shall elevate the whole human race; not bring the spiritual world down lower, but bring humanity up nearer to the angels, all the blessed revelations that Heaven can give to human hearts."

Sherman & Hyde's Musical Review for January, the first number of Volume 2d, is the best yet issued. The new music alone is worth the price of the magazine, while the information concerning music and musicians, the editorials, contributed articles and extracts are all valuable and interesting. The Review is beautifully printed on good paper, and with clear faced, handsome type.

THE SOCIETY FOR SELF CULTURE had another discussion concerning Spiritualism last week, the best speech being that made by Rev. Mr. Simonds, who by the way, was not allowed to add a few sentences after his ten minutes had expired. A number of persons in the audience called "time," thus cutting off those who went there for instruction from the privilege of hearing a man of ideas. The trouble with this gathering is, that too many go there to be amused, and a few of the most persistent speakers seem inclined to gratify this demand.

MRS. SMITH'S LECTURES.

Although the evening discourses at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union always draw larger audiences, it frequently happens that the afternoon meetings are more interesting. This was the case on Sunday last, when a little circle of earnest, truth-loving people gathered to hear Mrs. Smith speak of "Bigotry in Reform." The discourse embraced much more than the title indicates, and was full of good things which our readers, had they been there, would have been delighted with.

The meeting was opened with the reading of a poem by Mrs. L. E. Drake, recently from Battle Creek, Michigan, the writer of a little book of Free Thought Poems, from which the selection was made, "Let Hope and Faith be Free." Mrs. Drake is a good reader, and her radical poems lose none of their force by her rendering.

Mrs. Smith first alluded to one-idea reformers, people who get hold of a branch of reform, like Temperance, anti-slavery, etc., and lose sight of all other human needs in their zeal for the particular aim they have in view. The Temperance man usually limits his efforts for reform to temperance merely in the use of intoxicating drinks, while he may be very intemperate in other respects. He may be a glutton, a tobacco chewer, or a gamester, but if he refrains from the use of whiskey, he claims to be a temperance man.

There are some reforms, which seem to be worthy the devotion of a life to bring about, but usually reformers would accomplish more, and would certainly round out their own characters by cultivating an interest in various channels of reform. Spiritualists, of all people, should be most liberal in their ideas of reform; should be interested in all that concerns the good of humanity; as our object is to perfect ourselves and our fellow men, so far as possible in all that constitutes noble men and women. There should be perfect freedom of thought and speech, and a great charity for all who are unable to believe as we do. Even if the orthodox devil ask to speak on a Spiritual platform, he should be listened to attentively, and an effort made to help him to higher ground. There is no safety without free speech. No matter how many errors may be advanced, if there is freedom the truth will at last prevail.

Scientists hesitate to investigate into some of the phenomena of nature, not because they are unworthy, for in nature nothing is insignificant, but they fear to run counter to the principles of science as already understood. They get hold of a few facts, but fail to comprehend nature in her entirety, because they voluntarily shut out certain of her aspects. They endeavor constantly to conform to what they consider established truths, instead of holding themselves in readiness to welcome any truth, no matter how much it contradicts old theories. There is in society too great fear of being thought inconsistent, and many will not admit what they know to be true because they have sometime committed themselves to a contrary opinion. If to be consistent is to be narrow and creed-bound, then hail inconsistency!

The Spiritualist who claims that the phenomena constitute all of Spiritualism deserves to be set on a dunce block. The phenomena are merely the means by which we are introduced to the Spiritual temple. True Spiritualism embraces all that tends to make mankind wiser and better, all that relieves human suffering, lessens human burdens and takes off the bonds from human endeavor.

Mrs. Smith briefly alluded to the notice in Common Sense of the birth of a child to Mrs. Richardson, and said she in her innocence could see nothing in that notice but the birth of a well-formed, healthy child, and said to herself "good." Here is a fact concerning which mothers may inquire and possibly from it learn a lesson which will aid them in the future in the production of more perfect children. Here is a welcome child, which proves also to be a healthy child. All facts connected with such an event are of interest, and should be made known, yet there are editors who affect to see vileness in the bare announcement of such a fact. Legitimacy is not a thing of law. The child that is most nearly perfect, mentally, morally and physically is the most nearly legitimate.

From this point Mrs. Smith spoke as one inspired. We cannot report her without greatly marring the beauty of her discourse. She spoke of virtue, of the sacredness of the sexual relation, of the degradation of unwelcome personal contact, of the purity of motive, the cleanness of soul, with which the marriage relation should alone be assumed, and of the noble children that would be born from parents so fitted for the office of parentage, closing with an impromptu poem, which thrilled all who heard it, while the face of the speaker seemed to be illumined with light divine. It was the most eloquent discourse yet given by Mrs. Smith in this city, and the closing portion of it was as much a surprise to the speaker as it was a delight to her hearers. Concerning the evening lecture of Mrs. Smith, we prefer to give the words of another, as we find them in the Examiner of Monday last. A reporter for that paper says:

"Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith's reputation as a speaker brought me out in the evening to Huddy's Hall on Market street. It is a very pleasant hall, and nearly every chair was occupied. The speaker is an earnest little body, and has a precision and grace in expression one seldom finds surpassed. There appears no aim to charm the ear by artifice. She takes an elevated place at the start, and moves right along, following statements with arguments that need no flowery skill, save the sweet, tender, heart-reaching words of woman to make them attractive and convincing.

She was glad of the recent expose of fraudulent mediums. It would tend to check the wild yearnings, the blind trusts of half-fledged spiritualists. Many of them had been so anxious to go to heaven, but the angels didn't want them. They were inclined to depend wholly on the spirits, when they ought to shoulder responsibilities themselves. The expose would not stagger true spiritualists; if all the popular mediums in the world were proved frauds, it would not disprove the facts of spirit communion. It was in fact old as the ages, and thousands had the evidence within their own hearts that no revelations of fraud in popular mediums could in the least weaken.

The speaker urged it upon the spiritualists as a duty to themselves and the public, who were liable to get deceived, to bring the local, materializing mediums to the test and if found to be frauds, publish them as such; but if proved genuine, gather around them in sympathy, encourage and support them and never let the necessity for bread tempt them to deceive.

At Mrs. Smith's request Prof. Chaney set forth his views on the Social Science question and urged the organization of a society. Mrs. Smith gave the project a gentle, persuasive, motherly tuck up.

CATHOLICS IN OFFICE.

The theory of the American Republic is that the people are the fountain of power. The Pope says, "No! You forget God! He has appointed the church, and the head of the church to be His agent and to declare His will; and this declaration must prevail. It need not be justice, nor equality, nor liberty nor right. It is enough to know that the Pope, the vicegerent of God, has spoken it." There is nothing new in this assumption, yet a new controversy has grown out of it in Europe. If this controversy disturbs the people of Europe, so much the more must it disturb us. We are more subject to disturbing elements. The papist with the teachings of Rome in his brain may be in the jury box, on the Bench, in the Legislature, in the army or navy, carrying out the instructions of his first and real master, while we fondly imagine that he is serving the Republic. We can make no objection to a man's religious opinions unless they affect his political integrity. We must be free to think for ourselves; but if we think the Republic should be destroyed in favor of the Pope we are not proper custodians of the public liberties. Until the matter be fully and clearly settled, we must hold that the election of Roman Catholics to office is a menace to the Republican liberties of the country.

CANONICAL AUTHORITY.

Some one in the Boston Investigator questions the truth of the statement of Thomas Paine, that the "true" gospels were separated from the "false" by a vote in the Nicene Council, and intimating that Paine invented the story, demands an authority. As far as I have seen, both editor and contributors have failed to name the authority.

In the History of the Eastern Church, by Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, D. D., the authority cited is Mansi's Councils, vol. ii pp 625-701, 710-1081. It seems, however, that the vote was not entirely satisfactory, as the Canonical and Apocryphal books were placed together near the Holy Table with a prayer that the canonical might be found above and the others below. And it was so.

THE INDEPENDENT LYCEUM.

This Society was organized last Sunday afternoon at Central Hall. Its name affords a good idea of its character. The platform will be free for the discussion of any question which does not involve the advocacy of vice, immorality or crime. Questions of reform, aiming for the elevation of the race, will take precedence. The topic at present under consideration is, "Man and Woman; their relative positions." By request, Prof. Chaney opened the discussion last Sunday, taking the ground that they should be upon a plain of equality before the laws enacted by man, as they are under the law of Nature. He did not take an ultra position, nor insist upon suffrage for women, only that she should have equal rights with man in all things, but especially in what pertains to the marriage copartnership, in both the property and the children. He gave as a reason his regard for the welfare of the male sex, regardless of women. Women are to be the mothers of our next generation of men, and the status of these men must of necessity greatly depend upon the status of woman. Emancipate her from the bondage wherein the superstition of centuries has held her, and she would at once become the mother of better children. Her boys would make better men and her daughters better women, in turn improving the race, their sons superior to themselves, their grandsons superior to their sons, and so the race go on progressing. It is in this way, and this way only, that we can free mankind from the vices and crimes which everywhere abound. We have vainly tried, for hundreds of years, to improve the race by enacting penal laws. Let us now try another method; let us stop breeding criminals, and then in a few years the old ones will die off and there will be none left. But to do this successfully, we must emancipate woman and give her the relative position to which she is entitled by Nature. She must at least be treated as kindly by man as the female among the lower animals is treated by the male. Among the brutes rape is almost unknown, a crime which many husbands commit almost daily and are justified by the Christian doctrine of the subjection of women. The male animal protects the female with kindness, but it is reserved for man, who walks upright, boasting of the good understanding between himself and his God, to beat, bruise, and even kill the gentle being that clings to him for protection. Too often, too, man practices this brutality at that period when the embryo is sensitive to every external impression, and the child may be marked a murderer from birth. The place of beginning then, if we expect to elevate the race, is by giving woman her true, relative position.

Mr. Pierson made some remarks approving the nature of the organization. He was glad to find a free platform, and hoped it would remain free. Mrs. Chaney followed, appealing to her own sex to come forward to the work. Women should take the rostrum in the maintenance of their rights, speaking and acting honestly, instead of cringing before the fiat of popular opinion. Walter Hyde made some very appropriate remarks in favor of the topics discussed. Mrs. Williams presided at the piano, and Mrs. Carr recited a poem in very good style. Same subject considered at two o'clock to-morrow afternoon; opening address by Dr. P. B. Randolph.

OUR CANONIZED SAINT.

ED. COMMON SENSE: I cannot permit the Anniversary of Thomas Paine to pass without contributing my mite towards keeping his memory green.

Not that he was a better man than all others, though he was very good, patriotic and very unselfish; but because he has been abused, slandered and held up as a bug-a-boo to frighten weak-kneed doubters, and also that by these misrepresentations free thought and free speech in religious matters might be suppressed. The birthday of Thomas Paine will be celebrated all over the United States—excepting San Francisco—not so much in the spirit of hero worship as in self defense. The Theological policy is to crush the Infidel, to hold him up to the eyes of the world—in the church—as a bold, bad man, unworthy of either trust or respect, a man wholly vile and only fit to be despised in this world, and damned in the next. Some may wonder why shortcomings of clergymen are held up to the gaze of the readers of Liberal papers week after week. The reason may be found, not that they are believed to be worse than other men, or anything else than human, but from the fact that clerical delinquencies are carefully hidden and covered up, and that equal pains are taken by the church to expose Infidels, and in both cases the vilest falsehoods have been resorted to in order to accomplish their purpose. The following extract from a speech made by Constantine the Great at the Council of Nice, has been the policy of the church from his day till now:

"You have been made by God priests and rulers, to judge and decide, * * and have even been made Gods, so highly raised as you are above men, for it is written, 'I have said ye are Gods, and ye are all the children of the Most High;' 'and God stood in the Congregation of the gods, and in the midst He judges the gods.' You ought really to neglect these common matters, (the licentiousness of the clergy) and devote yourselves to the things of God. It is not for me to judge of what awaits the judgment of God only." And as he burnt the libels which had been brought to him against the clergy, he said, "Never let the faults of men in their consecrated offices be publicly known to the scandal and temptation of the multitude." "Nay," he added, doubtless spreading out the folds of his Imperial mantle as he spoke, "even though I were with my own eyes to see a bishop in the act of gross sin, I would throw my purple robe over him that no one might suffer from the sight of such a crime."

While there have been and even now are honest, devoted humanitarian clergymen, yet the disposition to place them higher in the reverence of man than other men and classes of men must be discountenanced, while we place any value on individual freedom to judge of spiritual matters. Had the deeds of Thomas Paine, apart from his theological works, belonged to a clergyman, his name would have ranked with Wesley and Whitfield.

It is then our duty to see to it that justice be done to his name, and to never cease the struggle till justice, full and entire, be done him, not only by the nation whom he served and helped to create, but by every pulpit and every clerical lip in Christendom.

CHINESE LABOR.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE :—I have read a letter in your paper from John Horner, a "Bootmaker," and a provider for a wife and six children, in which that writer takes up the old tune of "Chinese Slave," and tries to play it to a new variation. He says: "Boys and girls are deprived of the opportunity of learning a trade through the influence of Chinese Slave Labor." I deny this assertion. There is not a Chinaman in this city, bond or free, that prevents an American boy or girl from working at what they please. In fact it is the other way. Before the introduction of the Chinese into the shoe trade there was not a dozen white American boys learning the shoemaker's trade in this city, from the very fact that the Knights of St. Crispin, a powerful, secret oath-bound organization, rigidly restricted the teaching of "new help," except by special permission of the Lodge. There was one exception to this rule: a father might teach his son without asking permission of his fellow blockheads; but if he wanted to teach his daughter, or his grandson, or his nephew, or even his wife, he had to humbly ask permission of the Grand Puke, in the usual manner, and not always with a hope of the favor being granted. John Chinaman commenced to unravel the mysteries of the "gentle craft," and in doing so he pricked the bubble of Crispinism, on this coast at least.

The organization has collapsed, and the boys of this coast who can get capitalists to employ them, can engage in the noble and inspiring occupation of boot-making with impunity. That this assertion is true, a visit to the various shoe factories of this city, where there are, or have been, hundreds of boys working at boot and shoe making, to compete in turn with their white or Chinese brothers, will prove. A cursory glance at the Eastern papers ought to convince Mr. Horner that, with all our Chinese cheap labor to contend with, the shoe makers of this city are better off than their fellow craftsmen in any Eastern city of equal size, and I think this applies to all other trades that have a foothold on this coast.

Why Dr. Stone should be characterized as a "tyrannical preacher," for defending the Chinese from a Scriptural stand point, I cannot understand. The text is very plain on that subject, and Dr. Stone has done nothing more than his duty, for which I heartily thank him. Mr. Horner need not go back on "orthodoxy" on account of Dr. Stone's defection. In that camp he can be comforted with words of cheer from Rev. Buchard, Rev. Starr and Rev. Lobseheid, gentlemen who can sympathize with him on the Chinese question.

The immigration of Chinese into our country is one of the greatest blessings that has ever been vouchsafed to the American people, rich and poor, and I heartily wish they could be brought here more rapidly both men and women. I, as a foreign-born citizen of this American Republic, ask no rights or privileges that I am not willing to cheerfully accord every other foreigner who comes to our shores to better his condition, be his color or creed what it may, and I think it is time that men professing to be liberal should be at least consistent, and not fall into the old blunder of fighting for freedom in the livery of despotism. I would like to say more, but I suppose your space is limited. I remain yours in the cause of universal brotherhood.

ANOTHER CHANCE FOR A SPASM.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE :—Seeing some weeks since a notice in COMMON SENSE of the birth of Mrs. Richardson's child and the righteous indignation of the San Francisco press thereat, reminds me of a similar notice I have seen elsewhere in print, which I will copy, at the risk of again throwing the Christian champion of the Post into a virtuous spasm, though possibly he might not again exclaim: "precisely what this means we do not know, but evidently something nasty and vile." Now the birth of Jesus Christ was in this wise:

"When, as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they come together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost * * * * And Joseph also went up from Galilee out of the city of Nazareth, into Judea unto the city of David which is called Bethlehem, * * * to be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being great with child. And so it was, that, while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. And she brought forth her first born son," etc.

All of which, stripped of its verbal circumlocution, means that Miss Mary had acted naughty with Mr. H. G.; and Mr. Joseph, her betrothed, discovering her unfaithfulness would have discarded her, but for the successful little game she, her cousin Elizabeth and the angels played him. Mr. H. G. was undoubtedly some representative of God in the flesh, for God always uses human agents to accomplish his will on earth. Hoping, Mr. Editor, that the Post will hasten to correct the morals of that large class of the community who believe in the morality of this proceeding, and have deified the illegitimate offspring, I am yours, for consistency,

A. C. STOWA.

THE SPIRITUALISTS' GOD.

A great many absurd things are spoken in the Society for Self Culture, in opposition to Spiritualism, but occasionally there is a good hit, like the following made by A. F. Smyth in the course of his speech two weeks ago. We would publish the entire address if it were not for the fact that Mr. Smyth, like most other opponents of Spiritualism, takes narrow views of the subject—gets hold of a fag end of truth, and talks as if he understood the whole matter, and to publish such crude ideas would be a waste of space. The following, however, is a hard hit: Mr. Smyth said:

While I think of it. There is one thing about Spiritual teachings I shall never understand. It is this: I hear some praying to the Great First Cause, some to Mother Nature, others to the Infinite Spirit, they denying the existence of a personal God. Now if there is no personal God, or Supreme entity, why pray to any? Who and what is "Mother Nature and Father God?" Does any one know? I know of but one mother of mankind—the planet on which we live. But does it possess power, will, purpose, foresight, or one single attribute of intelligent comprehension capable of rendering assistance?

Pitch a lucky man into the Nile, says the Arabian proverb, and he will come up with a fish in his mouth.

As riches and favor forsake a man, we discover him to be a fool; but nobody could find it out in his prosperity.

SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS.

The Minneapolis Mirror, of a late date, gives a detailed account of some strange manifestations that have recently occurred in Minneapolis. The following are extracts :

For several weeks the family of a highly respectable merchant of this city, has been disturbed by manifestations, apparently governed by a girl of the family aged fourteen, that have been occurring at their house. Neither the father nor mother are Spiritualists. They are both members of the Baptist Church, and have ever looked upon Spiritualism as a delusion and a snare. None of the family had ever attended a spiritual seance, visited a Clairvoyant, or seen a so-called fortune teller. They claim to have had not merely a disbelief but a holy horror of such things. All they know of Spiritualist (so-called) manifestations, was what they had learned from the occasional accounts published in the newspapers. These they have read, wondering at the credulity that could swallow such (to them) palpable untruths, rather than at the strangeness of the exhibitions.

About six weeks ago, as they inform us, their daughter began telling them of what she saw in a dark closet in the house every time she entered it. The visions appeared to her as pictures, sometimes a landscape, and others a face, a figure or a group.

The parents tried to correct her of this strangely and suddenly acquired habit of lying. She was at one time shut in this same dark closet for half a day as punishment for falsification.

The mother, fearing the effect of such a punishment on the sensitive organization of her child—it was the first penalty of the kind exacted from her—sat in the room from which the closet opened during the whole time, listening to every movement of the child.

She had observed the strictest caution as to letting her imprisoned child know of her presence, lest the effect of her punishment should be lost. You may therefore judge of her astonishment when the girl called out, "Mother the six hours are over may I come out?"

Her mother asked her how she knew that she was there. She said "I saw you all the time." Then she was asked how she knew the time was up. She "saw by a clock—a dark woman in a long blue cloak, and with a scar over her left eye, held the clock."

The mother recognized the description as that of her mother dressed as she last saw her. The girl told where each member of the family had been during her confinement and the several acts they had performed. The statements tallied in every particular with the actual occurrences.

Father and mother and all the children were astonished. They no more accused the child of lying; but they began to test her powers.

These tests resulted in manifestations that were calculated to overturn the religious faith of the household, a faith that had been grounded as on a rock for years. To them, their religion had been a reality; this assault upon it must be repelled.

Their own tests having failed, they resolved, to ask aid from others. They invited their pastor and two clergymen of other denominations, and several of their fellow church members and intimate friends in and out of churches, to meet at their house for investigations. A number of persons, prominent in church business and social relations in Minneapolis, have become thoroughly mystified in attempting to elucidate the truth on other grounds than those of spirit agency.

The editor gives an account of a personal interview as follows :

During a conversation from which the most of the facts above stated was learned, the medium enters the room. She is a fair-haired, slightly formed girl, just attaining the stature of womanhood, and having that nervous temperament, which Mesmerists claim to be most perfect for their subjects.

She was modest in her deportment and seemed to shrink a little from further investigation; but to all appearance appeared as desirous of solving the problem in accordance with the hopes of her parents as they were.

She offered nothing as a belief; did not claim to receive anything from spirits; said her answers came to her intuitively; and she described what she really saw; or went and did, where and what an invisible and unknown controlling power seemed to demand.

In answer to the old formula, "Are there any spirits present?" there was no response. It was put in another form, thus: "If the power that has controlled the person is present, and if these investigations tend to do good and reveal the truth, it will please manifest itself as it thinks best."

Immediately the chair, on which the medium sat, was raised with its occupant about three feet from the floor, carried steadily and smoothly across the room, or very nearly across, and turned around, so that the medium faced the questioner, then noiselessly was lowered to the floor.

There was no visible support. Almost immediately the the chair was raised again, and the medium said: "Please see if any invisible but yet tangible power supports me?" The father and the lady visitor joined hands, and, standing one on each side of the chair, passed them over and under the chair several times in a continued circle, the chair lowering as their hands raised and raising as they lowered, so that the contact of hands might not be broken. * * *

The girl then began describing what she claimed to see. There were immediately recognized as correct delineations of events personally known to some one present, all of which occurred before the girl was born. * * *

THE NEXT SEANCE.

After a few minutes passed in pleasant general conversation, the medium, who had been present during the assembling of the party, sharing in their conversation in a natural girlish style, began speaking in a dignified, earnest manner.

There was none of the traditional falling into a trance, nothing abnormal in her appearance—her voice was perhaps a little deeper and stronger than common—but there was something in the manner that nearly all present recognized as announcing the fact that some other intelligence was expressing itself through her. She said:

"All are present who intend being here to-night. Enough has been done by way of physical manifestations to satisfy the most skeptical that my medium is not the real agent, but to still further establish the fact, look for a minute, as you sit, at the mirror."

A FACE WITHOUT A BODY.

We all looked. A little shade began to form on the face of the mirror, covering about one half of its surface, and having a similar appearance to one in a cold room, on which the breath of a person has been condensed. Out of this gradually began forming a face, and at last stood out clear and distinct. It was that of a woman apparently fifty years of age. The hair was a light brown, a little mixed with grey. The eyes were a deep, dark bluish grey, and were instinct with life. It was no reflected picture. It stood out from the glass. All saw it; all agreed in the description of it. It was a strange face to all present except two.

IT IS RECOGNIZED.

The medium said she had seen the face often in the dark closet, and the lady who was at the gathering last week in an awe-struck voice declared that she had seen that face twice in moments of great peril. Once as a face simply, appearing at an open window; and once in connection with a full human form as it pointed out her danger to those who rescued her.

The reporter was about to ask the face if it could speak, when it began doing so, saying:

"Certainly. A few intelligences have the power of materializing themselves. I possess the power to a limited degree; but it is less exhaustive to speak through the vocal organs of a living person if I can first get full control of that person. * * * In the meantime the face had vanished from the mirror and the voice, whose continuance had not been broken, was now issuing from the lips of the medium. It said that it had a name by which it was known to other spirits—"Aider," signifying helper—and that unembodied souls and disembodied souls occupied similar positions and performed similar work. The death of the body did not release the soul from responsibility, nor from the necessity of labor. Souls are the same after death as before. It has the same capabilities and powers, the same aspirations and desires. It goes on gaining new experiences and unlearning its errors in the light of those experiences.

Here the speaker called attention to the weariness of her medium, and promised to meet those who felt interested in further inquiries at such time as they might appoint, not less than one week unless they could find another medium. It would be too great a drain on the medium's nervous system if continued oftener than one evening in the week.

JENNY LEYS' LECTURES.

The announcement that Miss Jennie Leys would speak in Cook's Hall, on Sunday last, drew a full house, both in the afternoon and evening.

It is hardly necessary for us to mention that Miss Leys is denominated, by spiritualists, an inspirational speaker, since all manifestations of intellectual, artistic or mechanical ability are by the mass of those holding the spiritual faith accredited to inspiration. Where inspiration begins and where it leaves off, under the belief which attributes to it every noteworthy manifestation of mental or often even of affectional life it would be impossible to determine.

One thing, however, is certain: after deducting from a man's life all that is generally attributed to the force of inspiration or to the faculties of beings exterior to himself, there is nothing left that can, in any degree, constitute him a respectable being. In the case of Miss Leys, however, there seems some ground for supposing inspiration.

Miss Leys claims to speak inspirationally; she sometimes pauses with an appearance of listening to voices unheard by us, a smile lights up her features, and she frequently prefaces her remarks with: "We, the spirits, say"—Come from what ever source they may, however Miss Leys delivered two most entertaining discourses on Sunday last. Her deportment is easy and graceful, her manner earnest, and her speech abounds in those well-rounded periods that mark the natural orator, and that by their euphony and emphasis go so far toward winning the sympathies of an audience. With the conclusion of her Sunday evening's discourse, we do not agree, because we do not the accept premises. But, accepting these, her discourse was thoroughly logical, and, under any circumstances, was marked by a nice consecutiveness and a masterly grasp of her subject that, in these barbarian days, is not generally accredited to her sex. Miss Leys is visiting Santa Barbara, partly with a view to recuperating her health, and we are happy to say will remain here for several weeks at least.

On Sunday she will lecture again at Cook's Hall, Sunday afternoon and evening.—Santa Barbara Index.

THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

Office of the Kingdom of Heaven, Boston, Mass. Jan. 25th, 1875.

ED. COMMON SENSE, Dear Sir:—Your issue of Jan. 9th lies before me, and prominently on the first page it says: "The Kingdom of Heaven is no more. It departed this life in Boston recently, without sign, aged ten years." How prone humanity is to exult over a fallen rival. Had you any of this feeling when you inadvertently penned the foregoing? Do you want to believe a lie? I can answer for you, you do not. Now I wrote to the Banner, a jealous sheet of all youthful competitors in the Spiritual field, stating that we should take a vacation, a part only of which Colby published, and of course it was garbled. Now the fact is the Kingdom of Heaven and its editors never were more alive and deeper in earnest than to-day, having just issued the Jan. No. for vol. 5, a copy of which is on its way to your office, and among the few advertisements in its columns is one of the COMMON SENSE. If you wish to correct an egregious error in your next issue you can of course, but as an individual it will make no difference to me, for the work I am engaged in is not mine but God's, humanity's and yours for that. THOS. COOK.

Our friend Cook is assured that exultation over the reported fall of the Kingdom did not prompt the notice, on the contrary, it was with regret that we read the announcement in Hull's Crucible. We mentioned it as a matter of news, and if the notice seems facetious it was probably because we felt like forcing a smile to conceal a tear. Now this is not a joke. COMMON SENSE has had too hard a struggle itself not to know how to sympathize with a brother in reform; but it always happens that when our affairs become most discouraging, we grow desperate, and say, "Let failure come; it cannot be worse than this constant worry for the means of existence." Only about two-thirds of our subscribers have paid their subscriptions, and they seem as indifferent as is they had no interest whatever in the success of the paper. Perhaps they have not; and perhaps if this state of things continues we shall not long hence give our friend Cook the opportunity to announce the decease of COMMON SENSE, and we will be glad to have him do it in his own way, either laughingly, or lugubriously, as the impulse of the moment may decide.

All the rarest hues of human life take radiance and are rainbowed out in tears.

The worth of a State, in the long run, is the worth of the individuals composing it.

A man never gets hold of the real gist of life till he begins to appreciate his own company.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO

THE STUDY.

FAUST AND MEPHISTOPHELES.

FAUST—You understand, no happiness I ask;
 'T' the intoxication of the bitterest joys,
 To loving hate, quick anger, honied gall,
 I dedicate my soul hence forth. My task—
 To bare the bosom search for knowledge cloy
 To every sorrow that tames other boys,
 And taste in my own person all the woes
 Which all humanity or feels or knows;
 Highest and deepest with my soul t' embrace—
 Their joy, their woe, upon my bosom heap,
 To put myself in their self's suffering place,
 And as that self at length to sink into the deep.

MEPHISTO—Oh, trust, friend, one who many thousand years
 Hath chewed at this tough crust. D'you know
 That from their rocking cradles to their biers
 None of mankind digest this ancient dough?
 Trust one of us, this Universe before ye
 Hath only for one God's delight been made
 He takes good care to gird himself with glory,
 But leaves us wretches in eternal shade
 And day and night alone with ye have staid.

FAUST—But then I will.

MEPHISTO—Well! That's all right enough;
 Yet there's one thing I somewhat apprehend—
 Your time is short, this art is long and rough,
 I think you'd better trust to me your friend;
 Make the acquaintance of some poet then
 Let the good gentleman give wings to fancy,
 And all the noble qualities of men
 Heap on your honor in an orphic stanza
 The lion's pluck,
 The stag's unrivalled speed,
 The dark Italian's fiery blood,
 The steadfastness of Northern men at need,
 Let him the secret for you find,
 How nobleness with cunning is combined,
 And teach you how, with all the fires of youth,
 To love by system and desert with truth!
 I'd like to meet with such a man myself,
 'Tis Microcosmus I'd nickname the elf!

FAUST—What am I then if my unlucky star
 Permits me not manhood's bright crown to reach,
 Towards which my instincts struggle, all and each?

MEPHISTO—You are in fact,—just what you are:
 Adorn your poll with wig of million locks,
 Put yards of heel beneath your upplish socks,
 Still after all you 'bide just what you are.

FAUST—I feel it well, in vain have I raked up
 All the soul's dainties to my separate heap,
 For when I sit me down at length to sup,
 My spirit's appetite sinks off to sleep;
 I am no higher by one single hair,
 I'd grasp the Infinite—it is not there!

MEPHISTO—Well my good sir, you view the matter
 The only way a mortal may;
 We must however right the platter
 Before life's joys ebb right away.
 Confound it! surely hand and foot,
 And head and manhood, these are thine,
 But aught that I may taste of good,
 Is it on that account less mine?
 If I six races own, their speed and heels are
 The same to me as tho' my own self's pegs,
 I back the winners and am not a welsher,*
 As I if too had four and twenty legs!
 Come then! Let all this humbug be
 And out into the world with me!
 I tell you truly that a brooding wight
 Is like some beast which upon barren ground
 Is driven in circles by some evil sprite,
 Whilst verdant meadows all the moor surround.

MY CREED.

I do not know if future life
 Has weal or woe for me;
 I only know his laws of love
 Forever more shall be.

I do not know that for my sake
 A Jesus bled and died;
 I think of all who for truth's sake
 The world has crucified.

I do not know where God abides,
 Nor of his great white throne;
 I stretch my hand in darkness,
 And childlike touch his own.

I do not know if works and faith
 Will buy me heaven's joy;
 The holy right to bless mankind
 Is heaven without alloy.

I do not know that sons of earth,
 In endless pain shall moan;
 I only know that God is love,
 And he will claim his own.

I know not that for one man's sin
 All men to grief are born;
 I only know the truth of this,
 "BLESSED ARE THEY THAT MOURN."

I do not know that wrong and might
 Will wrap the world in sin;
 For right is right, since God is God
 And right the day must win.

I do not ask that for truth's sake
 I constant praise shall find.
 If no reproach come to my name,
 The blessing were not mine.

Among the pitfalls round our way
 All of us blindly move;
 Be careful! If thy brother falls
 Give him thy hand in love.

POPERY.

[For Common Sense.]

BY I. A. HEALD.

Scourge of the world! We see thee still
 The same base ingrate as of old—
 Enslaver of the human will,
 And cause of wretchedness untold.

Thou vile usurper from the lands
 Where kings have forced thee from their shore,
 Come ye with sacrilegious hands,
 To crush out freedom evermore!—

To wind your treacherous, slimy coil
 'Round homes where dwell the free and brave,
 To desecrate fair Freedom's soil—
 Transform the freeman to a slave?

Shall we, then, basely yield the sod
 To foes who've naught but blight to give?
 No! By the Great, Eternal God,
 We swear that Freedom still shall live!

That while just rights to all we grant,
 Shall none but freemen rule the free—
 That Popery's rag shall ne'er supplant
 Our blood-bought flag of liberty.

Curse of the nations! Where we find
 Thy wily, treacherous Jesuit clan,
 There is no peace. Thy cruel kind
 Are foes to freedom and to man.

Import the hordes, rid other climes
 Of thy poor slaves—priest-ridden tools;
 We'll free them all in coming times
 By aid of truth and public schools.

For here, as education rules
 There'll breathe no priest-bound willing slave.
 On Freedom's soil, through Freedom's schools,
 Shall Popery find its final grave.

COLFAX, CAL., JAN. 1876.

UNDER THE ICE.

Under the ice the waters run;
 Under the ice our spirits lie;
 The genial glow of the summer sun
 Shall loosen their fetters by and by.
 Moan and groan in thy prison cold,
 River of life, river of love,
 The winter is getting worn and old,
 The frost is leaving the melting mould
 And the sun shines warm above.

Under the ice, under the snow,
 Our souls are bound in a crystal ring;
 By and by will the south winds blow,
 And the roses bloom on the banks of spring.
 Moan and groan in thy fetters strong,
 River of life, river of love,
 The nights grow short, the days grow long,
 Weaker and weaker the bonds of wrong,
 And the sun shines bright above.

Under the ice our souls are hid;
 Under the ice our good deeds grow;
 Men but credit the wrong we did,
 Never the motives that lie below.
 Moan and groan in thy prison cold,
 River of life, river of love;
 The winter of life is growing old,
 The frost is leaving the melting mould,
 And the sun shines warm above.

Under the ice we hide our wrong—
 Under the ice that has chilled us through;
 Oh, that the friends who have known us long
 Dare to doubt we are good and true.
 Moan and groan in thy prison cold,
 River of life, river of love;
 The winter is getting worn and old,
 The roses stir in the melting mould;
 We all shall be known above.

Signs of the Times.

A gentleman in Syracuse has given the University in that city $30,000, but would not give his name.

There will be sixty ex-rebel officers in the next Congress and about thirty from the Union army. The fact is significant.

A large portion of the Catholic clergy has deliberately undertaken the task of checking what it deems the evil spirit of progress.

Men are becoming less afraid to search for the truth. Liberal books that a quarter of a century, nay, even ten years ago, would have been shunned, now are widely welcomed.

A proclamation issued by Archbishop Cullen forbids the reading of Prof. Tyndall's address by faithful Catholics—a good way to call attention to it. If a law could be passed forbidding the reading of the Bible, every body would be studying the Scriptures. That's human nature.

The third wife of the Khedive of Egypt has established a school for girls, defraying herself the entire cost of its maintenance. There are in the school two hundred boarders and one hundred day scholars, all Arabs or slaves. They discard the veil, are dressed in frocks and shoes, and sit at desks, instead of squatting on the ground in Oriental fashion.

Col. Forney, writing of the honesty and efficiency of the persons employed in the English civil service, says it is not fifty years since the English Service was in a worse condition than that of the United States. Competency and faithfulness are now the requirements for promotion, and the service is for life, or a pension on retirement.

Rev. G. W. Sloan, of Steilacoom, was so affected by the death of his wife that he became a raving maniac, and has been placed in the insane asylum. Had he understood the Spiritual philosophy, he would not have been "so bowed down with grief" as the Echo says he was. The truth is the Christian faith gives little real consolation in such cases.

T. B. Forbush, in the Golden Age, says: "Through the world at large there is a noticeable broadening and elevating of religious thought, while in some provinces of the church there is manifest tendency to revive outworn dogmas and effete superstitions. With all the forward sweep of the age, it is not without decided symptoms of reversion, in some quarters, to a low kind of religious life which we hoped was being outgrown."

Our readers will notice, as one of the signs of the times, the fact that the daily papers of this city took no notice of the Paine Celebration, with one exception, the Chronicle, and that gave a burlesque account of it. Free Thinkers being a disorganized set of thinkers, are not treated with respect, while even noodles and hypocrites, if organized, are courted and deferred to. This effect will exist as long as its cause continues; no longer.

The New York Post Office authorities have ordered the delivery of letters in that city on Sunday!

American saws are said to have been recently offered for sale in Sheffield, England, 15 per cent. under the price of Sheffield makers.

Over two hundred papers and periodicals have ceased to exist within the last two months for want of patronage. Hard times affect papers as readily as any interest in the country.

Abraham Lincoln, in his first annual message, said: "Labor is superior to capital and deserves much the higher consideration." But Grant says, "How to induce capital to employ labor is the question!"

The Christian Leader wants a universal revival, and tells how it is to be manufactured. But it does not tell what is to be done with the revival when it is manufactured, nor what good it is expected to do.

Lately when Mrs. Woodhull was to lecture at Newburgh, a Baptist minister prayed at a public meeting that some grand catastrophe, some breaking of a bridge or collision on a railroad might prevent this satan from entering their Eden.

A Neapolitan has invented a new instrument which he calls the piano-grafo. It is so arranged that as the player strikes the keys, the notes inscribe themselves on a piece of paper—an invaluable invention for the composer, who has no longer to depend on his memory to record his compositions.

Col. Henry Olcott is investigating the Holmes mediums at Philadelphia, and is subjecting the phenomena of "materialization" to the most rigid tests, and with quite remarkable results. He is satisfied that the Holmes are genuine mediums, and that that the woman who pretends that she acted the part of Katie King is a fraud.

An English amateur photographer claims to have discovered a method of fixing the image of an object on a sensitized plate not more than half an inch in diameter, an impression from which can be afterward enlarged to the necessary size. The plate is fixed into an ordinary locket or keepsake hanging from a watch-chain, and can suddenly be exposed, by a touch of the finger, on entering a room, and an image taken of a picture or of a person, without any one besides the operator being aware of it.

The decline, or rather the total abrogation of the apprentice system has deprived the youth of the opportunity of learning trades. The result is that there are few who are learning, so that skilled labor is getting scarcer in every department of industry. It is therefore a matter of urgent importance that some method should be devised to remedy this difficulty. Of all the plans discussed there seems to be but one which promises success; that is, the establishment of technical schools. The large degree of success which has followed the introduction of these schools in some departments of our activities is strong proof of their utility in all branches.

MONOPOLY ETHICS.—NO. 2.

In a prior article it was submitted that the "Moral Standard" of all monopolies is embodied in the common phrase, "a thing is worth what it will bring." And, so far as the social status is concerned, this rule is of universal application. It works both ways, which is supposed to prove the perfectness of any rule. For instance, if the monopolist has created a "corner" in produce, stocks or transportation facilities, and demands prices that are ruinous to those who are compelled to pay them, he is ready to defend himself with the universal rule. So also the money lender—the Land Lord and all kinds of monopolists. On the other hand, if times are dull and hard, and laborers are to be employed, wages are remarkably cut down, because, "a thing is worth (only) what it will bring." Thus the rule works both ways. It is as good for the Bulls as the Bears of our progressive (?) civilization. It covers the demand for excessive prices and changes in one direction, and approves of the lowest ones in the other.

No wonder Democritus laughed at the stupid folly of mankind, if the financial thimble-rigging of to-day was prevalent in ancient Greece. Nor need we be astonished that the Money Cormorants consider the working masses as only fit to be devoured at leisure. But there is surely room for sadness when the toiling millions are seemingly only intent on preparing the banquet of the cannibals who prey upon them. Or, throwing metaphor aside, it is lamentable that the mass accept, as an axiom, the sentence we have quoted as the moral guide of the monopolist. What! are we never to have a standard of value resting on a scientific basis? Is our labor, and what it produces and creates, ever to be at the mercy of those whose only study is to absorb all the surplus of such productions? Will the people forever watch the gambling tricks of the go-betweens, and applaud their smartness when they are all the while robbed by the same? Let us hope not. But ere the play will cease on the one hand, and want and misery on the other, the cursed sorcery, which lurks in the principle of the monopolist, must be exposed and abandoned. It is not true that "a thing is worth what it will bring." Actual values are not created by the scarcities and "corners" which the gambling speculator may create.

The real worth or value of anything cannot be measured by the wants or necessities of the parties who wish to make a purchase. A starving man might be compelled to pay a thousand dollars for a meal of victuals; but will any one be so stupid as to assert that a few ounces of provisions can have any such enormous value? Nor can the use which the article may subserve to the buyer or borrower have anything to do with the worth or value. A loan of a few hundred dollars might save a valuable farm from forced sale, and prevent an estimable family from sinking into poverty and ruin; but to measure the rate of interest by the benefit is entirely and totally wrong. The most needy, those least able to pay a large interest, are the ones who do have to pay it. So, also, in the purchase of goods, the poorest are obliged to pay the most extravagant prices. Does the wealth of the rich or the destitution of the poor make one or two cents difference in the value of the pound of sugar which they respectively purchase? Of course not. How then are we to ascertain the value of articles, if we inexorably shut out of the equation the condition of the purchaser? I answer; by instituting a standard of common sense and honesty.

The real value of exchangeable commodities is defined by the amount of labor necessary for their production. Human labor is the only just and proper measure of real values. Hence, the only equitable or honest price of anything having a real value is the cost of its production. "Cost the limit of price," is the honest standard of price, as it is the only common sense measure of value. Then, instead of saying "a thing is worth what it will bring," which is the exponent of Monopoly Ethics, we say: Things are worth what they cost; no more, no less; and, by cost, we mean the labor expended in their production and transportation.

It must be apparent to every reader that if labor is to be the measurer of values, and all things derive their value from such measurement, itself cannot be measured by them. They can, at most, only be representative of labor, as a bank bill is supposed to represent specie. Money will be simply a labor tally; different pieces representing different lengths of time employed in labor. There can then be no cutting down the price of labor, for the length of time employed is the price.

It is the misfortune and folly of producers, the world's workers, that they allow the robber class, the traders, to establish a fictitious, an ever fluctuating price, not only for the products of their labor, but for the labor itself.

Labor is life. For what is life but the sum total of those forces which constitute us men? And what is labor but the expenditure of a portion of those forces? Labor products, then, represent a certain quantum of expended life; or, to put it in another form, a given amount of life force has been transmuted into another form. Hence, labor and labor products will always be found in strict correspondence to each other in estimated value. And the never ceasing change in prices will continue as long as the workers allow their lives to be estimated by a money standard, and that money the "specie basis" of to-day.

If men allow their labor to be estimated by gold and silver coins, the money of the trading class, they thereby consent to be slaves, and slaves they are. The Money of Civilization (?) (specie) is the ready instrument by which the Ethics of Monopoly are established. Having no fixed, because no scientific, value, it fluctuates every day in the year; hence, the price of nothing can be depended upon from one week to another. This incessant fluctuation in the price of labor products, made possible by a specie money, perpetually robs the laborer and enriches the monopolist. There being no fixed standard of value for anything (and there can be none with our specie money) renders it easy for the monopolist to establish and enforce his rule, that "a thing is worth what it will bring." A cental of wheat of good quality will afford the same nutriment one year as another; hence it has the same intrinsic value through all the ages. Why then the eternal change in its commercial value or price? Because of specie money and the Ethics of the monopolist. But, to close this article, I submit that the establishment of the scientific, the common sense standard, "Cost the limit of price," will at once prevent this ruinous fluctuation in commercial values or prices. Let it not be forgotten, however, that the railroad monopolist has adopted no new principle of commercial morality. He simply applies in his department what the people allow in all others. To strike at his application of the rule, while it is allowed to be just, is worse than folly; it is a crime. If you accept the principle don't wince at its application. More anon.

FINANCE.

THE MONEY QUESTION.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—To your question, in your last issue, on this subject: "How does our 'Workingman' propose to prevent the collection of interest for the use of money?" I would reply that my proposition to lower the rate of interest on money after the scheme of Senator W. Kelly's bill, is only to prevent losing the half where we cannot get the whole hog. When once a government is able to pass such a bill, it would find out that it is not good to put new cloth on an old garment. A right monetary system limits the rate of interest to its cost. Currency should have no intrinsic value, and should receive its power to exchange values and to measure labor and production from the government. The National Workingmen's Union Currency, proposed several years ago, makes money independent of supply and demand. The finance plank of the platform of this organization proposed to issue Treasury certificates or notes as legal tenders for all debts, and changeable at the option of the holders into U. S. bonds, and vice versa. This system would make our national debt a blessing instead of a burden to the people. The necessary amount of currency for our exchanges would flow out and back to the Treasury and make a crisis impossible.

In reply to your advice to the workingmen to co-operate, I would say: Look at the millions of capital which have been invested in the last twenty years in England in the co-operative system. Are not the innocent poor there starving, just as hundreds of thousands of willing workmen are obliged to live on city soups in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, etc.? These co-operative efforts are like a drop of water in the ocean, when the co-operative system makes out of a hundred thousand workingmen one thousand small capitalists. The cancer of the social body lies in the capitalistic system. Capital must become incorporated into labor, not by co-operation, but by just laws of government, which will prevent the stored or surplus labor capital, to be used to procure sinecures and unjust laws.

Yours gratefully. WORKINGMAN.

At Brazil, Ind., twenty-five colored children, and some of the brightest and best of the school, have been summarily removed. This measure has been arbitrarily enforced by the trustees against the strong expostulations of both Superintendent and teachers. The children pleaded pitiously to be allowed to remain. The Trustees acted in obedience to the clamor of a low and refractory class of the population.

INTEREST ON MONEY, ETC.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—I find a couple of questions in your paper of Jan. 30th which I beg to reply to. We propose to put an end to usury by simply abolishing all laws that compel the payment of interest. Do you not see that capital says to the legislators, "Give us a law to enable us to collect interest for the use of our money." The law makers reply, "That will place labor at your mercy." "Oh, no," says capital, "we are satisfied with reasonable rent, and you can fix it by law, say six per cent." But by and by capital gets strong, and then he says, "away with your usury laws, the rate of interest must be governed by the law of supply and demand." And then the capitalists get Congress to regulate the supply of money by law. Are not these facts recorded in history? Did we not turn out a Secretary of the Treasury for issuing a few millions of greenbacks to enable the farmers of the West to move their crops to market; have we not abolished usury laws in California? And what is the result? A higher rate of interest than in any other State. With the finest climate, the richest lands, endless water power to fabricate, the greatest ocean in the world at our feet, and markets all round it, where are our manufactures and commerce? And now we are asking Congress to give us a Reciprocity Treaty to enable us to compete with countries on the opposite side of the earth for the trade of our nearest neighbor. Why do we cry out, "We must have cheaper labor to develop our resources?" What's the trouble? Capital takes the lion's share. It is to protect this that we ask for subsidies for our commerce, and tariffs, treaties and Chinese labor for manufactures and trade.

I think you did not understand "workman's" allusion to labor saving machines, which, I take it, meant that the invention and use of labor saving machines must solve the labor problem by driving the masses to starvation for the want of employment. ("When things come to the worst they must mend.") If we had money cheap this could never happen; for then we should, with our capacity for producing the raw material, and an abundance of food, be able to manufacture cheaper than all other nations of the world; and this would enable us to export all our surplus; but now our working men are compelled to lie idle and starve, because Shylock will not abate one jot or tittle of his pound of flesh. It is true, the laboring classes require education: but how is the boy, who must work or starve at an early age, to get it? Co-operation will only do for a few. What we want is a plan that will elevate all, and this can only be done when each man receives all the profits of his labor, and the way to accomplish this is for the Government that now furnishes the nation's currency to bankers to furnish it to all the people are on same terms.

ANOTHER WORKINGMAN.

The Spiritual Scientist states that the frost work on the window panes of a Boston medium sometimes show clearly defined faces:

All the physical forces are correlated, and the sum of force, potential and actual, in the universe is always one and the same.

THE STARS AND FATE.

REPLY TO VOX STELLARUM.

In reply to the query whether it is the stars or ante-natal influences that make us what we are, you suggest that both may be true, and also that other influences contribute in the formation of our characters. In looking for a train of secondary causes I can agree with you, but I cannot understand how there can be more than one primary cause. If I stumble and fall upon the sidewalk, the primal cause is gravitation; the secondary cause may be a piece of orange peel, a lame leg, or defect in the sidewalk, yet all these causes in full force would not "horizontalize my perpendicularity" were it not for gravitation.

Now either the stars or ante-natal influences conspired to make us what we are; it could not have been both as the primal cause. For many years I have narrowly watched the phenomena attending conception and birth, and in no instance have I discovered that there was even a possibility that the stars exerted any influence upon the ante-natal conditions. If the parents were physically exhausted at conception, then a puny child is born. If the father's system is saturated with alcohol, the child is born a drunkard, always thirsting for intoxicating drinks. If either parent is diseased at the time of conception, that disease is transmitted, and so on with all the varying peculiarities. And thus being enabled to account for the status of the child purely on the ground of ante-natal conditions, I see no occasion for calling in planetary influences. Still, if my friend "Vox" can furnish evidence to show that the planets are at fault for some men being born brutes, while others are distinguished for gentleness and affection, I shall be happy to embrace his view of the subject. I have given a reason for the faith that is in me, and now call upon him to show cause why and how it is that the planets influence the embryo.

When it comes to the abstract question of fate, if allowed to define it myself, probably the orthodox Christian would denounce me as just as much a fatalist as Brother Vox, or any other man. And yet I am not a fatalist in the popular definition given by Theologians, for I hold that man is responsible for his actions; that his good deeds are rewarded and his evil deeds punished. In a word, that for the transgression of law he must suffer himself, and that oceans of Christ's blood can never do him any good. It may be argued that it was fate that he should sin, and fate that he should suffer for his sin; I will not controvert that proposition, but I must insist upon man's responsibility, fate or no fate.

The idea of my being a "believer" is decidedly rich, and yet I will confess that "Vox" is justified in drawing that inference from what I said. But I did not mean it for really I do not believe anything. I have learned to know a few things, and these are matters of knowledge not belief, as that two and two make four; but there are many things that I don't know, and these I neither believe nor disbelieve; for instance the primal cause of the Sun giving light. Some men have their brains packed so loosely into their skulls that they can believe or disbelieve everything in nature. With such, belief stands in the place of knowledge, and they have no occasion to study. I am not of that school.

W. H. CHANEY.

"CATHOLICS IN OFFICE."

ED. COMMON SENSE:—In the last issue of your liberal paper I find an article under the above heading; to which I wish to draw your attention, thinking perhaps that you may, in the hurry of business, have overlooked the inferences that may be logically drawn from some of its statements. Here is a sentence for example: "We make no objection to a man's religious opinions unless they affect his political integrity." I agree with this sentiment, in a measure, but the trouble is how to draw the line between a man's religious and his political obligations. If the Roman Church boldly asserts through its mouthpiece that it is her intention to destroy our Republican form of government, then 'tis our duty, as American citizens, to use all legitimate means to defeat her machinations. If that church simply claims to bide her time until she has the majority of votes to run this government according to her idea, she certainly has a clear right to do so under our organic law, and her efforts to obtain this control find precedent in the repeated efforts of the Evangelical Alliance in the same direction.

If the Alliance can induce the voters of this country to recognize "Jesus Christ as the ruler among nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority," and still be considered good citizens, I can see no impropriety in Romanists attempting to get the "Vicar of Christ" recognized as the direct agent of God Almighty on earth, and to make his decisions on matters pertaining to Faith and Morals irrevocable. If we are to have any authority at all in what is called religious affairs, I am in favor of referring all intricate theological questions to the decision of a real live man, a man educated in our own age, rather than to the so-called "Infallible Bible," an old book written in part over 2000 years ago, (for people whose customs were totally different from ours,) whose teachings, to say the least, are not understood by any two Christian sects in the same manner, and which have been outgrown by the very people for whom they purport to have been written. If we recognize the "revealed will as of supreme authority," we may expect to have the old laws in force, "an eye for an eye," "a tooth for a tooth," "thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," and so on, which, if put in force, will have a tendency to create unpleasantness in some circles not a thousand miles from this city. Should we adopt the proposed Christian amendment to our Constitution, the spirit that instigated the burning of Servetus, the proceedings of the Star Chamber, and other events of that character, about the time of the "Reformation," will be revived, and it will be only a question of time when we may expect a recurrence of such scenes. And you, Mr. Editor, would no doubt be one of the first victims. And yet the very people who are straining every nerve to attach an Amendment to our Constitution giving possibility to this state of affairs, are going on without a word of warning from our public men.

Again, supposing that the Quakers, as a class, should become numerous enough to control this Government, what guarantee can we have for the preservation of our Republican form of Government, seeing that going to war is especially forbidden in their articles of faith? And any foreign power might come and gobble us up at any moment. Again if the Memnonites—another religious body—should become sufficiently strong to control our Government—they do not believe in war—and a like result might follow. So here are three instances where a man's religious opinion may affect his religious integrity. And yet we hear no great outcry; you may say these last two illustrations are "thin," but you must remember that either of these sects have as good a chance, so far as we can determine, for numerical superiority a 100 years hence in this country, as the Romanists had 100 years ago to attain their present strength.

Again you say, "The papist may be in the army and navy etc., carrying out the instructions of his first and real master, while we fondly imagine that he is serving the Republic." Now, according to that method of reasoning, it would seem difficult to account for Victor Emanuel's conquering and holding Rome itself with a Catholic army and navy against the perpetual protest of "their first and real master," the Pope himself. This fact can be accounted for under the old adage, that, "familiarity breeds contempt," the fact of the corrupt Roman court being so near the people of Italy, they are disgusted with its horrible superstitions. If that theory will explain it, then I think we ought immediately to invite the Pope to our shores, that our people and "Christian Statesman," who have not yet emerged from their primitive simplicity and honesty, may be shocked at the monstrous profligacy of the Roman Court, that we may see the "Whore of Babylon" in her bloody garments, and thus save our glorious Republic from disaster; at least from that direction. Of course we would yet have to fight the Evangelical Christian Amendment, and also purge from our own ranks a few of the so called liberals, who in the livery of freedom have no other object than their own selfish ends, and whose words are by no means an indication of their conduct.

Yours in justice, PAT. J. HEALY.

IMPENDING DISTRESS.—Modern society has culminated, as an experiment, and proved an utter failure. Capital is master of the situation and labor has gone to the wall. There is no use disguising the fact that poor defenceless labor lies helpless and bleeding at the feet of its mortal foe, who should have been its natural ally, its elder brother. We do not admit that labor is stricken down beyond redemption, because we feel and know that there is a future for her, filled with all good things, abundance, peace, justice. But she has a struggle before her such as the world has never seen, and she has not yet drank the dregs of oppression, injustice and heart sorrow sufficiently to nerve her on to conquer peace and freedom. Meantime Mercy is pleading for a measure of justice for the helpless, worthy poor; and as modern society has not yet devised more wise, beneficent and practical appliances than fostering pauper houses and gloomy prisons, let those in authority immediately commence the work of enlarging their borders.—The Word.

The man whose moral sense is blunted or undeveloped, will surely draw to him spirits on the same plane, and in his intercourse with them, he will often find his own cherished errors reflected under the guise of established truths. There are no moral elements in such a person that can serve as a bond of union between him and elevated spirits, while other spirits like himself are irresistibly attracted to him, and the union is like welded steel. For such characters, spirit intercourse is hazardous, as it only tends to confirm them in their evil propensities, the results being precisely those that flow from evil companionship with mortals. There is only one course for such persons to follow: it is to at once enter upon a life of reformation, praying for Divine and angelic assistance in their efforts to escape from their moral degradation.

That preacher is most welcome who has some new fresh word to speak. The largest crowd goes with the freest doctrine.

MATERIALIZATION IN TERRE HAUTE, IND.

A reporter for the Terre Haute Union gives an account of several seances held at the rooms of Dr. Dence, in that city, the medium being a Mrs. Stewart. The reporter says: "I examined the cabinet and found it made of one inch plank, without ingress or egress, except through the door. Then I saw the medium, Mrs. Stewart, seated in the cabinet. Then the Doctor seated me so that when the door of the cabinet was opened I could see the medium.

The light was then turned down so as to mellow it, yet have everything distinct in the room, and in the cabinet when the door was open. The Doctor turned on his music box and I anxiously awaited the appearance of my grandfather's ghost. He didn't come, but instead, a "lady in white gently pushed the door of the cabinet open, and stood there a moment. After this many materializations occurred, but all of them dressed in white except three, one woman who wore a black skirt and a white waist, one woman entirely in black, and one boy with black pants. All of these representations were as distinct as one you meet on the street; no dim outline, no shadowy form, but a clearly outlined individual. They stood squarely in the door of the cabinet, some of them advancing one foot upon the floor, while the reporter could distinctly see the medium in her chair. Some of them spoke to their friends and referred to events, names, etc., which were doubtless very gratifying to those who knew something about what was being talked of. "The reporter adds:

From whence comes these materialized forms, these representations of humanity? I took all necessary precautions against deception. I examined all the appurtenances, including room, cabinet, etc., closely. I watched the medium carefully, but still the form would stand there, clear as life, and the medium sit in her chair. They can walk, can act, can speak, independent of the medium.

What are they and where do they come from?"

SECULAR EDUCATION.

Association with non-Catholic children, contact with non-Catholic ideas, and so forth, counteract the influence of the Church to so large an extent, that Catholic children in the second and third generations very frequently become wholly de-catholicized; and the priests know it. Hence the persistent attempts to establish "parochial schools," to divide the public educational funds, to prevent the attendance of Catholic children at the public schools, to secure appropriations from the public treasury on behalf of Catholic schools, and so forth. It is the practical effect of unsectarian education in weaning children from devotion to the Catholic Church, and the consequent check to the Church's growth in numbers, power, and wealth, which lies at the bottom of this increasing hostility to the public school system; and it makes little difference whether the public schools are "godless" or "sectarian," "atheistic" or "Protestant." It is enough that they are not under the control of Catholic ecclesiastics to make the latter implacably opposed to permitting the children under their charge to attend them. They doubtless justify this opposition on the score of solicitude for the eternal welfare of the children, but it takes little penetration to see that they are quite as much concerned for the temporal welfare of the Church.

Unless the whole tendencies of things are reversed, unless non-sectarian education becomes the foster-mother of Catholic sectarianism,—we must expect to see every devotee of the Roman Catholic Church in this country arrayed against our present system of popular education; and the primary cause of this hostility must be found in the fact that our present school system is the chief obstacle in the march of the Church to universal dominion.—Index.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOOUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, JAN. 30, 1875.

J.J. Morse, the English Inspirational speaker, is giving lectures to large audiences in Boston. The Scientist gives extended reports.

THE second number of the Spiritual Magazine, published at Memphis, Tenn., by S. Watson, has been received. It contains many articles of interest, and the work seems to be calculated to do good, as it will reach a class not heretofore supplied with Spiritual literature.

We are informed that the circles at Charter Oak Hall on Tuesday evenings continue to attract large audiences, and that satisfaction is generally given. On Tuesday evening last four mediums were under control, and many tests were given. Another circle will be held in the same place on Tuesday evening next.

Our fellow citizen, James Lick, did a great deal to make Free Thinking respectable in Boston, by his munificent contribution to the Paine Memorial Building, and the "Home of the Boston Investigator." COMMON SENSE has no home, and the memory of Tom Paine is not much respected in San Francisco, but we hope another Lick may yet live to do for San Francisco what our townsman has done for Boston.

The Progressive Spiritualist, of Melbourne, Australia, has been suspended for lack of support, and its editor, Mr. S. Tyerman, a writer of ability and a good speaker, intends in a few months to make a lecturing tour in America. The Spiritualist did a good work in Australia, while it lived, and paved the way for a more successful venture hereafter. The cause, as we learn from a Melbourne correspondent, is steadily progressing there, and it is hoped that ere long the people will see the importance of sustaining a journal of their own. We have received among other publications by Mr. Tyerman, his Guide to Spiritualism, also a pamphlet on Re-Incarnation, etc., which we shall take an early opportunity to notice.

MATERIALIZATION.

The seances of Mrs. Sawyer and Mr. Jones continue to be given, afternoon and evening, at No. 10 Stockton street. The cabinet is in the room with the sitters; the occupants of the house are perfectly reliable, and the manifestations are undoubtedly genuine, yet they are not entirely satisfactory. They do not increase in power, and the health of the medium is perceptibly failing. There is a lack of sunshine, and light airy rooms, so essential to the welfare of sensitive people, like Mrs. Sawyer. Spirit hands are seen perfectly, and occasionally a spirit face, dimly; but skeptics are not satisfied, and many among Spiritualists denounce the mediums as frauds. This condemnation, without giving good reason, is grossly unjust. The matter is worthy of careful investigation, and if the mediums are honest they should be sustained by the sympathy of those who profess to be believers in Spiritualism. The editors of COMMON SENSE attended a seance lately, when the medium was fastened with a pair of patent handcuffs, yet the manifestations were as usual. It is to be regretted that Mrs. Sawyer did not find kind friends and congenial surroundings on her first arrival in the city. Had this been the case, we believe that her health would not have failed, and that the materializations would have greatly increased in power. It should be remembered by investigators that the state of mind of all persons present, as well as other conditions, influence the manifestations, and produce effects which cannot always be overcome by the spirits attempting to materialize. Tennyson well expresses this truth in the following lines:

How pure at heart, and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold,
Should be the man whose thoughts would hold
An hour's communion with the dead.
They haunt the silence of the breast,
Imaginations calm and fair,
The memory like a cloudless star,
The conscience as a sea at rest.
But when the heart is full of din,
And doubt beside the portal wails,
They can but listen at the gates,
And hear the household jar within.

We know of several persons who have recognized spirit friends, at Mrs. Sawyer's seances, beyond a doubt.

Home the medium has won a law suit in London which gives him a large property. He is however in ill health.

Magnificent promises are always to be suspected.

Virtue is the beauty, and vice the deformity of the soul.

Three Judges of the Supreme Court in Maine express the opinion that women may legally serve as Justices of the Peace in that State.

Although the process of making barrels from paper was patented only about six months ago, there are now two factories working, one at Winona, Wis., and the other at Decorah, Iowa, the latter turning out 1600 barrels per day.

Dr. Holland, of St. George's Episcopal church, St. Louis, has created a profound sensation by his progressive sermons. Of course he will soon be "dealt with severely." The Episcopal church will not permit one of its preachers to talk against damnation. Hell and damnation are the two corner stones, they must not be disturbed, or the edifice will fall.

THE LESSON OF THE HOUR.

Public speakers whose work-day falls on Sunday we may divide into two general classes: Firstly, those who dig deep into the virgin soil of thought, incite study and provoke enquiry. Secondly, those who sweep the surface of life and by skillful word-painting appeal strongly to the emotions. The first class is always interesting—the second never dull and often very pleasing. The first sustains itself best before an audience composed largely of thinking, reflecting persons—the last is the more admired by those whose habits of thought are never severe. We need not ask the reader to which class Laura Cuppy Smith belongs. In the first, she is certainly among the best now occupying the reformer's platform. Her discourse last Sunday morning was of a fervid, scholarly type, and was based upon "The Lesson of the Hour"—a subject susceptible of almost limitless expansion as well as treatment, but, as epitomized by the speaker on this occasion, is "to learn to give hospitable recognition to every liberal thought and advanced view." Reformers there are who are faultless in the zeal with which they pursue certain lines of reform upon which they have fastened, but are nervously apprehensive of what they are pleased to consider "side issues," and no bigotry is more incorrigible than the bigotry of a reformer.

In enforcing the Lesson of the Hour, the speaker drew from the history of reformers in past eras, in the light of whose sufferings, the trials and hardships of the present time dwindle to insignificance. She recalled the brave French Girondists who suffered martyrdom and death for their faith's sake, and paid a glowing, tender tribute to that dauntless spirit that echoed the marseillaise, as the little band marched through the streets of Paris—brave voices that could not be hushed till stilled by the knife of the guillotine. "When I think," repeats this earnest speaker, "of the grand attestation of great truths which have been made at the foot of many a cross, many a guillotine and gallows, the little that we have to bear seems unworthy a thought." But, trying times will surely come to us and we must prepare for them. She recalled the memory of Josiah Warren, the great writer and reformer, neglected, scorned, literally starved in a miserable garret in Boston; and said, "to die for truth's sake is noble, but to endure obloquy, neglect and scorn—to meet a living death, like him, in defense of great principles, is grand beyond all accounting."

She alluded to the early anti-slavery reformers, depicted the stern, unyielding manner in which they met danger and threatened death, but had words burdened with regret, that these same great men have taken on the garments of conservatism with age, and have thought the work done. She pointed a brilliant exception, however, to those old patriots, in the person of Lucretia Mott, who was present at the last anniversary of the Free Religious Society, and took her farewell leave of public life. She described the fitting climax to this devoted, consecrated life, there, on the platform which she had worked so hard to consecrate to freedom, when she dropped words of warning against the growing conservatism of professed free-thinkers, and, with her hand on her heart, committed to the young women in her audience this trust: "To the Christ that was never crucified; to the Christ who never died; to the living, free, undying spirit of Truth I commit you all!"

LIBERTY, NOT LICENSE.

The evening lecture hour in Huddy's Hall was devoted to the consideration of that tabooed question, sexual freedom. Mrs. Smith, on this occasion, as on every other in which she approaches this subject, came forward with the bearing of one conscious of holding a great truth, shielded by a fortress impregnable to the assaults of all enemies, but drew, perhaps, a keener blade, with a steadier hand and more earnest spirit, than on any former occasion. She appealed from the sickly, foul condition of Christian society, so-called, to the reason and conscience of the representative reformers before her, for freedom and liberty for woman. She would modify the law so that the mother should have the care and keeping of those jewels for which she had passed down into the valley and shadow of death. She instanced cases in Massachusetts where the possession of her children had been taken from the mother and given to the guardian appointed by her deceased husband, though it was proved she was abundantly able to care for them. She would have society esteem, equally, seducer and seduced. Both should receive the same social recognition. She referred to a circumstance, a public meeting, also in Boston, at which Mrs. Livermore took a reformed woman on to the platform where she was to make her plea for the fallen of her class, but felt it necessary to bespeak for the woman the toleration of the audience. What, she asked, would Mrs. Livermore have said in case a Congressman had been in the reformed woman's place, albeit he might have just emerged from a house of ill fame? It would have been: "Gentlemen and ladies, I have the honor to introduce to you the Hon. Mr. So-and-so."

She appealed for equal liberty for man and woman in all the relations of life. She appealed for free love, that which is elevating, soul sanctifying. Free love is nothing to be afraid of. Free love never works harm to its object; free love subjects self always, seeks only the happiness of its object. This freedom is exemplified in the animal creation, where unnatural alliances never occur. The objectors, the sneerers when this all-important question is raised, are grossly ignorant or grossly perverse; they entirely falsify our position. It is a glaring misconception—the affirmation that she is an advocate of license. Liberty but not license is her demand. She would not be misunderstood on this subject. The liberty she calls for is a divine right, and woman, whose heart loves better purity than corruption, can safely be trusted with this liberty—liberty to follow the promptings of love in her bestowal of favors—freedom from soul prostitution in as well as out of marriage by law.

To the illustration and enforcement of her views the speaker brought forward many telling incidents, and the audience plainly indicated that it both understood her meanings and approved them. She remarked that her hearers if there were any left, will be condemned to listen to her the next two Sundays, but that announcement in no degree lessened the enthusiasm. Mrs. Smith has a warm corner in the hearts of San Francisco reformers.

THOMAS PAINE.

CELEBRATION OF PAINE'S BIRTHDAY IN GRAND CENTRAL HALL.

The Society for Self Culture seems to be composed of such heterogeneous elements, that they could not cordially unite in the celebration of Paine's birthday. An effort was made, which failed, whereupon Mr. Waldron Sheare, lessee of the Grand Central Hall, determined to have the event properly observed by the "Independent Lyceum," which holds its meetings there. Very little preparation was made; in fact, there was no time for prepared speeches. About three hundred persons were present. The following named officers, whose names were presented by a committee appointed for the purpose, were elected by the audience: President, W. N. Slocum; Vice Presidents, T. O. Kimball and Mrs. Dr. A. L. Carr; Secretary, Waldron Sheare. After a brief introductory address by the President, a poem was read by the Secretary, and short speeches were made by various persons, interspersed with instrumental and vocal music by Mrs. Julia Melville, Mrs. Edgar H. Smith and Miss F. Williams. Poems were recited by Mrs. Chaney, Mrs. Carr, and an original poem was read by Mrs. McKinney. The following are sketches of the addresses:

Mr. John Farrell, who left a sick bed to attend the meeting, reminded the audience of some of the most notable services rendered to humanity by Paine during his useful and unselfish life. He regretted that children and young people were not present in greater number, to hear the truth about Thomas Paine, against whom so many are prejudiced in youth. He spoke of Paine as one of the purest of men, one who loved humanity and did good service for the cause of freedom wherever, in England, France and America, his pen and voice appeared to be most required. During the war of the revolution, in "the times that tried men's souls," it was Paine's genius, his dauntless spirit which saved the new nation, and we have, in return, loaded his name with infamy. After the publication of the Age of Reason, the church made a systematic attack not on his writings, but on his personal character, accusing him of dishonesty, drunkenness and other vices. The speaker ably defended the character of Paine, and said that Washington, Jefferson and others believed as he did, but Washington was a policy man, and the people were deceived as to his real sentiments. He never deemed it best to publicly contradict the pious lies told about his going out to pray, etc. Mr. Farrell spoke of the change that is taking place in public sentiment with regard to Paine, and intimated that the next generation would do him justice. In the course of his speech he referred to woman suffrage and other reforms, speaking hopefully of the future.

Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith said the best way we can honor the memory of Paine is by sustaining his principles. His fame is secure; he needs no monument, for he lives in the hearts of all who love liberty and free speech. We must do our part towards bringing about the reign of justice

Paine desired for his fellowmen. Our work will not be done until we have rid this country of superstition and bigotry, liberated the youth from the trammels of the church, and turned the churches into schools of science; have taken down the name of the mendicant of Judea from the place where he has been worshipped as a God, and have dismissed every canting priest from the list of public teachers. Then we must abolish the gallows, liberate woman from her thralldom, secure political and social freedom for all the citizens of the Republic, release the serfs of capital from bondage to capitalists, and practice what Paine preached, the rights of man. When we do all this we shall be worthy of the legacy he left to us.

Prof. Chaney, being called for, spoke, in substance, as follows:

No two men of revolutionary memory did half so much to fire the American heart with an enthusiastic love of liberty as Thomas Paine. He was the very first to suggest Independence, when no one else thought of anything beyond a redress of grievances. His political writings had greater weight upon the public mind than all the speeches made in the Continental Congress, and I feel that I am only doing justice to the illustrious dead when I declare that the pen of Thomas Paine was as potent as the sword of George Washington. He was honored and beloved then, because the generation in which he lived knew him well. But the next generation, led on by a corrupt and hired clergy, have blackened his memory until his name has become the synonym for everything vile. They dared not attack Washington thus, and so they made a saint of him, whereas, if you will read "Jefferson's Notes on Virginia," you will discover that there was but little difference in the religious sentiments of Paine, Washington, Franklin and Jefferson. To Thomas Paine, more than to any one else, are we indebted for our civil and religious liberties. Let us cherish his memory then, and teach posterity that he was the truest friend to humanity that ever trod upon American soil.

Prof. Chaney was followed by Dr. Ruttlely, who spoke of the needs of the present time. The country needs more patriotism, abler and purer statesmen, and the people need instruction as to the laws of life, that the next generation may be better than this.

A collection was taken up for the payment of expenses, and not knowing what to do with the surplus, it was suggested that it be sent to the Marysville sufferers.

Mr. Hopkins said Marysville did not now need the little help that would afford, and Mr. Stetson proposed that it be given for the benefit of COMMON SENSE, the only paper on this coast which sustains the principles Paine advocated—the only one in which Infidels and Free-Thinkers can obtain a hearing. The motion was unanimously adopted, and the surplus, $11.25, was paid to the editor of COMMON SENSE.

H. Wenzel, the President of the German Society of Free Thinkers, stated that his society prints a monthly paper in the German language, and has done so for eighteen years. He did not give its name. He said it is sustained by the voluntary contributions of the society. He regretted that any paper for the promulgation of free thought is in need of any help. It should be supported; there can be no real progress in liberal ideas until a journal for the dissemination of such ideas is firmly established. He could not see why it is that people who have common sense do not subscribe for COMMON SENSE, and assist in spreading common sense views of religion. The German Infidels not only have a paper, but they have a Hall, and will soon have a Temple of Reason, on O'Farrel street, and he hoped Americans would take pattern after them, and build up a free press and a free platform for the expression of their free thought. [We hope so too.]

When the afternoon was far spent, Mr. Knight made his appearance in the hall, and was immediately called to the platform. He said it was not much in harmony with his nature to eulogize any man to the extent of adulation or hero worship. The time has passed for that. God is no longer in the figure of a man, nor do we any more elevate a man to the dignity of God. But if there was any man in whose praise he felt like being extravagant, it was this much slandered and persecuted Thomas Paine. We have not space for Mr. Knight's remarks. He spoke mainly of the growth of the church from poverty and simplicity to wealth and display. He said Paine did not really tell anything new. He but put in plain English what had before been printed in Latin. The educated men of Europe were even at that time disbelievers in the Christian religion. Even the priests laughed in private at the dogmas they upheld in public. They desired, however, to hoodwink the common people, in order to govern them, and in this they were joined by the nobility of monarchies and the wealthy and aristocratic everywhere. Mr. Knight closed as follows :

Tom Paine awoke the common people from their delusion. He told them in plain terms what were their rights. He dethroned the king here in America. He deposed the priest. He told the people that God is the common Father of all. He exposed their lies and false pretenses, their sacred books, their absurd dogmas, their senseless but costly mummeries, and raised the masses to the true dignity of thinking beings. And they hated him, and lied about him, and persecuted him, just as the Egyptians did Moses, just as the Jewish people did Christ. They would have put him to death if they dared. They have written against him, and slandered and denounced him as the enemy of God and man. But they have never answered his book, and they never can.

The American people have never done justice to his memory, either as a politician or a philosopher. Ages perhaps will elapse before his great merit will ever be fully acknowledged. He will never be worshipped as a God, or as anything but a man, because his followers are not given to idolatry. But the time will come when neither Moses nor Christ will stand out in brighter colors on the great page of human history than this Thomas Paine. His memory will be dear forever to all the lovers of mental emancipation. I rejoice in the opportunity of paying this slight tribute to his memory.

Mr. Waldron Sheare, whose energy secured the success of the meeting, had prepared a brief address, but generously gave way to others until it was too late for delivery. The meeting was in every respect a success.

EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

ED. COMMON SENSE :—Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith is to lecture next Sunday afternoon upon the duties of parents to their children in connection with their religious instruction, and as one who was once a boy himself, and has had some considerable experience as a teacher, allow me to urge your Spiritualist readers to come out on this occasion, and hear what suggestions the speaker has to make. The subject is certainly one of most vital importance. Those Christian sects who are most earnest in the inculcation of religious belief, place high value on the first ten years of life. So important is this formation period in the Mother Church, that if it can have the moulding of character in this season, it is comparatively indifferent as to what after influences may be brought to bear upon the individual. The song is a powerful instrumentality in the implanting of religious faith. One philosopher esteemed it so highly that he was led to declare, that if he could have the making of the songs of a people he cared not who made their laws. Spiritualists, it seems to me, are sometimes unpardonably stupid on this subject. Let me urge them to acquaint themselves with the sentiment of the hymns which the Revivalist Hammond will put into the mouths of our Sunday school children here in a few weeks. Doing so may, perhaps, open their eyes to the objections against those pleasant nurseries of the affectional, the emotional and marvelous in our nature—the Sunday school. The Spiritual Lyceum is the best school yet devised for children. Why don't all Spiritualists lead their children into the Lyceum?
A SPIRITUALIST.

LETTER FROM SAN BUENA VENTURA.

DEAR "COMMON SENSE" :—Thinking your readers would be pleased to hear of the advancement of the cause of free-thought in our town, I write of what we have had done for us recently. Immediately after the holidays, and when this place had suffered an earthquake of excitements, and was having quite an attempt at a religious revival, Dr. York came here to give a course of free lectures to the Liberals. He addressed an audience which was respectable, in numbers and individual for eleven nights, holding them more quite than you often see a crowd held, for from one hour to two hours and a quarter each night. He was listened to with interest, and much pleasure by more than a hundred regular attendants. Those who have heard the Doctor know with what force he speaks. To those who have not had that pleasure, I would say, when opportunity offers, go and hear him; not once, but listen to every lecture, and then you can judge of the speaker, and of the truth he advances. He does not say you must believe everything he says, but think for yourselves. Those were the first lectures of the kind ever given in this part of the country, and of course they created much excitement among that class of people who tremble at all thought having the garb of liberality, and think freedom of thought means freedom in committing all the crimes on the docket.

Yours Truly,

A LIBERAL.

San Buena Ventura Jan. 24.

Dr. Holmes says, there never was an instance of infant piety that was not a clearly marked case of scrofulous diathesis.

A man incarcerated in the Tombs at New York figured in chalk on the walls of his cell. It reads thus : "In New York city the spires of three hundred and forty-two churches worth $41,120,000, point heavenwards. I am here for stealing a loaf of bread for my starving child."

THE PLAN OF SALVATION.

We find in that liberal journal the San Jose Mercury, a synopsis of a lecture by Dr. Deane Clarke, from which we extract, as follows :

The speaker said that Evangelical Theology assumes that an infinitely wise God, whose foreknowledge comprehended all that was to be, made man as His crowning work, and pronounced him "good;" but finding that he yielded to a temptation, which was intended to snare (as God must have known it would when He made them both), Infinite Wisdom, "with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning," found that He was mistaken in the character of his work, and "It repented the Lord that He had made man upon the earth, and it grieved Him at His heart!"

Infinite Goodness then pronounced a curse on His "noblest work," which damned all his posterity, since—

"In Adam's fall
We sinned all—"

And subjected the whole human race to the pains of eternal wrath, for a crime (?) in which they had no complicity, except by inherited "total depravity!" Infinite Wisdom then tried various expedients to control His wicked children and correct their evil habits; but after 1,656 years of probation, finding that their "totally depraved" natures grew worse and worse, He resorted to a general baptism and destroyed all but "righteous Noah" and his family, whom he preserved for a second experiment. Having made an everlasting covenant with Noah not to destroy his descendants, and set the rainbow in the clouds that he might not forget it (though science assigns another cause for it), God renews his experiment at peopling the earth with a race to serve His infinitely wise and immutable purpose. But they soon became as before, thwarting all the efforts of Omnipotence to control them; ever and anon causing the wrath of the offended Jehovah to wax hot against them till He would cause whole nations to be butchered; when at last, after 2,348 years of sufferance, Infinite Patience became weary of purposing and repenting of evil against them, and resolved upon the great scheme of salvation, whereby His anger could be placated and justice toward His hell-deserving children might be averted!

The basis of the Christian "plan of salvation" then is the assumption that man, though created by an all-wise and all-mighty God "in his own image," became, through Adam's eating an apple, totally corrupt, and subject to eternal damnation, by a perfectly just and merciful Creator, who gave him an appetite for apples, put the fruit before him, and made a beautiful woman and a serpent to induce him to eat it! By committing this enormous offense a Divine Law was broken, which infinite man cannot atone for, nor can a just God pardon the offense without full expiation. To meet this dilemma a third part of the God-head, which is called the Holy Ghost, and was evidently the part possessing the attributes of Love and Mercy, visited an earthly maiden and begot a being, who proved to be the Second Person in the Trinity, who volunteered afterwards to pay the penalty of Adam's transgression by his death, "suffering the just for the unjust," and with his blood appeasing the wrath of the First Person in the Trinity; and thus, Evangelical Theology declares, an atonement was made for the sins of the whole world, whereby all can be saved from the torments of hell who accept it and "come to Jesus."

But let us examine it a little more thoroughly before accepting it. Jesus was "the very God," "God made manifest in the flesh," who suffered in our stead, affirms Theology. But did his whole nature suffer? "Only his humanity," is the answer. How then is it an infinite atonement? God cannot pardon an infinite offense without an adequate atonement; but to meet this dilemma, "The incarnation of the Holy Ghost imparted a peculiar sanctity to the humanity of Jesus so that God could accept it," replies Theology. Then the case stands thus: Man owes an infinite debt, but as he has only a finite exchequer, he cannot pay it. "The only begotten Son of God" volunteers as an attorney, or arbiter, and the Holy Ghost imparts or loans to him the sum required, and he pays it in man's behalf to his Heavenly Father, who cancels the debt, and gives a receipt in full of all demands against humanity, and thus we have the grand farce of God's giving to Jesus the amount that He exacts of mankind, then Jesus gives it back to God who is then ready to pardon all his debtors! Such is the grand bankruptcy scheme known as "The Vicarious Atonement." If this is not absurdity seated supreme on its own throne, where but in heathen mythology can we find it? Notwithstanding we are told that Christ atoned for the sins of the whole world, yet the race is still born depraved, and the curse upon "original sin" still rests upon us, and salvation is rendered possible only by accepting a scheme which outrages reason, justice and the revelations of science! We reject this tissue of sophistries and absurdities as a relic of Paganism, which instituted as scape goats, sacrifices and blood atonements to appease the wrath of revengeful and bloodthirsty deities. We do not believe that Divine justice can be bought off, nor that the suffering of the innocent for the guilty is consistent with the divine economy manifest in cause and effect.

Geology has proved, by irrefutable evidence, that the Mosaic cosmogony is entirely fallacious, that the human race is a hundred times older than Adam, and, therefore, that it never "fell through his transgression," and hence the entire foundation of this heathenish doctrine of the origin of sin, and its counterpart of a blood atonement through the death of a God, or a third part of Him, crumbles to fragments of a mythologic superstition, which science and common-sense utterly repudiate.

The evidences of geology, as well as remotest history, prove that primitive man was a savage, and that he has slowly progressed to his present state through natural tendencies to improvement and goodness. He makes his own hell by acting counter to the laws of his being, which continues till he "ceases to do evil and learns to do well," and he is saved from it by Knowledge and Obedience, and not by all the blood ever shed by idolatry and superstition! Jesus, as a divinely inspired teacher, does, indeed, save from sin, and the suffering which is the inevitable consequence of it, all such as through his beautiful teachings and self sacrificing example are led to subject their animal propensities to their intellectual and spiritual faculties, and to live in perfect obedience to all of the divinely ordained laws written in man's physical, mental and spiritual organization, and he never taught any other mode of salvation.

★ There are seventy-two Communistic Societies, of which fifty-eight are Shakers, seven are Amanists, and two are Perfectionists; the Rappists, the Zoarites, the Icarians, those at Bethel and Aurora have each but one. The oldest is eighty years old, and the youngest twenty-two. They collectively contain about 5,000 persons, and are located in thirteen States and own about 180,000 acres of land, which if divided would give each Communist a farm of thirty-six acres. Their property amounts at the lowest estimate to $12,000,000 which would give each Communist $2,400. In almost every instance these societies began in poverty.

PHYSIOLOGY IN EDUCATION.

No where else in society is a radical reform needed more than in our educational system. Inasmuch as the laws of the body lie at the foundation of all proper culture, they should receive the first consideration. But in educating the boy or girl, from the age of five to fifteen, how little attention is given to the growth and physical changes which necessarily occur at this most important period of life! The age of the child should be considered; the place of schooling, the hours of confinement and recreation, the number and kinds of studies, together with the modes of teaching, should all harmonize with physical laws—especially those of the brain. The system or mode of treating, in education, all children, as though their organizations were precisely alike, is based upon a false and unnatural theory. Great injury, in a variety of ways, results from this wrong treatment; in fact injuries are thus inflicted upon the sensitive organizations and susceptible minds of young children, from which they never recover. When our educators become thoroughly convinced that physical development as a part of education is an absolute necessity—that a strict observance of the laws of physiology and hygiene is indispensable to the highest mental culture, then we shall have vital and radical changes in our educational system; then the brain will not be cultivated so much at the expense of the body, neither will the nervous temperament be so unduly developed in proportion to the other parts of the system, now so often bringing on a train of neuralgic diseases which can not easily be cured, and exposing the individual to the keenest and most intense suffering which all the advantages of mental culture fail, not unfrequently, to compensate. The more this whole subject is investigated, the more reason we shall find for making allowance or some distinction in scholastic discipline with reference to the difference in organization of children, and for adapting the hours of confinement and recreation, the ventilation and temperature of schoolrooms, the number and kinds of studies, and modes of teaching to the laws of the physical system.—Dr. Nathan Allen.

A BARGAIN WITH THE LORD:—A devoted catholic and his wife in Belgium, vowed that if they should be blessed with a son, he should fight for the Pope. Their wish was gratified, but it then occurred to them that the Pope must, in the natural course of events, die before the boy became old enough to become a Papal Zouave. The mother was so distressed by the reflection that she proposed to offer the life of the boy to God on condition that the life of the Pope should be prolonged. She comforted herself by saying that her son would be a Zouave in heaven. Her husband agreeing with her, they went to the church to pray for the fulfilment of their wish. When they came back they found that it had been granted, for the child was dead. An Ultramontane journal asks, "Do you know in the whole range of history a nobler trait than this?"

When Democritus, the Greek philosopher then nearly one hundred years old, was asked how he wished to be buried, he replied: "Let that not concern you; the smell will bury the body." "But would you," objected his friends, "serve as food to dogs and birds?" "And why not," he replied; "I have endeavored to be useful to man during my life, and why should I not after death, give something to the beasts?" Our modern society does not share these views. To barricade their miserable corpses with flagstones, or to be shut up in family vaults, some with rings on their fingers, appears to them more dignified than to render to nature what they have received from it, and what in due time, they must return to it.—Buchner.

BEECHNUTS.

Geo. Francis Train says of the Beecher Tilton case, "How strange, the men pronounce the man innocent, and the women pronounce the woman guilty!"

Millions of people in the United States and Europe are anxiously waiting to ascertain if Beecher is as worthy as David was to be called "a man after God's own heart." But they will be disappointed, for the jury will not agree.

The greatest sneak of modern times is that fellow Bowen, the Christian proprietor of the Independent, who goes to Europe to avoid testifying in the Beecher case. Would he be such a sneak, if he had no damaging secret to reveal? Does he not know something which will not bear the light?

Kinsella, editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, the fast friend and defender of Beecher, was recently found guilty of the seduction of a friend's wife, and had a verdict of $15,000 entered against him for damages. Of course he sympathizes with Beecher. It would be strange if he did not. "Birds of a feather," etc.

One of the queerest features of that queer trial, Tilton versus Beecher, is the admission to the court room of the friends of the accused by special card, while the people of this "free country" are denied entrance. Of course all cannot attend, but why not say, "First come, first served?" That would be democratic—but, what's the use in talking? we do not live in a real Republic—it's a sham, a mere pretence.

Geo. Francis Train says four thousand years of blood, crime, concubinage and drunkenness under the Mosaic dispensation, and two thousand more of fraud, adultery, prostitution and hypocrisy under Christ, are all on equal in the Beecher-Tilton case, and that the odds are too heavy for Theodore. The money, too, is all against Tilton—Plymouth church and its rented pews, Norwood, the Life of Christ, the Christian Union, etc., etc. What show is there for justice?

The Beecher trial is still progressing. Tilton, on the witness stand, told a straight-forward story of Beecher's guilt, of the wreck of his own happiness, his wife's misery, and Beecher's remorse, during the recital of which, Mr. and Mrs. Beecher sat with smiling countenances—Mrs. B. apparently the most pleased of the two. What there can be in such a story to smile at, whether true or false, it is not safe for one outside of the Beecher circle to divine. Having sat so long on the "ragged edge," perhaps it is a relief to know that the end is near.

SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS IN SAN DIEGO.

The San Jose Mercury publishes a letter from San Diego giving an account of "Strange Doings," believed to be spiritual manifestations, which occurred recently at the house of Mrs. Ranney. Mrs. R., her daughter, and two other ladies were conversing on the "Week of Prayer" when the door of the room was suddenly lifted from its hinges by some unseen agency, and carried four or five feet, where it was very carefully placed against a dish cupboard.

The water was then turned on at the sink, and in a few moments turned off again, after the water had splashed in the sink. No person stood near the sink at the time.

None of the ladies are Spiritualists, and two of them are members of an orthodox church. While they were talking about the strange occurrences, a noise was heard at the outer door like that of branches swept against the door by the wind. There was no wind at the time, and no tree in the vicinity of the house. One of the ladies suggested that the noise might be caused by the spirits, when it was repeated, as if to affirm the supposition. The mystery remains unexplained.

TRUTH LIVES ON.

Through the rugged march of time,
Marked with misery, sin and crime,
Error stalks with upreared head,
O'er her fields of slaughtered dead,
But beneath her bloody tread
The Truth lives on.

Warriors strong and brave of yore,
Drenched Judas's plains in gore,
And the land with war was rife,
For his tomb who hated strife
In the teachings of whose life,
The Truth lives on.

Progress rolls her car along,
Slowly righting human wrong;
Might the right may crucify,
Nothing can her power defy,
Though Harold live and Jesus die,
The Truth lives on.

Burning faggots blazing high,
Gibbets tow'ring to the sky,
Inquisitions rack and pain,
Slavery clanking loud its chain,
Falsehood triumphs still in vain,
The Truth lives on.

Underneath this load of wrong
Truth eternal moves along;
Every true heart's mighty throes
Rolls away some human woe,
Error reels beneath the blow,
And Truth lives on.

Fountains of the deep are stirred,
Mighty thoughts unbreathed in word,
Till the living Future's soul,
Bursting forth will spurn control;
Shouts of freedom heavenward roll,
And Truth lives on.

Every blow at slavery's yoke,
Every true word boldly spoke;
Every holy thought within,
Breaks and curbs the power of sin;
Freedom's dawn is ushered in,
And Truth lives on.

UNDER THE CLOUD.

BY CHARLES G. AMES.

O beautiful things of earth!
I cannot feel your worth
To-day.

O kind and constant friend!
Our spirits cannot blend
To-day.

O Lord of truth and grace!
I cannot see Thy face
To-day.

A shadow on my heart
Keeps me from all apart
To-day.

Yet something in me knows
How fair creation glows
To-day.

And something makes me sure
That love is not less pure
To-day.

And that th' Eternal Good
Minds nothing of my mood
To-day.

Fed from a hidden bowl,
A lamp burns in my soul
All days.

—The youthful male
"Has no more subtle master under Heaven
Than is the maiden passion for a maid;
Not only to keep down the base in him,
But teach high thought and amiable words,
And courtliness and the desire of fame,
And love of truth, and all that makes a man."

Nor heed what's said along the route,
By Doubt and Fear. Hold fast the hand
Of Faith, for guide: thy journey o'er
Thou shalt be owner of the land;
The heavens and earth with joy will speed
To servants be of thy command.

I love my God with all my life and soul;
I see his image mirrored on the lake,
In mountain waves that o'er old Ocean roll,
The broad expanse of shore whereon they break;
Of yon round flaming Sun, he is the goal;
Alone with him all evil thoughts forsake—
Far back I gaze across the wilds of Time,
Beholding him grand, fathomless, sublime!

IS IT WORTH WHILE.

Is it worth while to jostle a brother—
Bearing his load on the rough road of life?
Is it worth while that we jeer at each other
In blackness of heart?—that we war to the knife?
God pity us all in our pitiful strife.

God pity us all, we jostle each other;
God pardon us all for the triumph we feel
When a fellow goes down 'neath his load on the heather,
Pierced to the heart; words are keener than steel,
And mightier for woe or weal.

Were it not well in this brief little journey
On over the isthmus, down into the tide,
We give him a fish instead of a serpent,
Ere folding the hands to be and abide
Forever and aye in dust at his side!

Look at the roses saluting each other;
Look at the herds all in peace on the plain;
Man and man only makes war on his brother
And laughs in his heart at his peril and pain;
Shamed by the beasts that go down on the plain.

Is it worth while that we battle to humble
Some poor fellow soldier down into the dust?
God pity us all! Time oft soon will tumble
All of us together, like leaves in a gust,
Humbled indeed down into the dust.—JOAQUIN MILLER.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON JULIANO

THE STUDY.

FAUST AND MEPHISTOPHELES.

FAUST—Say how must we begin
MEPHISTO.—Get out of this!

What den of torture is this edifice!
And what a life to lead, by God,
Ennui to you and grief to each poor lad,
Leave that I pray, to your good neighbor Guts;
Why should you plague yourself the straw to thresh?
The tit bits wisdom in your noddle puts
You know you dare not to these youngsters teach,
I hear one now upon the stairs.

FAUST—It's quite impossible for me to see him!
MEPHISTO.—Yet you can't altogether flee him;

The poor boy's waited long, will ease his cares.
Give me your gown and trencher if you please,—
This masquerade will suit me charmingly.
Now leave him to my cunning; be at ease,
A good ten minutes time is all I'll need,—
Meanwhile get ready for your trip with speed.

Exit—Faust.

MEPHISTO. (alone)—Only despise knowledge and reason both,
Man's chiefest strength, and be you nothing loth
To give place to the magic shows that rise
Within your brain, spawned by the sire of lies.
And I must get you without bond at all;
For Fate hath given this man a spirit such
As ever will stretch forward to some goal,
And whose o'er hasty, uncurbed rush
O'erleaps the joys of earth. This man I shall Drag thro' the wildest scenes of life;
Thro' life's dull trifles shall he crawl,
Struggle and stare bewildered, buried in strife,
Whilst food and drink to ease his ravening quest
Shall ever see his eager grasping lips,
Vainly repose he'll beg from deep unrest,
And had he never sold his soul to Satan
Still from his gridiron he'd ne'er save his bacon.

[A Scholar steps in.]

SCHOLAR—A short time only I've been here,
And now I come in pious fear,
To see and know a man whom all
Call reverend and remarkable.

MEPHISTO.—Your courtesy is great, my brother,
You see a man like any other.

SCHOLAR—You've looked about you ere you settle?
I pray you take me up a little,
I come here on my own sole merits,
With gold enough, and glorious spirits;
My mother was loth to let me travel,
I wished life's secrets to unravel.

MEPHISTO.—You could not have hit on a better spot then.

SCHOLAR—Indeed! I should like to be off again.
Within these walls, in your bare Hall,
It doth not please me, not at all.
'Tis such a narrow cramped up space,
One sees no green tree in the place,
And on your lecture room's hard benches
Thought, hearing, sight are drowned in stomachs.

MEPHISTO.—Depends on habit, my dear sir.

[We omit here a portion of Mephistopheles' advice to the scholar.—Ed.]

SCHOLAR—I feel as stupid after all you've said,
As if a mill wheel whirled 'round in my head.

MEPHISTO.—This done, you must, first—listen pray—
With metaphysics make yourself an fait;
See to't that you conceive with anxious thought
Mind qualities of which man's brain knows naught,
Each trait that does, and trait that does not,
Hath some fine word that you may buzz on't;
But first of all, thro' all the session,
See that you make no one digression.
You'll have five lectures every day.
Be punctual to the minute, pray.
But see that first you have prepared
The day lesson, word by word,
Then to the lecturer's every sentence look
To see he says nought but what's in the book.
Yet in your note book write each sentence straight in,
As were the Holy Ghost himself dictating.

SCHOLAR—You need not say that to me twice.
I can conceive how useful it must be;
What I've in black and white, 'twill be so nice
Contentedly to carry home with me.

Signs of the Times.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Baltimore sells dinner tickets for five cents each. Arrangements are made with cheap restaurants.

A horse worth five dollars for hide and tallow is worth in Paris $25 for food. Old horses are fattened on ground feed, and the flesh more than pays the cost.

The Coroner, and Assessor of San Francisco have been removed from office by the Courts, for neglect of duty, to put it mildly; and several deputies in the Assessor's office, go to State Prison on conviction of forgery. A good sign.

Muybridge, who killed Harry Larkyns has been acquitted, and another California jury has decided that a man may murder with impunity the seducer of his wife, or even one who is seduced by his wife. The idea seems to be that when a woman becomes a wife she ceases to be an individual, and becomes the property of her husband.

Thomas Scott, the Railroad Magnate, has a scheme for securing the transportation across the American Continent of merchandize between Asia and Europe. It is calculated that from the port of Canton, in China, to Liverpool the distance by way of San Diego, Cal., and Hilton Head, S. O., is 2,700 miles shorter than by way of San Francisco, Chicago and New York. Of course Scott wants a subsidy.

The Young Men's Christian Association of New York has a restaurant of its own, where meals are furnished to poor young men at cost, and during the last year 62,000 meals were given away. This is practical charity. True, the social system which requires such make-shifts is not the best we could have, but while we have it, let us acknowledge all that helps to ameliorate the evils that seem inseparable from it.

Mrs. Stanton calls attention to the fact that while several wealthy women have given largely in aid of Theological institutions and schools for young men, not one has contributed a dollar to aid the Vassar College for Women, nor for any other institution where women are accorded equal rights. She gives a list of donations to Colleges by women, amounting to over $645,000, while it yet remains for a woman to give the first $1000 in aid of Vassar or Cornell, or for the establishment of a journal to advocate justice and equality for woman.

While Catholicism, during the last two hundred years, has been intriguing with crowned heads, and making alliances with nobles and aristocrats, many of its poor followers have drifted off among the Infidels, the Spiritualists, Materialists and Communists, and now that the Church is at outs with the kings and governing classes, it has to determine upon a new line of policy. Will it become, as it formerly professed to be, the friend of the poor man? Will it join hands with labor in its struggle with capital? Will it, in short, become revitalized by taking on the spirit of the 19th century? If so, it can wield a power in the world, for years to come, unapproachable by that of any other organization religious or political.

Why should women do anything to make the Centennial Celebration a success while those of their own sex are denied equal rights with men under the Government?

Some people are afraid to grant divorces to uncongenial married couples, lest there should be no more deformed and demented children born, to fill our jails, madhouses and hospitals.

The office holders, not the people, procured the renomination of Grant for his second term. The constitution should be so amended that no man can be eligible to the Presidency for a second term.

Fred Douglas asserts that three thousand colored men have been murdered during the last year in a single State, and that a sentiment is abroad in the South that it is no worse to shoot a negro than to kill a wild beast.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton says that as the rights of self government underlie all duties to the state, the church and the home, therefore women should make woman suffrage the first and main work until it is secured.

The Chronicle reporter, who ridicules Free Thought meetings, and burlesques the Society for Self Culture, has found a congenial subject for notice in the birth of a monkey at Woodward's Gardens. The fact is suggestive.

If Congress refuses to renew sewing machine patents, as it probably will, the price of sewing machines will fall from one half to two thirds, within the next two years. The actual cost of an ordinary machine is only eight to twelve dollars.

When the "Independent" party makes its nominations for the Legislature, we trust the names of lawyers will be omitted or if not that the people will repudiate them. It is a wrong idea that lawyers should be deputed to make our laws, and it is owing to this mistake that so many abuses have been perpetuated in our codes.

The outcry of orthodoxy has compelled the New York postmaster to rescind his order for the delivery of the mails on Sunday. The Liberals have the majority; but the Sabbatarians have the power, because they are organized. Before long a general howl will go up for the amendment of the Constitution, so as to make this a nominally Christian Country, and we look to see the same apathy on the part of the "Liberals" that now characterizes them. When the country is in the coils of this serpent called Christianity, then people will begin to squirm.

Instead of levying taxes on the surplus property of the rich for the payment of Government expenses, Congress contrives the expensive machinery of Custom Houses. True, the imports most highly taxed are articles of luxury, but the whole system is wrong, and every year or two the rates are changed, so as to favor rich importers who either have a supply on hand, which they wish to sell at high prices, or they want to import a supply at low prices. They control Congress, and the consumers of imported articles pay the losses. It is now proposed to put a high impost on tea and coffee—the luxuries of the poor, and it so happens that certain large importers have storehouses full ready for the rise.

STAND UP AND BE MEN.

BY A. GAYLORD SPAULDING.

"Come my brethren let us try,
For a little season,
Every burden to lay by,
Come and let us reason."

I am talking to workingmen—that vast army of unwashed and unkempt democracy—the real producers of potatoes and things. Some call you leatherheads; that is, thick to understand. So you are continually duped by the thin-skulled deadheads. You occupy the unpainted shanties, log cabins, and dirt hovels of creation. There you roost at night, and eat your plain, cheap daily grub, and then march forth like a chain-gang to exercise your bones, muscles and nerves, to make the proud non-producers shine in grandeur and opulence, who become your Congressmen and legislators, your monopolists and extortionists, your lawyers, doctors and ministers. They get your votes, and expect always to get them, and thus keep themselves at the very top of the revolving wheel of fortune.

O, workingmen! How often would I have gathered you as the hen gathereth her chickens under her sheltering wings, but you would not. You will suffer outside in the cold and storms, because you refuse to co-operate. But go to the great World Exhibition of Industry, and behold, in the grand gallery and show-case of art, invention, genius, and labor, all that imagination ever conceived to bless, beautify and dignify humanity. It is all the work of your own rough and bony hands. The palaces of kings and the temples of archbishops and high priests are all of your own faithful and patient construction. But you do not delve and sweat, drive and contrive, manage, strive and save for yourselves. It is for somebody else. You let them rob you. That is the trouble with workingmen. Their labor fills the nations with good things, and yet they themselves go ragged, houseless, ignorant and hungry.

We scold about railroad extortion, and very justly, for it is wicked and abominable, and makes us feel that every railroad man is a thief and a scoundrel; for it crushes down the farmers and toilers, and intensifies the hard times all around. But what remedy have we? Is not all business and all trade one grand universal system of monopoly and extortion? Without competitors, every man grabs, clutches, and monopolizes all he can get. So that the rule of all society now is, every man for himself and the devil take the hind one. That is it, and it accounts fully for all the mischief and misery, no matter how rich the earth may be, or how full of money and honey, beauty and plenty. The workingman must be kept in poverty and go on foot.

We see then at once, that although we claim to be brothers and sisters, and talk of equal rights, yet the people need checks and balances all through, to prevent one man from eating up another. And as to the railroads, competition may rein them in, at least for a while; but there must be a balance of power in the shape of a ship canal, and river or ocean transportation. That will be an expensive flank movement, somewhat after the plan of the Kilkenny cats, or that employed in the military art. But necessity justifies such expedients.

Then, again, as to other every-day disadvantages of workingmen around home, I think of no cure but the sharp, spunky and free newspaper. You must read and think, and write more, and learn to stand up and be men. All power is in your own hands, if you only knew it. Intelligence brings independence. Throw law and physic to the dogs, and don't build so many steepled poorhouses. Moreover, you must own up to some expensive vices, like smoking and chewing tobacco, and drinking whisky and lager. There's where the money goes—pop goes the weasel.

Teach your boys good trades or farming, and encourage them less in speculation and fast living. A smart young man better become a blacksmith than a doctor of divinity, because the one produces, while the other merely eats and wastes. Doctor of Divinity! Does Divinity need doctoring? Or will the D.D. title pass current in the gateway of heaven? Dear good friends think of these things and debate them in your Lyceums.

The more intelligent one is, the better he understands how to doctor himself in medicine, theology or law. That saves money. Industrious habits are good for health, morals and good manners. Such qualities are a great help, and a man may be his own sheriff, and do his own preaching and pleading. A workingman with such advantages may own a nice dwelling house, have a loving wife and sweet baby, keep a horse and carriage, and be free from debt. Those men are to be pitied who are so often involved in law-suits, or who get scared and send to a city for a famous physician, or who fancy it is needful to be always at church to get their souls blessed. Thinking minds feed their own brains and save the fees and the begging.

It pays to study social science, and thereby improve our condition. Look over your State and find a contrast of towns and society. I may refer you to specimens in Minnesota. Take, for instance, the rural and sylvan town of Hassan on Crow River, with over five hundred inhabitants of the farming and working class. They are a driving and thriving sort, and favored with a tri-weekly mail, and books and schools, and some of the most advanced pupils in Hennepin county. As a town, they are progressive and prosperous, and out of debt. But the marked feature of the town is, that no doctor, lawyer, or minister, is settled in it—not one. Yet a more healthy, orderly and happy community may not be found. A strange fact.

Now for the contrast: A city, not far distant, with a population of twenty-five or thirty thousand has twenty-five churches of all stripes of creed, the operation of which can scarcely cost less than a hundred thousand dollars a year. Clergymen, attorneys and physicians abound by the wholesale. It is a fine city—a State capital. Aristocracy swells, and grandees trot round big. City debt large, and taxes and rents most terrible. No workingman can easily own a house, or get ahead much in a life time, by fair means. He must turn politician or speculator. There are good schools, but tenfold more liquor saloons, brothels and gambling hells. Her newspapers are proud, shiny, and sometimes saucy, but not so much noted for manly free speech, reform and moral principle. So also with the ministers and people. Their lazy, sleepy Sunday religion consists of mummary, flummery, jumbletry and gumpery, mixing wealth, poverty, fashion, show, learning, ignorance and dirt, like chips and porridge. Her police court, city prison, and reports of crime are constant and prominent things. Here are the grand homes of political thieves and salary grabbers.

Now, brother workingmen, which will you choose, such a city with her splendid churches, ministers, doctors, lawyers, and costly and crushing aristocracy, or a quiet town like Hassan, free from any such dead burden?

Four fifths of the people of a fashionable city may be of the working class; but they lack unity and combined strength, and wealth is their master. We must therefore come into the country, among country people and country newspapers—papers not like night-thought city journals, by tobacco-smoked editors, but more heroic. Here is broader scope and freer breath, and men can stand up and not crowd.

The shackles fall—
The chains that gall;
And all are free,
O'er land and sea.

To the people all things belong—lands, lakes, rivers, ship canals, railroads, steamboats, telegraphs, congresses and legislatures—because this is the people's country. Then, by co-operation, we can send all monopolists and extortionists a kiting. We do it by pen and press and the ballot box. Politics and religion belong to the common people—the workingmen—and common sense is the top and bottom—a broad and deep foundation. It is cleared of the rubbish and costs of fashion, profession and aristocracy.

We elect brother and sister Slocum our able standard bearers, and whether in Congress, the Legislature, the Sanctum, the Grange, the Industrial Brotherhood Lodge, or at the Polls, they are unbought and unsold with the flag of freedom waving over their heads. The noble Common Sense is their staff and their Bible—fearless, hopeful, aggressive and progressive, which, like a torchlight procession in a cloudy night, glares, and glitters, and glimmers, and shimmers with sunny thought-beams through the city and State, causing the workingmen, women and children to laugh and sing, and dance and shout, vive la Common Sense, and Labor Reform, and Woman Suffrage.

In the Newspaper Pulpit I preach my sermons of common sense. My meeting-house is out-doors and sky-roofed, with sun, moon and stars for chandeliers. Oh, how new and strange to call this preaching! Yet some say it beats all the Sunday sermons in the whole country for pith, point, vim and practical sense. Wonder if there are any converts? Do the people want any more? If so, signify it by rising. Brother Usher, please pass round the paper and see what salary you can raise.

Champlin, Minn., February, 1875.

Are there any Christians? Those who call themselves Christians are not Christ-like; and those who are most Christ-like refuse to be called Christians. The time is evidently coming when we can say good-by both to the idea of "Christ" and to the name "Christian."—A. W. S. in the Index.

If Jesus belongs to anybody, he belongs to the deepest-dyed radicals of this and every age! They understand and appreciate him better than Christians do or can. But they can accept him only as a fellow and a brother, not at all as a messiah or savior or leader.—A. W. S. in the Index.

Always win fools first. They talk much, and what they have once said they will stick to, whereas there is always time up to the moment to bring before a wise man arguments that may entirely change his opinion.—Arthur Helps.

The secret of all success lies in the simple plan of only doing that which we can do well.—Westminster Review.

FACTS, FANCIES AND FOLLIES OF ASTROLOGY.

It is given to few minds to be thoroughly catholic, to see the power, influence and beauty of every force, of every idea and faith which actuates mankind. The temperance advocate sees in intemperance the only evil in the world, and regeneration depends on the removal of intoxicating drinks from the world. The money maniac thinks in money somewhere lies the dread enemy of man; a revolution in the marriage system, in our social system, in labor and distribution of property, have each their special advocates, who see in their special hobby all that is attractive or worthy the attention of humanity. So also the Christian, the Spiritualist and the Rationalist. So also were the Astrologers of old. They discovered a small arc in the great circle of Truth, and imagined they had seen the entire circle. Observation taught them, and will teach all who may make the experiment, that certain configurations of the planets have a definable influence in the constitution and habits of people at their birth. Saturnine, jovial, martial, solar, venereal, mercurial and lunar temperaments have till now stamped their meaning in our language, and those who care to honestly make the observations as directed by Astrology will find them as faithful to fact as they were to the ancient Astrologer.

But human conceit is often stronger than the love for truth, and so it proved with Astrologers. Bombastic pretensions, assumptions of knowledge scarcely inferior to omniscience, degraded whatever truths lay in Astrology to the rank of superstitious folly and wicked imposition. In the place of experiments based on observation and reason, these charlatans put authority of books, ingenious fables and contrivances. Take nearly the entire range of astrological literature, and there will be found in them the same hackneyed expressions and stereotyped phrases. The weeds of a thousand years' growth are accepted as genuine flowers; the fancies of Lilly, the pedantic displays of Partridge, the solemn wisdom of Cardan, Salmon and others are received as veritable facts by the modern student; and in their blind devotion to ancient authority—and their own keenly felt ignorance for lack of experience—dare not question the authority. So when facts do not agree with ancient statements, it is not because there is anything wrong in Astrology, but the error lies solely in the practitioner. It is true that such may be the case, yet one fact discovered by personal experience is of more value than all the tomes which have been written or printed.

As the stars were believed to be the secondary cause of all mundane events, he who was versed in Astrology was supposed to be able to unravel every mystery in the progress of events. To this phantasy, Astrologers were too willing to lend their sanction, and as the seven planets in their various aspects were not complex enough to represent all the varied events concerning which they were questioned, fancy was forced into their services. The twelve signs of the zodiac are not entities, only spaces, and as such can have no influence. They are not treated in Astrology as entities; and yet an influence is supposed to flow from them. I know that the Astrologer will here produce case after case proving that the signs on the ascendant do prefigure the person born, and I have seen many instances in which there is a notable agreement. But we cannot nevertheless imagine space merely as having any effect. Wilson in his Dictionary of Astrology hints at this difficulty, but does not even attempt to remove it. If from these twelve divisions of the heavens any influence proceed, there must be a reason for it. What is the reason? One fact just occurs to me which may have some bearing on the subject. Scorpio has long been considered the evil sign, the Judas among the twelve; the Arabian will commence no new undertaking while the moon is in Scorpio, and by a simple rule, every Arabian is said to know when the moon is so situated. Now it is when the sun is passing through Scorpio that the meteoric showers are displayed; whether this may be any solution of the problem I cannot say.

To these signs in the heavens were added twelve houses on earth, which I have little hesitation in declaring purely fictitious, excepting perhaps the four cardinal points, and these can only be of value when a planet is situated therein or in aspect to them.

But in addition to the twelve signs and the twelve houses with the ever varying planetary aspects, these aspirants to omniscience must have more complexity to their "figures of the heavens," and so out of their fertile brains they added the moon's ascending and descending nodes, in astrological parlance, the dragon's head and tail, always, of course, in exact opposition to each other, which would neutralize their effects, had they any, but they can have none, for no such entity exists, and non-entity can have no influence. To these were added another more puerile and absurd than all the others, the part of fortune. This is an imaginary part of the heavens having the same relation to the ascendant that the moon has to the sun. That Astrologers continue to use these fictions as facts go to prove that they are rather imbecile imitators than profound philosophers; pensioners on the bounty of past authority, rather than faithful observers and experimenters. As Astrology is presented to us in books, which are for the most part copies of each other, it is a tissue of baseless conjecture and bombastic words, while its verities are hidden under the rubbish of centuries. Yet there is a truth in Astrology to those who dig for it, but, like gold, it will always be found at the bottom.

Least I be classed with those who ridicule what they cannot understand, I will quote the words of James Wilson, who as an authority in Astrology, theoretical and practical, may be considered second to none. After describing the symbolic meaning of the twelve houses, he says:

"The description of the twelve houses, as here laid down, has lately been adopted in nativities as well as in horary questions, but I have no opinion of it in nativities whatever, although I have seen several instances in which it has been verified; reason is against it, and the effects of the houses, except the first and tenth, can only be admitted in horary questions. They seem to have their influence assigned them through a misconception of the system of Ptolemy, who certainly did not mean anything of the kind. * * * I would advise the artist to have nothing to do with lords of houses, Dragon's head or tail, or Pars Fortuna in nativities; they are merely symbols, and only calculated for horary questions."

But even in nativities there is, to me, a fiction which in no astrological work that I have seen has there been given any reason for. The degrees of an arc of direction—the exact distance between a planet and certain points in the horoscope—are converted into time by allowing each degree to signify a year; why I do not know. Does any one know? Yet it is a part of Ptolemy's system. Of the other rubbish in Astrology, "terms, triplicities, faces, pits," and other nonsense, I will have nothing to say, as they are worthless to Astrology except when it is used as a system of divination and then it ceases to be Astrology.

RELIGION.

BY LABOY SUNDERLAND

A false theory may make us blind to facts which are opposed to our prepossessions, or, may conceal from us their true import when we behold them.—Lyell.

For this term we are indebted to the heathen who lived ages before Jesus was born. Let us inquire into the anatomy of its origin. And ask, Since its adoption by Christians, what has been the ground of its opposition by so large a proportion of the Human Race?

It would not, I think, be unreasonable to suppose language has been originated by the necessities of the human mind. As man has found himself, from age to age, so he has invented words for meeting his wants. In the beginning, as of the family, so of the race, infancy is a condition of ignorance, helplessness, and fear. And, correlatively, with these conditions, we have aspiration, trust, and veneration; whence come all we know of prayer, faith, and worship. Infancy always has respect to the Parental, whence is Wisdom, Power, and Authority, and thus we have the family government, and the administration of goodness, justice and truthfulness. All this was true of Humanity from the beginning, and long before there could have been any idea of gods, or invisible personages, formed in the human mind. The first sound uttered from the infant, as it hangs upon the mother's breast, is the language of filial love. The parents are the true objects of veneration, and filial love inspires aspiration, and a faith and worship that is perfectly natural; which cannot, however, be truly said of the worship that in after life has been offered to invisibilities:—

"Gods partial changeful, passionate, unjust, Whose attributes were rage, revenge, and lust."

But here it is that we find the soil in which credulity and fear become intensified into faith and prayer for assistance from imaginary personages. Thus, gods have been created by faith and fear. Assistance is wanted that cannot come from the parents or any human being, and in this extremity, ignorance, helplessness and fear call on an invisibility for help. Hence the fifty thousand gods, more or less, and the heathen forms of worship, which suggested this term religion, from re, intense, and ligo, I bind, signifying an obligation stronger than that which binds the child to filial love. And, as we shall see, this very claim of an obligation higher than any known in the relations of life was put forth by Jesus, when he commanded his followers to hate father, mother, wife, children, brothers, and sisters, and their own life also, in comparison with the love they should feel for him. Luke XIV. 26.

But how does it appear that there can be any higher obligation than that which is founded in the Relations of Life? I answer: As, of the Filial, so of the Fraternal Relations, whence is all we know of Justice, Goodness and Truthfulness, which is Virtue, and combining the elements of Freedom, Equality, Righteousness and Generosity. The Conjugal is the only relation that is formed by mutual volition, and hence it cannot be doubled. That is, it cannot be, truthfully, sustained between three or more parties, because, out of this Relation comes each of the others, making one source and one living Foundation, and the Highest authority for Virtue. The fulfilment of these relations is our highest happiness, or highest good.

There can be no greater good than the love of Virtue, (goodness, justice, truth,) for Virtue's sake. The violation of these relations is sin, and misery which injures most the one who commits it. It is the violation of these Relations that renders murder, adultery, and other crimes inexpressibly hateful and shocking even to the common mind. Hence it is that all moral duties and moral wrongs are determined by these Relations. The motions of the planets, and heavenly bodies, are determined by the relations they sustain to one another.

Thus we find, that this idea of religion is older than the Bible, and while it was originated in the infantile condition of the Race, there will always be felt by Humanity a want for its use. It was, at first, suggested by an excess of credulity and fear, and human as it was, in its origin, it necessarily took its shape from the filial and parental relations of life. Hence we see all forms of worship assuming dependence in the presence of parental power, as in the human family, the world over.

Now, when we consider that this was a heathen idea, and utterly false in respect to gods, it is, nevertheless, true that the highest law known to Humanity is founded in these Relations of Life, and no better term is known, perhaps, by which this authority could be designated. And so this word, like all others, must be determined by the progressive tendencies of the ages. Those imaginary invisibilities have faded from human faith, similarly as they must do in all time to come; and still a term is needed for designating that innate sense of obligation that binds us to the fulfilment of the Relations of Life. This sense is radical, universal, unmistakable, living and indestructible; and no better term is needed for designating a moral sense common to Humanity. These relations fulfilled, there can be no paramount law for any other moral duties. That a term of this kind is needed is manifest from the efforts so often made to invent one for covering this wide field. One calls it "Right Action." Another, "man's efforts to perfect himself;" and, another thinks it should be called "aspiration for the invisible" etc. But I do not see why we should object to this term religion on account of its birth. It is radical, comprehensive, and it covers the whole field, what was never contemplated by any thing that fell from the lips of Jesus.

Jesus, himself, so far from having any idea of this field, expressly ignored the Relations of Life, which are the source of man's highest joy, and the living foundation of all his moral obligations. Matt. X: 37. And, yet, so true it is, the "author and the finisher" of the christian's "faith" (Heb. XII: 2.) ignored, and set aside, the "Higher Law" of Humanity in the Love Relations, whence is all we know of Goodness, Justice, and Truth.

And Christianity, (not to say, all Christians) from the days of Paul to the present time, has been too busy with the invisibles of an unknown world, to invent any term broad enough to meet a universal want, a want as broad as Humanity, and as enduring as a mother's love. And, so, never dreaming of any better term than this from the Heathen gods, they borrowed this one, but which had no meaning when it fell from Christian lips, only as they added an adjective for its explanation. Hence we read of a "vain religion," James I: 26. "The Jews' religion," Gal. I: 13. "Pure religion," James I: 27. And by antithesis, we must have an "impure religion," and may be that is what is meant in Col. II: 18. where we have an "angelic religion;" or, as in verse 23 we have it "will religion;" or perhaps this was meant as a hit at "Free Religion" of the present age; as, the human will is free in the sense that it cannot be controlled by any other will. And this term free if the only qualifying term that ever should accompany the other term which is rendered worship or religion. Free Religion says "think, yourself." But, the Christian forbids freedom of thought, and says, "think as I do or be damned."

GRADUATED TAXATION.

MR. EDITOR:—I dislike to answer a correspondent who is guilty of such an absurdity as was "Workingman" in reply to "Money-maniac," when he says, "Graduated taxation and land limitation are incompatible with republican freedom and liberty." I wonder how he found out that if a majority of the voters of a free country say by their votes that the constitution and laws shall be so altered that one thousand dollars in every homestead shall be exempt from taxation, such action will be incompatible with freedom; and that too, in face of a law of Congress exempting one thousand dollars income from revenue tax. I would like to know the difference between the two cases. The people certainly have as much right to say how, and what shall pay taxes, as they have to limit the interest on money, which is their own private property.

If A. offers B. ten dollars for the use of one hundred, who can say he shall not make such a bargain, and how can he prevent it if he did say so? But if Government will abolish all paper currency now in use, and replace it by legal tenders for all debts, in sufficient quantities based on three or four per cent. bonds, and the credit and honor of the country, the only permanent base a currency can have, there will soon be no trouble about the interest question, or labor-saving machinery. And I would here inform your correspondent that if he will turn his eye eastward he will see that "coming events are casting their shadows ahead," not only on the money question, but graduated taxation too, the only two planks necessary to send the two old parties into outer darkness, where old fossils and fogies ought to be, who have outlived their usefulness. F. W.

"Papa is dead!" suddenly exclaimed the little daughter of Mr. Jones, a surveyor in the Nova Scotia Government employ, the other day. The mother hushed the child, but in a few minutes the little one repeated the words emphatically. During the same day intelligence came that the father had been drowned while attempting to cross a small lake on the ice.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, FEB. 13, 1875.

Of fourteen mediums and clairvoyants whose advertisements appear daily in a certain city paper which habitually abuses Spiritualists, only two advertise in COMMON SENSE, and of the fifty or more who occasionally advertise in the daily papers, only a half dozen support the paper which supports them. What does this fact indicate? If it means that mediums consider the advertisements in COMMON SENSE as of no use to them, we can assure them that they make a mistake. It is the very paper that country readers rely upon for information as to the most reliable mediums, and when Spiritualists come to the city, they visit those who advertise in this paper. If it is true, however, that Spiritualists are not the ones who support mediums, we reply, the readers of COMMON SENSE are not, in the main, Spiritualists, but inquirers and Infidels. The paper would have failed long ago had we depended upon Spiritualists alone for support. Not one in ten of the Spiritual families of this State take the paper, but our subscribers are, mainly, Free-thinkers and Reformers who have liberality enough to aid an ally with whom they do not fully agree.

Mrs. C. M. SAWYER:—There has been in this city for several months a medium for materializations, who is beyond doubt an honest, well-meaning woman, but who, like most mediums, is exceedingly sensitive to all the influences by which she is surrounded. She has not been cordially received by spiritualists generally, and her seances have failed to satisfy some who think she ought not to give public exhibitions until able to do so in a manner to silence skepticism. This lady has given public seances at the East for years, and as we are informed, with very satisfactory results. The spirits do not walk out of the cabinet, neither do the features always appear distinctly, but at times, during harmonious circles, the manifestations have been beyond question genuine, and there is every reason to believe that with more favorable conditions they would greatly improve. She is at present at No. 10 Stockton street, but intends soon to return to the East. If the spiritualists of San Francisco desire to have proof undeniable of the genuineness of Mrs. Sawyer's mediumship, they should sustain her by their sympathy and support, and thus be able to answer the cavils and detractions of those who are so busy in denouncing her as a fraud. If she is a fraud, let the fact be proved; if not, then cease such uncharitable charges. We are ready to publish any facts, no matter whether favorable or unfavorable to those most concerned. The truth of spirit intercourse does not depend upon the genuineness of one or of one hundred professed mediums; and even if it did, dear as the belief is to us, we would not hesitate to give the truth. This journal is not published to sustain any individual, nor any ism, but it is for the TRUTH, whatever that may be.

Since the foregoing was written we are informed that Mrs. Sawyer has returned to Chicago.

SUSTAIN YOUR PRINCIPLES.

Our friends will be glad to learn that the COMMON SENSE PUBLISHING COMPANY has purchased an extensive Steam Printing Establishment, and is now ready to do Book and Job Printing of all kinds in as good style as can be done by any printer in the city. The office purchased is that of the Woman's Publishing Company, formerly located at 511 Sacramento street, now at 605 Montgomery, in the building formerly occupied by the Evening Post, where it is carried on under the old name, which is retained because it indicates the fact that the work in the office is performed mainly by women. The establishment is under charge of Mrs. A. M. Slocum, the Business Manager of COMMON SENSE, assisted by Mrs. Flora Wellman Chaney. Not only the management, but the book-keeping, soliciting and type-setting are all performed by women. In fact it is essentially a Woman's Office; and all friends of woman's right to equal pay for equal service are solicited to give the establishment their cordial support.

The foreman of the office is one of the best Job Printers in the State, and his assistants are the most capable of either sex that can be obtained. We do not beg for favors; but we ask the opportunity of proving our ability to do good work, at as low rates, as any other office in the city; and as a means of sustaining COMMON SENSE, we urgently request all men and women of progressive views—all who favor free thought in religion, and advancement in social and political science—to extend to us their individual patronage, and do all they can to influence the patronage of others.

In this purchase we incur, as is usual in business operations, some indebtedness. To keep good our credit, and to build up a profitable institution,—one worthy our cause—we propose to sell stock in the Common Sense Publishing Company, and for a limited period we offer it at one dollar per share. (The par value is five dollars.) While we ask Liberals to purchase this stock for the purpose of sustaining their principles, we expect soon to make it pay a good percentage on the investment; and we hope that those of our friends who have had doubts of the stability of the paper will now come forward and give us their earnest support. Our subscription list is gradually increasing, and the prospect every day brightening, but with a little effort on the part of friends the slow work of years may be reduced to months. We want an agent in every town of the State to procure subscribers. Who will volunteer to help us? Now is the time. Aid deferred is no aid at all. Show your regard for your principles by doing something to build them up; and what you are willing to do, do at once.

UNITY AMONG SPIRITUALISTS.

The Spiritual Scientist says any common ground of union for Spiritualists must contain Fact for the senses, Philosophy for the intellect, and Religion for the soul, and that "if our cause is to succeed we must have more order, more united action and more unanimity with regard to principles." Yes, but how shall we get this unanimity? Free-thinkers are individualized; they cannot be driven in a herd, nor even coaxed in one direction. They profess to be willing to go where reason leads, but what they call their reason leads in diverse directions. There seems to be general disintegration among truth-seekers, and we are not sure but this very fact is a good sign—an indication of honesty of purpose. Radical Spiritualism, the Scientist says, is Rationalism run mad, and that what we want is progressive Spiritualism (eclectic Spiritualism) which has in it the elements of purity we need. "Admitting no finality; ever broadening and improving; reducing to order as it proceeds, it builds as well as destroys." That is good. The Scientist adds: "Spirit Communion, God, and Individual Immortality are at present all we can unite upon." This statement would be true if the last two had been omitted. Thousands of Spiritualists do not believe in the existence of anything that can properly be termed God. Some believe in law; some in a principle, and others in a universal spirit that controls matter, but their ideas of deity are so vague as hardly to merit the name; and as to "individual immortality," there are many who see little proof of life everlasting in the mere fact of spirit existence. How long it may be, if ever, before the individual spirit returns to the "Spirit of the Universe" is an unsolved problem. Then the doctrine of re-incarnation, so repulsive to many Spiritualists, is firmly believed by thousands in Europe, and is also a growing faith in America. The question is not What do we desire to be true? but, What is true? We, however, see no necessity for agreement on mere points of doctrine. Let there be differences of opinion as to unknown facts in nature; such differences can be tolerated. What we need is unity of action as to the every day duties of life. The Scientist itself well expresses this, when it says: "Life, its designs, duties and requirements. These are the points on which we need a set of principles, a Spiritual Philosophy in fact, worthy of the name, that shall represent our movement as one worthy of the respect of the world at large, and one that will fill the soul of every adherent with a lasting joy, and an eternal satisfaction."

Mr. J. Burns, editor and publisher of the Medium and Daybreak, London, gives an interesting account of his recovery by aid of spirit power, from an almost fatal illness, brought on by extreme labor and anxiety. He took no drugs, no stimulants, the entire effort being to assist nature. He is now at work as vigorously as ever. To show our readers what a man must endure who publishes a spiritual paper from principle, without the hope of pecuniary reward, and against adverse circumstances, we shall copy a portion of Mr. Burns' article next week.

MEDIUMSHIP.

One of the strangest things in connection with Spiritual manifestations is the well attested fact that the presence of evil disposed persons at a circle, or of those bitterly opposed to the Spiritual theory, is frequently the cause of utter failure in the manifestations. This fact has been so often and so forcibly demonstrated that it is now generally conceded that none but spiritually-minded persons should be admitted at a seance for the higher order of manifestations, such as the materialization of spirits. Ordinary inquirers should begin at the foot of the ladder—with such manifestations as raps or tips, and only those of a high order of spirituality should presume to enter at once into the inner sanctuary of the temple. If this rule is disregarded the conditions are deranged and failure is the result. This is a law controlling spirit intercourse, and can no more be ignored than can any other law in nature. We have frequently known the presence of a single distrustful person at a circle to break up all harmony, and either prevent demonstrations, or induce those which savor of fraud; and when we are invited to attend a seance with skeptics who are unreasonable in their opposition, we invariably decline, well knowing that nothing satisfactory can result. Mediums are peculiarly sensitive, and subject to evil as well as good influences. They are controlled in entire accord with the elements by which they are surrounded, and it is the duty of Spiritualists to see that genuine public mediums are aided by their presence and sustained by their sympathy. If this is not done, if mediums are permitted to be surrounded constantly at their circles by suspicious, lying hypocrites, who go there not for any good, but merely to prove others as false as themselves, and the result is lies and deceit, then Spiritualists are more blameworthy by far than the mediums who are by them condemned.

It is proposed to organize a Philomathean Society in this city to meet every Sunday night at Social Hall, the first meeting to be on Sunday, at 7½ p. m. February 21, when either Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith or Prof. Chaney will lecture. The name of the society is the best index of its character—"A lover of learning." It will be neither a Spiritual nor an Infidel organization, but its great object will be the elevation of mankind. Without being a "Social Science Society," it will still make social science a leading feature. In a word, it is proposed to make it eclectic, caring for humanity more than for an ism of any kind. Hence, there will be no creed to defend, since there will be no profession of faith, save a professed love for knowledge, for truth and for humanity. No charge for admission at the door.

Tilton testifies that Mrs. Woodhull obtained her information concerning the Beecher scandal from Mrs. Morse, the mother of Mrs. Tilton. Mrs. Morse got her information from Tilton and from the confession of Mrs. Tilton to her.

The San Francisco Board of Supervisors have chosen Alexander Badlam, an honest, energetic citizen, as Assessor in place of Rosener. It is an admirable selection, and gives general satisfaction.

MRS. SMITH'S LECTURES.

The attendance at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union, 011 Market street, on Sunday last, was large, both in the afternoon and evening, showing an increasing interest in the discourses of this eloquent speaker. The subject of the afternoon lecture was The duties of Parents toward their Children. Mrs. Smith began with the statement that what the world most needs is good mothers. She treated at considerable length the subject of ante-natal influences on the child, and then proceeded with a general review of the prudish and false modesty of society that keeps from the knowledge of children those things which most concern them. She spoke of the undesirable influences of the Sunday School and urged Spiritualists to come with their children to the Lyceum.

The evening lecture was upon "Modern Ishmaelites." She contrasted the Modern with Ancient Ishmaelites in this wise: The ancients were "Every man's hand against them and their hands against every man," while with the modern it is every man's hand against them but their hands against none. The modern Ishmaelites, or reformers, protest against wrong, but make no war on society or individuals—they are opposed only to the usages of society. She urged reformers to be very charitable and give a helping hand to every unfortunate whom the respectable ones in society spurn from their doors. She related several touching incidents to prove that those whom society pronounce utterly depraved, have very humane hearts, which kindness and sympathy could incite to the best resolves.

Emma Hardinge Brittain declares herself still a Spiritualist and a medium, but she is so much opposed to "social freedom" that she will neither speak from a free platform nor write for a free-thought paper. She uses other words to express this fact, but this is what she means. We do not care to defile the columns of COMMON SENSE with the epithets some extra pure people apply to social reformers. It is quite probable that if we had the same vile thing in our minds when we speak of "social freedom" that they have, we should denounce it also, though, we trust, in gentler language; but the truth is that the very terms which to their minds seem to call up so much that is detestable, suggest to our own only ideas of purity. Words seem to have lost their meaning, of late, when applied to the relations of the sexes.

THE INDEPENDENT LYCEUM had for its subject on Sunday last, "Modern Spiritualism Unmasked." The gentleman advertised to make the opening address, not being present when the hour arrived, Mr. Hand led off with a thirty minute speech and was followed by Dr. Pilkington, Mr. Lundi, the "unmasker," Mr. Stowe and others. Mrs. Logan occupied the chair. There was music, recitations etc. as usual. Spiritualism, although "unmasked," still survives, and will come in for another hit at a future meeting.

SPIRITUALIST SOCIETIES.

MR. EDITOR:—Please inform your readers when the present Board of Trustees retire from the cares of office at Charter Oak Hall.
J. S. Morse.

We believe the election is to take place, under the constitution, in June, but in case of the resignation of members, vacancies could be filled prior to that time. It is said that the President of the Society has resigned, but as yet no steps have been taken for the election of a successor. The Vice President can undoubtedly act in her stead. There were no meetings last Sunday, and we are not informed that any will be held to-morrow. Mrs. Smith, at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union, has been speaking to growing audiences, yet not so large as they should be, and it has been suggested that the present would be a good time for the reunion of the two societies. An effort to this end was made some months ago, and a general consent was given, with the exception of two or three of the Trustees of Charter Oak Society. The presiding officers of both societies were, at that time, willing to resign, and do whatever else they could to promote harmony. Perhaps Mr. Kendrick, who made a very popular President, would accept the position again, and if some of the Trustees of the Charter Oak Society would give place to a like number of those of the Union, it is probable that the name of the incorporated society could be retained, though it would be necessary to modify the constitution, which now restricts freedom of speech, and members would be called upon to exercise mutual forbearance.

A writer for the Spiritual Scientist is devoting himself to the task of visiting all the Boston mediums, and writing descriptions of the seances, commending those who give him good tests, and condemning others who fail. This may appear fair to one who is ignorant of the philosophy of Spiritualism, but we are surprised that its injustice has not occurred to the scientific editor of that paper. Does he not know that as much depends on the investigator as upon the medium, and that the former can get nothing unless he is able to come into rapport with the medium and the spirit communicating? The elements of harmony might exist at one time and not at another, and there might be natural congeniality with one and not with another. The medium could not control these conditions, and should not be blamed for a single failure, as the same medium might succeed admirably with another person.

One feature of the articles of the Scientist critic we cordially commend. There are a large number of persons professing to be mediums and clairvoyants who are not. They are simply imposters, and such swindlers should be exposed. There are some of this class in San Francisco, as in every other large city, and it would be well if people could be informed of their true character, but it is difficult to give such information without at the same time bringing into disrepute the cause these charlatans assume to represent. We trust the Scientist will be able to steer clear of the rocks on either shore, and bring its readers into safe harbor.

CHRISTIANITY AND SPIRITUALISM.

Last week we republished from the San Jose Mercury an epitome of a lecture by Dr. Dean Clarke on the Christian Plan of Salvation. The Mercury of a later date gives a reply from a supporter of the church, the following extract from which contains all the writer says that is pertinent to the subject:

Those who scoff at the religion of Christ are utterly in the dark themselves. They would rob the world of this inestimable treasure, the Bible, but they have nothing with which they can replace it. No higher code of morals to elevate the race, even in this life, is presented, and as for the great future beyond the valley and shadow of death the blackness of darkness enshrouds them. Not so with the true Christian. To him the Bible is a priceless treasure and the religion so earnestly taught in that blessed book exactly fills a want in the human soul which the world has failed to supply; brings peace and consolation to the fortunate possessor, which cannot be purchased by the rich; it lifts the degraded out of the mire and gives even the great a more exalted station. If then the religion of the Lord Jesus is capable of accomplishing so much for the world, why stand in the way of its progress?

W. B.

To this Mr. Clarke says in the same paper:

I am not a "scoffer at the religion of Jesus Christ," but, on the contrary, I would disabuse it of the false doctrines and paganistic dogmas that have so long perverted it and sullied its purity. I believe that Evangelical Theology, based upon ancient Egyptian and Hebrew mythology, entirely misrepresents his grand mission, and many of his sublime teachings, to this world. I believe that he came as a divinely ordained moral and spiritual teacher, not as a sacrifice to atone for the sins of the world, and it was this false doctrine of "Vicarious Atonement," and its fabulous foundation, which I attacked, and not his beautiful religion of love to God and man, which I believe in, and am striving to establish. * * *

As to the moral teachings of the Bible, taken as a whole they are not superior to those of the "Sacred Books" of other nations and races, written long prior to the Jewish and Christian Bible, as I could prove by ample quotations had I space. History proves that no worse tyrants and villains have ever lived than thousands who have taken the Bible as their standard. They have quoted its texts in justification of war, rapine, slavery, persecution unto death, and oppressions of every kind. They have quoted it against every great discovery of science, and thrown it at the head of nearly every great reformer since the days of Jesus! And they have been consistent in so doing, for how can frail man be better than the God whom he worships? Those, however, who have taken Jesus as their divine exemplar, and lived his humanitarian and purifying teachings, have been, and will be, the better for it, and I will vie in efforts with the most zealous Christian in living and teaching the grand spiritual gospel, which saves all who live pure, benevolent lives; but I repudiate that Theology which teaches that an innocent man or God can atone by his blood for the sins of the guilty, and suffer for another the consequences of wrong doing, which are the means of discipline and reform, which justice and mercy alike ordain to elevate and spiritualize the sinner.

Sin and suffering stand as cause and effect, and no one can suffer for another any more than he can eat or sleep for him, and the doctrine of vicarious atonement and for givenness of sin, as prescribed by Theology, is little better than a license for indulgence.

Let me correct one more error of my critic, and I will forbear. The large and rapidly increasing class to which

I belong, whose religion is love to God and man, are not in the great darkness he imagines, but have a far greater light than that in which he dwells. Our "hope has changed to glad fruition," and faith is supplanted by knowledge of an immortal life into which we pass, through the beautiful gateway of Death, which, instead of being the "King of Terrors," is the Angel of Deliverance from the bondage of the flesh into the glorious liberty of a spiritual existence; each gravitating to the position and association for which they are morally and spiritually fitted while on earth, and where each grows in goodness and knowledge in proportion to the effort made. Our light is from Heaven to-day, and is knowledge demonstrated by science which admits of no doubts. DEAN CLARKE.

LETTER FROM C. FANNIE ALLYN.

DEAR MRS. SLOCUM:—The steamer sails in an hour, and so it is with haste I write; but I want to report good progress in this portion of California. I came here last November; have had large and increasing audiences. Have visited Ferndale, Rohnerville, and Hydesville and find interest everywhere. Mr. York has done an excellent work in this section, and has many warm friends and admirers, who will be glad to greet him again.

I have found a home in Eureka at W. F. Sweasey's, who is widely known as a humanitarian. He is indeed one of nature's noblemen, and is a model husband, father, neighbor and Liberalist, and his wife walks side by side with him in good deeds of kindness and charity. They'll both get to heaven without the orthodox wings or "fadders like a hen."

We have formed a young Lyceum here. It is crude, but is interesting, and is gaining every Sunday in interest and numbers. If they will only continue as they have begun, it will soon be a powerful instrument of good.

At Rohnerville I had a home in every sense of the word, with Mr. and Mrs. Strong, advocates of, and subscribers to your paper. Speakers who stop with them have an opportunity of seeing the practical side of unselfishness. With them I visited Hydesville and was the first Liberalist that has ventured into its churchly precincts for many years. Good audiences, good attention, and an invitation to "come again," was the result.

I shall leave here with regret for the many dear faces I leave behind me. I have found health here, and am growing strong once more. My voice has not yet recovered its old time flexibility and clearness, but is very much improved, and promises to be "itself again."

Next Wednesday I am tendered a benefit, and shall give dramatic readings, en costume, assisted by good singers, closing with a dance.

Mrs. Addie Ballou arrived this week. I shall give way for her to speak next Sunday, and may visit Arcata, so I leave the cause in good hands, and have no fears but it will be sustained, for in addition to her inspiration, she is esteemed by the literary portion of some of the churches. So despite theologic anathemas, the spirit of progression goes "marching on" with increased power.

Bless you and yours, my dear sister. I have spoken in behalf of your paper, which to me is a very welcome visitor, and when I come to town (which will be somewhere about the 18th,) I shall subscribe, so that my friends at home can share the pleasure, and know what a bright, sparkling paper the Liberalists of the Pacific Coast support. I hope you are having good encouragement, for you merit it. In haste

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

SPIRITUALISTS AND SCIENCE.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—The discussion of Spiritualism before the Lyceum for Self Culture at Social Hall was attended with one notable feature worth recording. At the beginning we were foully dealt with by our orthodox brethren, who threw mud in every direction. Well may the devil (provided there is one) chuckle to hear orthodoxy crying out to Spiritualists, "Thou too art defiled." "Instead of civilization owing its progress to the Christian religion, so-called, one of the hardest tasks of civilization has been to civilize religion." Spiritualism has accomplished more in this direction in a quarter of a century than materialism has done in 1800 years. Has materialism become conservative, or is it jealous of its new ally that we find it arrayed side by side with orthodoxy in hurling anathemas at Spiritualism?

Though it must be admitted that Spiritualism, supported by facts, is achieving an easy victory over both its adversaries, is there not danger that Spiritualism also is running into dogmatism and bigotry? What evidence have we that man has a spirit? Is it not more reasonable for us to suppose that intelligence is universal, and pervades everything animate and inanimate in proportion to its capacity to receive it?

When we say that the brain of man is the seat of intelligence, have we any evidence that the brain is not the mere receptacle, that, like a mirror, reflects the thoughts it receives? Have we discovered the process by which new thoughts are created, that we so confidently declare that they have their origin in the brain? If they do, how are they born?

Are there any phenomena credited to individual spirits that could not with equal propriety be supposed to originate with universal intelligence? One passage of Scripture says: "The spirit of man returns to the God that gave it." Neither can I put any other reasonable interpretation upon the Bible commandments. "Thou shalt not bow down," etc., but that God is universal intelligence.

In this city, a few days since, a lady was crossing Market street at 4 p. m., and became very much alarmed from being nearly run over by a street car. Her husband, a carpenter, was at the same hour employed in his shop; he looked up and saw his wife entering the door, but continued his work, and when he had done, looked round for his wife, no where to be seen. He then inquired of another person where his wife went, and was told to his great surprise that she had not been seen. When he returned home he asked his wife where she went, and why she did not come into the shop. To his still greater surprise the reply was that she was not near the shop, but at the same hour she was very near being run over.

Facts of this kind are of frequent, perhaps daily occurrence, but "they are too contemptible to merit the attention of scientists." The trouble is, the investigation may overturn both the dogmas of theology and the theories of materialism.

But science is moving along slowly in the wake of public clamor, and will be here presently. Science never makes her appearance until her avant courier has summoned the beleaguered fortress of ignorance and prejudice to surrender.

But there is one thing to be said in her favor. Though reluctant and slow to obey the popular voice, she is sure to inflict the coup de grace that will at last put an end to priest-craft, king-craft and monopolies, the parents of all human ills.

SPIRITUALIST.

INTEREST ON MONEY, ETC.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—In No. 37, page 439, of your paper, you ask, "How does our 'working man' propose to prevent the collecting of interest for the use of money?" "Is not money subject to the same law of demand and supply that labor is, or any article of commerce?" These questions are of the utmost importance, and upon their answer hangs the destiny of our Government—whether it shall be aristocratic or democratic. Commercially these questions should be answered affirmatively, politically in the negative. As gold and silver, they are, and should be governed by the law of supply and demand, and allowed the percentage due all commercial transactions. Politically gold and silver as a medium of exchange are no more entitled to ten per cent. or any other per cent. than my yard stick, because made of gold, when loaned a year should be thirty-nine and six tenths (39 6 10) inches long, or my measure, because made of silver, and loaned the same length of time, should hold 66 lbs. of wheat. Weight and measure are purely legal and arbitrary, and the right of an individual, or individuals to increase their measuring capacity is just as much an act of tyranny, as for me to move the government stakes around my farm so as to include one tenth more land annually. Either right ceded by the government is fatal to its democratic form. Therefore let Congress pass a declaratory act making it felony to receive or pay interest.

Yours for reformation.

EDGAR LINDSAY.

Windsor, Sonoma Co., Feb. 5.

The question "Is not money subject to the same law of demand and supply that labor is, or any article of commerce?" is the question to be asked of all who propose to retain our present financial system, but want to mend it and patch it, in the vain hope of making something good out of a thing which is in itself essentially bad. We believe Mr. Lindsay agrees with us, that the system itself is wrong; but we do not like his remedy; first, because it would be ineffectual, as all usury laws are; and second, because it is unnecessary, as the same result can be attained in a better manner. You cannot legislate justice into men; but the Government itself can loan money to the people, and thus prevent the extortions of private money lenders. There is no good reason why money should be made of material which has intrinsic value. That is the idea of barbarians. What have civilized people to do with it? Let the poor Indian have his wampum, which cost him months of labor to manufacture; people of culture should be able to devise a better mode. Money should be simply a representative of value—not value itself. The wealth of the entire nation should be its basis, and it should be loaned by the Government to the people, on landed or other security, and at low rates, until the country is out of debt, and the system is well established, then it should be absolutely free of interest. Some reformers favor the abolition of ownership in land. We do not think this will ever be done; but in such case, personal property could be deposited as security for the money loaned. The Government should be the friend and protector of the people, instead as now, the bulwark for the protection of the money grabber, the land grabber and monopolists generally.

WHAT IS PIETY?

A PARAPHRASE BY D. H. M.

The following is copied from the Radical, that best of all Religious Magazines, which was so good that it died for lack of the support of those who failed to appreciate its high standard. People could not get up to it.

Socrates. What is Piety?

Euthyphro. Piety is what is pleasing to the gods.

Soc. But is anything pleasing to the gods but righteousness?

Eu. Certainly not.

Soc. Then Piety is righteousness?

Eu. It would seem so?

Soc. Is piety the whole or only part of righteousness?

Eu. But a part, I think.

Soc. What part should you call it?

Eu. Piety, Socrates, I think is the part of righteousness which is concerned about the worship of the gods. The remainder of righteousness is that which leads to the utility of men.

Soc. Capital! But still there is one small matter wanting. This service of the gods, what is it? to serve the gods is expressed by the same word as to tend horses and oxen, and this tendance is for the benefit of the creature tended. Well then, is this service of the gods for the benefit of the gods? Do you do the gods any good by your service?

Eu. Of course not. What I mean by service, is the service of servants to masters.

Soc. But in all these cases, service means work of some kind. What then is the work—admirable it must indeed be—which we can do for the gods?

Eu. O, we can do many such works.

Soc. But what is the best of these works?

Eu. Well we can offer prayers and sacrifices, and so make the gods propitious to us, to our families, and to the state.

Soc. You say then that piety consists in prayers and sacrifices?

Eu. Precisely.

Soc. Now sacrifice is giving something to the gods, and prayer is asking something from them—is it not so?

Eu. That is my meaning.

Soc. And so you say that serving the gods is giving something to them, and asking something from them?

Eu. I do.

Soc. But to ask aright is to ask what we need; and to give aright we must give what they need—is it not so?

Eu. Yes.

Soc. Then piety is a sort of bargain with the gods?

Eu. Why—yes—you can call it a bargain if you like.

Soc. I do not like to do so unless it be true. But tell me, of what use can our gifts be to the gods? What they give us is plain, for everything is their gift. But how can they be profited by what we give? Or have we so much the better of the bargain, that we receive all good from them, and they get no good from us?

Eu. Why, do you suppose, Socrates, that I am such a fool as to think that the gods are benefited by what they receive from us?

Soc. If they are not, what are these gifts of ours to the gods, which you have been speaking about?

Eu. What can you suppose, except honor and reverence and gratitude?

Soc. Then, my friend, you consider piety to be gratitude to the gods, and not anything which is useful or pleasing to them.

Eu. I think that piety is in the highest degree pleasing them.

Soc. And so piety is what is pleasing to the gods?

Eu. Certainly.

Soc. But if piety is pleasing, it must be useful—for I suppose that you will not assert that the gods are pleased with what is of no use?

Eu. Assuredly not.

Soc. Do the gods then need anything we can offer them?

Eu. What a question!

Soc. But if piety is useful, it must be useful because either the gods need it or because we need it, or lastly because both the gods and ourselves need it.

Eu. The gods do not need it—they need nothing.

Soc. Then it must be that piety is useful because it is useful to us?

Eu. It appears so now.

Soc. But to seem to do something for the gods when in reality we are only doing for ourselves—is this piety?

Eu. We have an engagement this hour.

Soc. Alas! my noble friend, what are you doing? You kick me down from the lofty summit of my hope and go away. I expected to learn of you what piety really is, and so to become a reformed man for the rest of my life.

SCEPTICISM.

In Theodore Parker's last work, entitled his "Experience as a Minister," is the following striking passage:—

"There is a denial which boldly rejects the Immortality of Man and the existence of Deity, with many another doctrine, dear and precious to mankind: but the most dangerous scepticism is that, which, professing allegiance to all these, and crossing itself at the name of Jesus, is yet so false to the great Primeval Instincts of Man, that it declares he cannot be certain of anything he learns by the normal exercise of any faculty!

"I have carefully studied this School of Doubt, modern, not less than old, as it appears in history. In it there are honest inquirers after truth, but misled by some accident, and also sophists, who live by their slight of mind, as jugglers by their slight of hand. But the chief members of this body are the Mockers, who, in a world they make empty, find the most fitting echo to their hideous laugh; and Churchmen of all denominations, who are so anxious to support their ecclesiastic theology, that they think it is not safe on its throne till they have annihilated the claim of Reason, Conscience, the Affections of the Soul to any voice in determining the greatest concerns of man—thinking there is no place for the Christian Church or the Bible till they have nullified the faculties which created both, and rendered Bible-makers and Church-founders impossible.

"But it is rather a poor compliment these ecclesiastic sceptics pay their Deity, to say He so makes and manages the world that we cannot trust the sights we see, the sounds we hear, the thoughts we think, or the moral, affectional, religious emotions we feel; that we are certain neither of the intuitions of instinct, nor the demonstrations of reason, but yet by some anonymous testimony, can be made sure that Balaam's she ass spoke certain Hebrew words, and one undivided third part of God was 'born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, descended into Hell, and on the third day rose again,' to take away the wrath which the other two undivided third parts of God, felt against all mankind!"

Purposes, like eggs, unless they are hatched into action, will run into rottenness.

THE SPIRIT TO ITS MATE.

How near I am thou canst not know
By outward sign or token;
My spirit in thy thought perceives,
Not in the language spoken.

With thee by day I share the life
That gives to thee thy being,
And in thy consciousness I see
The sum of all thy seeing.

Through every sense my spirit learns
With thee the touch of nature;
And feels the harmony of life
Created in thy creature.

We wait not for a heaven to come
Down from the heights above us;
Our heaven is in this life of love,
With all we love who love us.

With me, when slumber shuts the gates
Of life's material portals,
The spirit wanders through the spheres
The land of the immortals.

Our peace doth like a river flow
Through landscapes ever vernal,
Along the shifting banks of time
And in the land eternal.

Forever one, we seek no more
In sadness, hungry hearted,
For the dear angel of our life,
Unknown or erst departed.

TO ANY DESPONDING GENIUS.

BY ALICE CARY.

Take this for granted, once for all,
There is neither chance nor fate,
And to sit and wait for the sky to fall,
Is to wait as the foolhardy wait.

The laurel, longed for, you must earn—
It is not of the things men lend,
And though the lesson be hard to learn,
The sooner the better, my friend.

That another's head can have your crown
Is a judgment all untrue.
And to drag this man or the other down,
Will not in the least raise you.

For in spite of your demur, or mine,
The gods still will be the gods,
And the spark of genius will outshine
The touchwood, by all odds!

And you in turn, as an honest man,
Are bound, you will understand,
To give back either the best you can,
Or to die, and be out of hand.

Be careful, careful work to do,
Thought at cost of heart, or head,
The praises, even of the "Review,"
Will hardly stand in stead.

No light that through the ages shine
To worthless work belongs—
Men dig in thoughts as they dig in mines,
For the jewels of their songs.

A fresco painter in ceiling wrought,
With eyelids strained, 'tis said,
Till he could read of the fame so bought,
With the pages above his head.

Hold not the world in debt to you
When it credits you, day by day,
For the light and air, for the rose and dew,
And all that cheers your way.

FAUST—A TRAGEDY.

FROM A MANUSCRIPT TRANSLATION BY DON FULANO.

THE STUDY.

MEPHISTO.—Now choose your course of study, as you will.
SCHOLAR.—To law I can't accommodate my mind.

MEPHISTO.—I cannot really take it very ill,
I know exactly how this course you'll find,
For law and equity are carried on
Like an hereditary ill from sire to son.
They drag their length along from race to race,
And creep like snails from place to place.
Prudence grows folly, virtue, vice,
Woe to you, if you be a grandchild born,
But of that justice pure, which takes its rise
In every soul, law only speaks with scorn.

SCHOLAR.—You point the strong disgust I felt at first,
Happy the student in your class room nursed,
To try Theology almost I long.

MEPHISTO.—I should indeed be grieved to lead you wrong,
But theologic groves among
It is so hard the proper path to choose;
'Midst all its flowers so much hid poison lies,
So like true medicine to human eyes,
You're safe to pluck the false, the true refuse;
'Twere best in this, one master owned your care,
And by his dictum, see you ever swear.
In short confine your faith to words,
So steering thro' a channel safely buoyed
You shall the harbor of assurance gain.

SCHOLAR.—Still some ides should the words contain?

MEPHISTO.—Of course, of course,—yet trouble not o'er much,
For just there where you no idea clutch,
There pat, some word fills up the aching void;—
With words one argues splendidly you know,
From empty words theologic systems grow,
On words how gloriously the saint believes
Whilst no lot's robbed by skeptic thieves.

SCHOLAR.—Your pardon sir, I proffer many questions;
I would from you a full assurance win;
Pray will you not 'bout medicine
Give me, as well, a few short, clear directions;
Three years is not long to abide;
'Fore God, the field seems far too wide;
Had one but some small index, you'll allow,
Might feel one's way already further on.

MEPHISTO.—saide (I'm quite tired out of this dry tone—
Must play the devil in good earnest now)

Well! Physic's spirit is not hard to grasp;
You study through the great and little world,
That you may let things go at last
As may please God.
In vain have you, on Sage's wings unfurled,

Potteringly hovered over herb and sod,
Each man learns only what to learn may chance,
Who touches the right moment with luck's rod,
His is the inheritance.
You are a well built chap—no muff—
Not lacking in audacity I see;
And if you only trust yourself enough,
Why other souls in like trust will agree.
The women, first, you must secure,
And learn their endless "ah!" and "oh!"
So manifold you know—
Starting from one point only can you cure.
And when to honor's half-way house you've come,
You'll have them all, then, under your own thumb.
A handle to your name must make all think
That your skill far all other skill exceeds,
With "how do do;" you then jump in a wink
Into those medias res another needs
To beat about the bush for years to reach their brink.
Learn the soft pulse to press with amorous finger,
And with bold hand, and tender gaze to linger
Awhile in gentle dalliance 'round the waist,
Only to see how tight they may be laced.

SCHOLAR.—Come! that looks better, now one sees the how and why.

MEPHISTO.—Grey, my dear friend, is theory's root, so dry,
And green life's golden tree.

SCHOLAR.—I swear to you, 'tis like a dream to me,
Might I, pray, trouble you some future time,
And hear your wisdom to its lowest line?

MEPHISTO.—As far as may be, will I serve you, sir.

SCHOLAR.—I cannot leave you, I aver,
Till in my album you have something writ.
Do me the favor sir, I beg for it.

(Handing his album.)

MEPHISTO.—I will.

(He writes and returns the book.)

SCHOLAR (reads).—Eritis sicut, Deus, scientes bonum et malum.
(Shuts it reverently and takes his leave.)

MEPHISTO. (alone).—Follow this proverb and my aunt, the snake,
And you'll grow frightened yet, at your God's shape.

FAUST (steps in).—Where shall we go then?

MEPHISTO.—Well, where shall it be?
The great and then the little world we'll see.
Oh with what pleasure, with what profit
Will you explore the by-ways of it.

FAUST.—By my long beard, I must protest
I feel that trial were an awkward test,
I never knew the easy art of life,
Nor ever mingled in the world's dull strife,
In others' presence I do feel so small,
I shall not know how to behave at all.

MEPHISTO.—Well my dear friend, about this do not grieve,
When you quite trust yourself, then you'll know how to live.

FAUST.—How shall we start? Where have you left

Your carriage, horses, and your groom?

MEPHISTO.—Upon my cloak we'll make a shift
To travel thro' the air. But quit your room
Not bringing a big bundle to put on it;
'Tis a bold step, put a light heart upon it,
A little fiery blast, which I will blow.
Shall raise it cleverly from earth below
And if we travel lightly, all the sharper.
Here's to your new life course, good luck to our departure,

BEECHER.

He crushed his friends to cloak deceit, and hid,
Beneath an outward holiness, his crime,
The one of all commandments most forbid,
Of human love, most sacredly sublime,
In breaking which, his life was all unbid,
A life of fame that reached from clime to clime,
Wherever Glory's banner floats the breeze,
From Africa's wilds to Arctic's dreary seas!

Signs of the Times.

One hundred young women are ready to do copying at $2 per week, where one is willing to do plain cooking at double that sum.

Saa Kee says the religion of Confucius teaches that punishment for sin is certain, while the Christian religion promises forgiveness; the consequence is that all Christian Chinese lie and steal, expecting to be forgiven.

Folly is at a premium in any city where such a weak-minded man as Hammond can induce large numbers of people to spend hour after hour listening to his senseless stories to children. Where are the votaries of science? Surely not in the Church.

Dr. Ely Van De Walker, who has long made a specialty of diseases of women, writes an article for the Popular Science Monthly, in which he presents facts and arguments to prove that woman is incapacitated by nature to compete successfully with men in the learned professions, and in skilled labor.

The California Grangers have formed a Business Association with a capital stock of one million dollars, for the purpose of furnishing members with farming implements, groceries, and supplies of all sorts, at a trifling advance above cost. The Association will have agents in San Francisco, to whom consignments of grain and produce will be sent, and who will make purchases when directed.

Van De Walker says if women were a unit in favor of women preaching, women would preach in a fair proportion of Christian Churches; but they are retarded by the force of opinion of their own sex. It is the same in the practice of medicine. If woman favored woman there is scarce a household in which her choice would be denied; but they do not, for the reason that reliance upon man in moments of bodily peril is an inherited trait, strengthened by education.

A vile wretch, whose name is not Lot, though living with two of his own daughters, has been arrested in Wyoming, charged with being the father of his youngest daughter's child. Of course he is a bible student. That is where people obtain the most notable examples in that line. How long will it be before this "holy volume" will be classed with obscene literature? Has it not corrupted mankind long enough under its false guise as the word of God?

We mention, as a hopeful sign of progress in our State, the fact that at Vallejo, last week, after Mrs. Carrie F. Young, one of our best as well as most radical lecturers on health and other reforms, had given a course of lectures, over twenty of her listeners (all women) requested her to give a lecture to married men and women on "Pre-natal and Ante-natal Life," in the Presbyterian Church. The lecture was given greatly to the satisfaction of all who heard it. A few years ago, a lecture on this subject could not have found a hearing in a public hall, much less in any church in California.

A process for the manufacture of iron direct from the ore, the use of the blast furnace being dispensed with, has been invented.

Mrs. Woodhull promises to tell the truth concerning the Beecher-Tilton imbroglio, so far as she is concerned. She awaits the termination of the present skirmish before opening her batteries.

Chang Quon Wo, of San Francisco, has secured a patent for an improved mode of fastening seams in garments, by means of a lap out in the goods to secure the corner of pockets or other parts requiring unusual strength.

The papers mention as something remarkable that a blind man has joined the church in Boston. Hundreds of blind men and women have done the same thing in California, and just now Hammond is harvesting a whole crop of blind children. The latter, after passing through this experience, never fully recover their sight. Though some do manage to get their eyes open, they are generally affected with strabismus.

The Wellesley University, for women, founded by Mrs. Durant, is soon to be dedicated. A leading object will be the instruction of young women in the laws of health. One foolish idea is the exclusion of men from the institution, both as students and professors. What these young women need is healthful competition with men, and the best instruction that can be obtained, whether from men or women.

In Sacramento, last week, a couple of men were strangled to death at the rope's end, according to law. Of course they had a number of priests in attendance to pray their souls into glory. They confess to the priest, the priest pleads with Jesus, and Jesus intercedes with God. Here's a quadrangular contest, between blood-stained men at one extreme and a blood-seeking God at the other, with two mediators between. What a wretched farce for an age of the world said to be enlightened.

The Sacramento Union, formerly the most profitable and most influential paper in California, worth at least a quarter of a million of dollars, was sold last week for the value of the real estate and printing material, $45,000. One of the causes given is the decline of population in the mining portion of the State, where the paper was most widely circulated. The agricultural counties of California are now far in advance of the mining regions in population and wealth.

Very careful experiments made under direction of Col. Ocott and Prof. Lippit, have proved the genuineness of the mediumship of Mr. and Mrs. Holmes, of Philadelphia; but the newspapers which were so eager to publish the "expose," will not give a line to the demonstrations of these honest investigators. The Holmeses admit that Mrs. White sat for the photograph of Katie King; but they claim that most of the manifestations were genuine, and the facts confirm their statements. The same phenomena has been produced repeatedly in presence of these witnesses, while Mrs. Holmes, sewed in a bag, sat alone in the cabinet.

THE WAY OF SALVATION.

BY DR. DEAN CLARKE.

Being exhorted by Elder E. P. Hammond, the revivalist, to "Come to Jesus" and learn the way to salvation, I diligently searched the Scriptures to see if the orthodox dogma of atonement was taught by Jesus, and I found in his reputed sayings no confirmation whatever of this doctrine, which is so zealously taught by his professed followers; on the contrary, I find that nearly all of his parables and injunctions inculcate that we are justified and saved by our own merits and deeds, not his.

CHRIST'S MISSION.

Is it not strange that, if the grand purpose of his advent, the one especial mission of his life, was to "atone for the sins of the world, and save mankind from hell by the shedding of his blood," he did not clearly and emphatically declare the fact, yea, make it the burden of all his sermons, as do his professed followers to-day? Surely he must be the highest authority for declaring his mission, and teaching the way of salvation, if the claims of theology are true concerning him! This proposition being self-evident, let us see what Jesus declared was his mission.

In St. Luke's gospel chap. iv : 18. we read that he went into a Synagogue in his native town, on the Sabbath day, and read from Esaias : "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised," etc., and he said, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." Why didn't he add : "I am anointed mainly, however, to atone for the sins of a guilty world by shedding my blood in their stead?" If such was his great calling he surely would have so stated when "defining his position" to his old acquaintances.

Again in Luke iv : 43. he said to other critics also, for therefore am I sent. This proves that he came as a Spiritual teacher, not as a "sin offering." In Luke v, he declared : "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Why didn't he say that he came to "die for sinners, and to suffer in their stead," if that was the main object?

In Luke xviii : 37. We learn that at last, when summoned before Pilate to state who he was, and what was his purpose, he said : "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, THAT I SHOULD BEAR WITNESS UNTO THE TRUTH!" What more explicit language than this can be found, defining his true mission? From these passages of his biographers, we have his own unequivocal statements as to his purpose and work for humanity, and his own declarations ought to be considered a higher authority than those of St. Paul or any other of the disciples or apostles, whom he frequently declared did not understand him nor his teachings. So much for the Mission of Christ; now let us see what he said about

THE MEANS OF SALVATION.

Did Jesus teach salvation through "faith in his atoning blood," and would not this have been the one great theme of his discourse if it was the way he came to establish? Most assuredly, but he did no such thing; but in every instance where he taught how to enter into Eternal Life, or the Kingdom of Heaven, he explicitly declared that it would be gained through righteousness and good works!

In Matt. viii : 21. we read : "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Matt. v : 20. For I say unto you that except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven." Matt. xix : 16. And behold one came unto him and said, Good Master what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life? Jesus answered, Keep the commandments. * * Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not bear false witness. Honor thy father and thy mother. Love thy neighbor as thyself." Why didn't he say "Thou shalt believe in my atoning blood, or be damned," if that were the one thing needful? Again in Luke x : 25 to 38, a certain lawyer said, Master what shall I do to inherit eternal life? Jesus asked, "What is written in the commandments?" The lawyer repeated them, and Jesus said, "This do and thou shalt live." Then he gave the parable of the good Samaritan, which most emphatically proves that good works, not faith in anything or anybody, are the means of grace and the passport to happiness. Again in Matt. ix : 13. it is said : "Go ye and learn what that meaneth. I will have mercy, and not sacrifice." Here Jesus by implication repudiates the Paganistic idea of sacrifice as an atonement for sin, which the Jews had learned from the Egyptians, and which St. Paul incorporated into Christianity, putting the new wine of his inspiration into the old sacrificial goat-skin bottles of Judaism, in which faith he had been educated.

But the crowning evidence, the final proof from which there is no escape, that Jesus taught personal merit, and good works, not "imputed righteousness" as the passport to heaven, is found in Matt. xxv : 31 to 46. Here the final judgment is portrayed, which is to settle the questions, "What shall I do to be saved?" and, "Who are to be justified, and who condemned?" When a sentence is to be passed that is to settle the fate of all the parties in question, then is the time above all others, when the grounds of the decision should be, and always are, stated, in human tribunals at least. Now if salvation from hell (be that what it may) consisted in the vicarious atonement, or belief in the merits or blood of Jesus, or in a belief that the Bible is the Word of God, or in a belief in any of the creeds or ceremonies of any church under heaven, this was the occasion when Jesus himself, the highest authority in this world, should and would have so stated! But he said to those on the right hand, "Come ye beloved of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world, for"—Why? You have been converted and believe in the atonement? No such thing! It was their good deeds toward their fellowmen which gained their inheritance, and the want of such which condemned those on the other hand. With such clear and positive evidence I think the position that Jesus did not come as "a propitiation for the sins of the world," and did not teach salvation from the consequences of sin through faith in his merits, is fully established. It was St. Paul, and the early Christian Fathers, who thus "made the truth of God of none effect, teaching for doctrine the commandments (and traditions) of men." It is an exorable law of Nature that "Whoso doeth wrong shall suffer for the wrong which he hath done." The penalty is the inevitable effect of the act, and continues until the sinner through suffering is purified and "works out his own salvation" by overcoming evil with good in his own being. This is the law of justice established in "the eternal fitness of things," proven by all human experience, declared by the unequivocal teachings of Jesus, and demonstrated by revelations from "the great cloud of witnesses who compass us about from the Spirit World, who unitedly declare that they are rewarded in that life "according to the deeds done in the body," and are just as happy or miserable as their spiritual condition while in the flesh fitted them to be.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF ASTROLOGY.—NO. 1.

"No part of natural philosophy manifests more strikingly the truth of the axiom that all science has prevision for its end: an axiom which separates science from erudition, which relates the events of the past, without any regard to the future."—Comte's Positive Philosophy.

Astrology is sneered at as a relic of the dark ages, as an exploded superstition, a something which cannot merit the slightest notice of the intelligent only as a thing of contempt. But this contemptible, exploded superstition challenged the veneration and respect of philosophers and religious devotees alike for thousands of years, till about three hundred years ago. Till this time Astrology recognized the Ptolemaic doctrine of the universe, and when the heliocentric theory of the solar system displaced the geocentric, a corresponding distrust of Astrology, the exponent of the geocentric theory, took hold of the public mind. The divorce between the public and Astrology was too sudden, too much the result of an impulsive judgment, to be entirely just; and the usual reaction in human judgment must yet be more just to the art or science which had befriended humanity for so many ages. Perhaps it would not be too much to assert that nearly every religion upon which the faith, hopes and fears of humanity have been based has been simply an outgrowth of Astrology. Even Science, which in its dignity treads Astrology under its feet, is indebted to it for the keyword of its existence, Law. The words of Comte are so much to the point in this respect, that they are here given entire:

"Magic is a relic of polytheistic, or even fetich superstition; whereas, Astrology and alchemy are merely a too bold extension of the positive spirit, before the theological philosophy was got rid of. That the two classes have been confounded is owing to religious vindictiveness, and is a natural consequence of the antipathy between science and theology. No doubt, mediæval Astrology exhibits strong traces of theological influence in its supposition that the universe was made for man—a notion which gave way only on the discovery of the earth's motion; but, apart from that, it is evident that the doctrine rested upon the subordination of all phenomena to invariable natural laws. Its original title of Judicial Astrology conveyed this. No scientific analysis existed at that time which could restrain the ideal exaggeration attributed to celestial influences. In such a state of things, it was certainly right that human reason, resting upon the only phenomena whose laws were ascertained, should endeavor to refer to them all other phenomena, even human and social. This was the rational scientific course; and its universality and persistence till the seventeenth century prove its agreement with the corresponding situation. If we look at its action upon the general education of the human mind, we shall find that it was most serviceable in disseminating everywhere a first notion of the subordination of all phenomena to invariable laws, by which rational prevision became possible."—Comte's Positive Philosophy.

No doubt "ideal exaggerations" attached themselves to Astrology—much that was fanciful and superstitious which had never been verified by either reason or experience, and very likely the ideal overshadowed the real. But as when some men lose faith in Christianity, they too often, in their newly fledged iconoclastic zeal, tread under their feet bright and essential truths, which may require many years of soul sorrow and experience to retrieve, so when Astrology fell from its high estate, few cared to ask whether in the grave to which they had consigned it they had not buried precious jewels of truth.

What were the claims of Astrology? Simply that from the celestial orbs there was a continual outflowing into space, which influenced whatever orbs came within reach of the rays in certain angles, similar to crystalization.

What does Astronomy claim in this age of scientific research? Planetary perturbations in their orbits are not only demonstrated to exist, but are calculated with mathematical precision, and still more the very outflow of the stars are submitted to chemical analysis, and their constituent parts determined. Thus far Astrology and Astronomy run in paralld lines, Astronomy lending strength to Astrology. Now, at what point comes the divergency? Perhaps even the Astronomer might be puzzled to determine the point of divergence. While there exist solar and lunar tides in the ocean and atmosphere coincident with the relative positions of sun, moon and earth, it will not be disputed that at least the sun and moon exert a physical influence over the earth. We may go further, a more subtle influence has been observed, by which the human constitution, and that of plants and animals are affected. Dr. Dick, the Christian philosopher, who was not favorably disposed to Astrology, writes in his work on the Sidereal Heavens.

"The universe is one great whole; and all its parts, however remote, must be supposed to have a certain relation to one another; and they may produce an influence, however small and imperceptible, on each other at the greatest distances. * * * While too much has doubtless been attributed to the influence of comets, it would be verging to an extreme to maintain that they can produce no effect at all on our earth and atmosphere. We know that certain celestial bodies produce a powerful influence on our globe. The moon in conjunction with the solar influence rules the regular returns of ebb and flow. Its light not only cheers our winter nights, but produces a variety of other influences both on the human constitution, the atmosphere, and on the productions of the earth; and there may be many effects produced by its agency with which we are as yet unacquainted."

And in a foot note he adds:

Western Isles, 'that peat dug in the increase of the moon

"It is stated by Mr. Martin, in his 'Description of the continues moist, and never burns clear, while the contrary is observed of that cut in the decrease; and that earthen dykes thrown up in the latter season are alone found to possess stability.' It is also stated as a fact, that if an animal fresh killed be exposed to the moon's rays, it will in a few hours become putrid, while another animal only a few feet distant protected from their influence, will not be in the least affected; that fruits exposed to moonlight have been known to ripen much more readily; that plants bleached in the dark recover their color from the beams of a full moon; and that in South America, trees cut at the full moon split almost immediately, as if torn asunder by great external force."

It is objected to Astrology that in as much as planetary force is purely physical, its effects can only be mechanical, and cannot affect those events depending on the action of mentality. It is now an open question whether mentality is not essentially mechanical, at least Prof. Tyndall, in his reply to his critics, among many good things, utters the following :

"We believe that every thought and every feeling has its definite mechanical correlative in the nervous system—that it is accompanied by a certain separation and rearranging of the atoms of the brain. This latter process is purely physical; and were the faculties we now possess sufficiently strengthened, without the creation of any new faculty, it would doubtless be within the range of our augmented power to infer from the molecular state of the brain the character of the thought acting upon it, and conversely, to infer from the thought the exact corresponding molecular condition of the brain."

Therefore in the face of these inferences, it would be presumptuous to draw the line where planetary influence should stop. It would be wiser to subject the matter to observation and experience, and pay that deference which is due to the observations and experience of the ages in which Astrology was the great center point of thought.

VOX STELLARUM.

Prof. Tyndall, in his reply to the critics, notices the publication a year ago of a memorial addressed by students of the Catholic University in Ireland to the Episcopal Board of the University. It expressed dissatisfaction with the curriculum marked out for the students of the university; setting forth that the lecture-list for the faculty of Science, published a month before they wrote, did not contain the name of a single professor of the Physical or Natural Sciences. The memorialists deprecate this, and dwell upon the necessity in science. They say :

"The distinguishing mark of this age is its ardor for science. The natural sciences have, within the last fifty years, become the chiefest study in the world; they are in our time pursued with an activity unparalleled in the history of mankind. Scarce a year now passes without some discovery being made in these sciences which, as with the touch of a magician's wand, shivers to atoms theories formerly deemed unassailable. It is through the physical and natural sciences that the fiercest assaults are now made on our religion. No more deadly weapon is used against our faith than the facts incontestably proved by modern researches of education in science."

This memorial was printed, but before it became public, all the copies that could be found were destroyed, and the discontent of the students was in some manner hushed up

Surely in that righteous estimate and just award which we all anticipate at the great gathering of souls, a man's deeds will be set against his omissions and his failures, his wanderings and his falls—what he has done and done well, against what he has left undone or done amiss; the services he has rendered, against the sins he has committed, and the temptations to which he has succumbed. It is the general scope of the Book of our existence by which we shall be judged then, and by which we ought to be estimated now; not solely, not chiefly even, by those frail passages which cheque the volume of the best spent life, but which mercy obscures from the eye of justice and which repentance blots out forever.—W. B. Greg.

WOMAN AND HER SPHERE.

Ever since Adam came across Eve (accepting the old fable, to show antiquity,) woman has perplexed the brains of men, and her exact relations to him, and nature, have ever been the bone of contention. That she might be his equal as a member of the human family, has not been admitted even by the most civilized nations. That any woman intellectually and physically, could be brighter and stronger than many of the male gender, is an idea hardly admissible even now, by many of the opponents of woman's rights. This way of thinking and reasoning has held women back, causing their impressive brains to be filled with corresponding ideas. But what is the condition of affairs to-day? In Europe and America are those who think there may be some mistake in this notion of her general inferiority; and many are beginning to assert their rights; and to measure strength with their brother man. Woman is actually claiming to be the equal of man, in all his social, political, and business relations,—claiming individuality, asking no more, and being satisfied with no less, than her scope of brain and physical power entitle her. Her demands are sanctioned by the thinking men of every land, and opposed by the church, and the ignorant, and brainless devotees to fashion.

Of all the chains which have bound woman to her inferior position, none have held her down so firmly as the bonds of the church. Her nature being devotional, the church became her love, and now that the church may thrive she must not be free. Let woman change her love, and let that new love be her own elevation, whether it be as philosopher, scientist, lawyer, banker, broker or merchant, or the holding of any business position which she may aspire to.

If you think woman is not the sole life of the church, gather the views of the men of your acquaintance and you will find that the majority of these have the cobwebs of theology out of their heads. These men think, and think correspondingly clearer and stronger; and to think is what woman needs to do. Let her drop this upholding of dead ideas, and direct her love for the live ones of to-day, and the church will soon become lecture rooms, and school-houses, and the rostrum will be occupied by the best teachers in the arts and sciences. Then woman, knowing the grand laws of nature, can study her sphere, and divine her future. By this exercise of her reasoning faculties, she will gain an expansion of brain, and will no longer be hampered by a circumscribed education, and terrified by ancient fables. Some say the church has been our great moral teacher and as such should be supported. In part granted; but she, at the same time, has held the world back more than a thousand years, and for the future, having so far progressed in knowledge and science, we can afford to make one more step forward, and step out of it, and thus fully dispense with the never ceasing beggary of the clerical corps—then learn to live, love, act and work by science and her immutable laws.

I would not be understood as seeking to draw woman from her offices of charity, and as the teacher of high moral principles—far from it. I would have her hold all these, but cut loose from the senseless slavery to fashion which not only costs millions to maintain, but which sacrifices her individuality as well. I would have her reason more, make Gods of love for herself, and build up her destiny by high acts.

It is with these ideas woman needs to be impressed, and then she can assert her rights with a force—free her mind of all this superstition and reverence for what was 2,000 or 10,000 years ago, and wake her up to the events of the present, to the ignorance and misery of thousands of her own sex. Then her sphere will be made clear. Now while the question of woman's social relation and elevation is being argued one way by the radical element, it is being treated in another by Science—that great overpowering treadmill which grinds dogmas to powder, and weighs all things in the scale of demonstrated fact.

In the words of Prof. Tyndall, "Science has already leavened the world, and it will leaven it more and more." Intelligent men and women will make Science their church, the greatest scientists of the day will be their pastors, and Papal bulls and Papal infallibility will be but fading follies of the human mind.

So let woman wipe from her brow the theological dust of ages, open her mind to the live present, look higher, study her own nature, exercise the latent intelligence within her, and seek to solve the great problems of mind and matter, ever asserting her rights boldly for equal mental cultivation, equal pay, equal rights in the field of labor and equality in every way.

While science is doing well its part for woman's elevation, her "rights" must be regarded in the light of a political question, and as with all other issues, for its speedy advancement there must be effort and sacrifices—a concentration of forces, and harmony.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILIZATION.

The subject for discussion before the Society for Self Culture, on Sunday last, was: Does Christianity promote the highest civilization? Jas. Battersby, one of the founders of the Self Culture Society, presided, having recently been elected in place of Dr. White, resigned.

The first speaker was H. L. Knight, who talked on both sides of the question. In his opinion modern Christianity is not the simon-pure article. It has become corrupted, is doing nothing now for the regeneration of mankind. It has passed its period of usefulness, and is rather a hindrance than a help to the progress of civilization. Some missionaries are still doing a good work, introducing the inventions of enlightened nations among people bordering on barbarism, but in the foremost nations of the earth there is no longer need for Christianity, such as it has become, a means of display for the votaries of fashion, the weapon of the rich to hold sway over the poor—the means by which those in power continue to rule the people.

Prof. Chaney followed in the negative. He asserted that the founders of our Government, with few exceptions, were infidels, the most notable being Payne, Franklin and Jefferson. Washington believe just as they did, but was more politic in the expression of his news.—The professor gave a few specimens of Washington's prayers. The Government, organized by such men, got along well, for more than sixty years, a refuge for the persecuted of all creeds, the home of the heathen, the infidel, the jew and other disbelievers in Christ; it grew in power and strength, asking no aid of Christianity, when it was suddenly discovered that the Christian's God is not recognized in the constitution, and a great hullabaloo is kicked up, because it is not a Christian country, while, almost in the same breath, they point to America as a specimen of Christian civilization. [The professor had not time to bring out all his points when the gavel fell.]

Dr. White followed, in a speech affirming the proposition that Christianity promotes the highest civilization. He claimed Washington as a highly religious man, said an old Quaker once caught him on his knees, and that he was a firm believer. He also claimed that the Puritan Fathers leavened the whole lump of American civilization, and that all our laws were founded on the Christian idea, recognizing the Christian Sabbath, and requiring the Christian oath in courts. He also said that Christ was the first teacher of the Golden Rule. He defied proof to the contrary.

Mr. Haly said our highest civilization, such as it is, exists in spite of Christianity, which has opposed progress everywhere. We are not indebted to Christianity for what we are; on the contrary Christianity is indebted to Paganism for what it is. It came from India, down through Egypt to modern Greece and Rome. The very laws we live under came to us from Pagan Rome. There are no real Christians to-day. Christ was a friend of all the poor, an international, a communist; if lived to-day he would be rejected by the very ones who are now singing psalms to his name in fine churches.

J. M. Days spoke briefly to the effect that true Christianity would be consistent with the highest civilization, but there is not a church in Christendom which preaches the doctrines Christ taught. All these churches require a belief in something which practically is of no use. Stock-jobbers, land grabbers and oppressors of the poor, can all subscribe to the Christian dogma, "Trust in Jesus," but it does not affect their character; it makes them no more just to their fellow men, no more charitable, and they are in fact not worthy to be called Christians, for Christ said "become as I am," act justly, do good deeds.

Mrs. Chaney made a lively little speech to the effect that the proper answer to the question at issue depends altogether upon what we mean by Christianity. Christ was a humanitarian; he aspired to the highest good for his fellow men. His idea of salvation was the salvation of the human race from oppression, and from wrong and suffering of every kind. If we mean by Christianity a grand humanitarian gospel, she would agree that it is promotive of the highest civilization, but if we mean the narrow idea of Christianity set forth in church creeds, she dissented from the proposition. She spoke at some length as to the importance of living good lives, of studying the laws of nature, and of seeking to improve the race by obeying the laws.

A lady, whose name we did not hear, denounced Christianity as the greatest curse of the earth. She could see no good in it. The Protestants are not much better than the Catholics. There are a few sincere, but most are hypocrites, and their religion encourages than in hypocrisy, and hold out to them the hope of happiness without good works.

The President, Mr. Battersby, closed with a few earnest words, and announced that J. W. Mackee has consented to open the debate to-morrow on the same subject.

Our deepest gratitude is due, not to the pure and sinless, but to the greatly-daring and the strongly-doing; not to the monk in his convent or the ascetic on his pillar, but to the warrior in a good cause, to the advancer in a grand enterprise, to the laborer in a noble work.—W. R. Greg.

He who destroys a fallacy, who eradicates an error, and who establishes a healing principle or a prolific truth, and reduces the amount of error, confers a benefit of which the extent is simply incalculable, because its direction and its field of operation are absolutely illimitable.—W. R. Greg

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, FEB. 27, 1875.

THE INDEPENDENT LYCEUM (Sixth and Market) will discuss "The Vicarious Atonement" on Sunday afternoon. An interesting letter will be read from Charles E. Pickett Esq., now confined in the California Bastile by arbitrary order of a Supreme Court Judge. All are invited.

THE OVERLAND.—This sterling monthly, which gives more matter of interest to Californians than any other serial, has an excellent table of contents for March. It has several interesting stories, an instinctive article on communism, by W. W. Crane, and "The Friendships of Men and Women," by that entertaining and always sensible writer, Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper.

The progress made in the science of chemistry during the last quarter of a century is astounding to those capable of comprehending it at a glance. The domain of organic chemistry is growing wider and wider, and bids fair soon to embrace fields which have heretofore been supposed to belong exclusively to the Spiritual. In fact it is generally admitted by scientists, as well as by most Spiritualists, that spirits are material bodies animated as are our bodies by living souls.

MEDIUMS:—Mrs. S. F. Breed, who is one of the best-rapping and impressional mediums in the city, has recently moved from 128 Kearny street to No. 30 O'Farrell. Mrs. Cummings, who is much better known in the city than Mrs. Breed, and whose circles are always well attended, has changed her evenings for public seances, giving now on Sunday and Wednesday evening only. Mrs. Aitken, also a well known and excellent medium, has circles on Sunday and Friday evenings. Mrs. Morey, (late Mrs. Sproul) has taken rooms at 212 Post street, between Stockton and Dupont. Mrs. C. M. Stowe is still at 410 Kearny, where, as Physician, Business and Test Medium, she is doing a good business.

A seed which for fifteen hundred years had been covered with the debris of an ancient mine—near Athens, was recently unearthed, and being exposed to the warmth of the sun, has sprouted, and pushed forth a blossom unknown to modern science, but described by Pliny.

HAMMOND AS SHYLOCK.

The following is an extract from the published speech of Hon. Louis Benecke, of the Missouri Senate, on Senate Bill No. 398, entitled "An Act to protect peaceable citizens against the impositions of religious and temperance fanatics."

Speaking of Hammond and his revival campaigning, Senator Benecke says:—

"It appears, from evidence in my possession, that he loaned some of his surplus money to a farmer in one of the adjoining States, who, to secure this loan, gave a deed of trust upon his homestead. As the time drew near when this loan became payable, the farmer found himself unable to pay the debt, and having some faith in the teachings of this Evangelist, he wrote to him, asking an indulgence till he could realize cost for his produce. As this loan bore interest at the rate of eighteen (18) per cent. per annum, it was but reasonable that his urgent request should be granted.

But what did this great reformer do? Did he grant the request? No! He wrote to his attorney, living near the said debtor.

"Press this man to the wall. * * * Yours in Jesus."

The Senator said "the evidence to prove this comes from gentlemen whose veracity and known character will not allow even a suspicion of a doubt." He had the names, and would be in readiness to give them if necessary.

REV. N. G. MERRY, pastor of the First Colored Baptist Church, Nashville, Tenn., publishes a letter about the failure of the Freedman's Bank of that place. He says: "In 1871, Rev J. W. Alvord, president of the bank, got me to call a meeting in my church, that he might speak to my people. I introduced Mr. Alvord, who commenced by saying: 'I sometimes preach, but now I will talk to you about banks. You ask me, Is the bank safe? I'll ask you, Is Uncle Sam safe? (Many voices—'Yes, he is safe.' Another voice—'Can the bank break?') I'll answer you by asking, Can you break Uncle Sam? (Cries of 'No! no!') Then you can never break this bank. You can break Uncle Sam just as soon as you can break this bank. Every dollar of this bank is invested in United States bonds. I took a look over her bonds just before I left Washington." Mr. Alvord is a preacher, and I am one also. I want the world and all mankind to know that I have now found out that Rev. J. W. Alvord stood up in my pulpit and told a lie, thereby fooling many, and increasing the confidence of all present in the bank.

Although telegraphing is much cheaper in England than in America, yet the American system is far superior to the English, and there is now a prospect that the automatic telegraph will soon be so perfected that a great reduction in prices will be inaugurated.

It is said that Brother Hammond is on more familiar terms with the Almighty than any other man in California. He speaks of God as glibly as if he were the old gentleman's "only son," much more familiarly, in fact, than the mendicant of Judea ever presumed to talk.

SPIRITUALISTS' UNION LECTURES.

Miss Fannie Allyn returned on Sunday last to the platform of the Spiritualists' Union, bringing with her a return of full health, apparently. The enthusiastic manner with which her audience greeted her, evinced a pleasant interest in her welfare. She will speak both afternoon and evening, for several successive Sundays, from this platform, as the spirits give her utterance. The absolute surrender to the Controls, by which her mediumship is marked, gives a double charm to her lectures and keeps the chairs full—much to the joy of the finance committee.

The intelligences that talk through Miss Allyn are always interesting, though, from the very fruitfulness of their thought, some trains of ideas are overtaken by new propositions before they are exhibited in full to the listener, and are thereby obscured, but when we consider the dashing, off-hand manner with which the Control takes up the various subjects propounded, we only wonder that they are treated as clearly as they are. All the questions asked on Sunday afternoon were answered in extenso, or commented upon in a manner that proved the disembodied are as full of wit and humor as before they “shuffled of the mortal coil.” These friendly teachers “over the border” are however a little too nimble for material reporters, and we shall attempt only to recall a few distinctive thoughts as they fastened upon us.

“Do their works follow them into the future life?”—a subject the enquirer said he heard discussed by a minister in the morning. The speaker said: From the Spiritualists' stand-point our works do follow us into the future life, and the future life is the life to come in the next twenty minutes. We must be reasonable, not deny the existence of things till they have had time for development. This truth is illustrated in the bouquet of flowers which the speaker takes from a vase on the table; as well say there is no violet before the petals put forth. We are told to follow this and that leader—Wesley, Spurgeon, Beecher (here the controlling spirit in deference to a prevailing sentiment, archly fell into a parenthesis and said)—“not follow him in all his ways.”

“Was the lady of Endor a medium?” one of the slips asks. The Control is glad to see this woman called a lady; it is an unusual honor; it used to be the woman of Endor or the witch of Endor. The lady of Endor was undoubtedly a medium. “Was Samson a medium?” asks another. The Control thinks he was, though the stories we have been told about that old man are not true, altogether. Several questions were answered apparently to the satisfaction of the interrogators, and then followed a beautiful poetical improvisation. Both the lecture and poem were full of the spirit which teaches that Spiritualism, to be good for anything, must become practical in all its phases; its adherents must become more and more amiable, charitable, and true in their lives. It will enable us to turn ourselves right side out—whereas we have been all the time wrong side out. The outside has been speaking, but Spiritualism comes to bring the inside, the soul to the surface.

It is said that the evening lecture was still better than the afternoon discourse, and the audience larger.

THE PHILOMATHEANS.

Last Sunday night, the first meeting of the Philomatheans was held at Social Hall, 89 Fourth street. Prof. Chaney briefly explained the object of the association. He said:

Other societies have isms to support, and whenever the good of humanity comes in conflict with their isms, the ism must be sustained, even at the expense of humanity. This association proposes a contrary course. The public good demands the sacrifice of isms, and therefore the people should be educated to regard them with disfavor. Truth should be the great aim, yet we have seen in all the history of the past that whenever a society has organized upon an ism, no matter whether Paganism, Christianity, Infidelity or Spiritualism, its members have become partisan in the support of the ism, which is too often borne in triumph over the prostrate forms of Truth and Justice. Philomatheans have no ism, and this will avert nine-tenths of the wrangling which characterise churches and societies. Moreover, there will be no signing of constitutions, drafting of Rules of Order, or levying of assessments. The public will be invited, the seats made free, every person present considered a Philomathean, a voluntary contribution taken up, and if not sufficient to meet current expenses, then I will make up all deficits. If more than enough, I will retain it to be expended to meet future deficiencies, or in behalf of the cause for which the society is organized. The platform will be free for all purposes tending to elevate the race, but not free for the promulgation of doctrines which tend to degradation. I will assume the control in all these matters, since I have assumed all the responsibility. I will resign the control, however, to any one who will assume the responsibility, for both should be in the same person. I will procure other lecturers as opportunity occurs, with the understanding that they lecture free, or for a nominal sum, and will always lecture myself when others cannot be had, so that the Philomatheans will have a lecture every Sunday night. All are invited to write questions and hand up to be answered, and eventually the audience will be expected to take part.

The lecture last Sunday night was upon “The Phenomena of Physical Life.” The Hall was well filled, the audience evidently of an intellectual type, and all seemed deeply interested. Prof. Chaney will lecture again to-morrow night, at 7½ o'clock upon “The Phenomena of Intellectual Life,” to be followed by the “Phenomena of Moral Life,” and the “Phenomena of Spiritual Life.” These subjects are of interest to every one, and the Professor handles them in a way peculiarly his own.

All substance is spirit force more or less solidified; all individualized intelligences are the result of individualized spirit germs that have ever existed as such: no parents create children but simply frame conditions that can attract the spirit germs; when born it is born into spirit life as to the positive part, but a reflex or negative passes through the earth life to gain the experiences of earth life, and the union of the positive and negative takes place at death, when they become one and inseparable. The time is fast approaching when that union will have the power to materialize or dematerialize at will, and there will be no more death.—Benj. Todd.

To serve others, even in miry by-ways, in menial capacities, in damaging and revolting conditions, is a worthier and more Christian vocation, than coddling ones' individual soul.—W. R. Greg.

PROF. CHANEY IN VIRGINIA CITY.

ED. COMMON SENSE :—The Professor is amongst us. His Anti-Roman Catholic lectures have drawn large audiences, and his Astrological hearers are increasing in numbers, as the course on this subject progresses. I did not hear the first. I am hearing the last. The subject will require more than a few hours for digestion. It is so many hundred years since the human mind has tried its powers in the direction of astrology, that its presentation produces mental dyspepsia. However, with the explanations of the Professor, we find our prejudices diminish, and are forced to admit that there are still more things in the heavens than are dreamt of in our philosophy.

UNIVERSAL HARMONY seems to be the Professor's motto. With this magnificent foundation, it is argued that ante-natal influences determine the character of the coming man, they also determine when he shall come; and the position of the celestial orbs is found by experience to have a definite relation thereto, by virtue of the law of universal harmony. They do not act as causes but are merely signifiers, a sort of handwriting on the wall.

There are some queries in this connection which present themselves; but I defer mentioning them at present. One thing is certain. It is that the Professor is a speaker of uncommon ability, his audience, after two hours and a half, being anxious to have him proceed. At the close of each lecture a successful attempt at casting a horoscope was made, and so acknowledged in every case.

The Professor deplors the existence of a division in the Spiritualistic ranks in your city, whereby much force is wasted that is needed on the outside. He says he is above isms, only desiring to work for the common good. All claim to have the same good intentions, but ordinary mortals wonder how this noble end, the common good, is to be reached by such widely divergent routes. The antagonisms of individuals, I suppose, like that of individual planets, result in general harmony.

Viewing the whole subject from my own constellation, Bonanea Major, I am of the opinion that Prof. Chaney, in attempting to solve the religious and theological riddles of the day mythologically, has struck a vein from which rich developments may be expected.

E. STEVENSON, M. D.

Virginia, Nev. Feb. 18, 1875.

We also received a note from Prof. Chaney, in which he says:

Although summoned ostensibly to lecture against Romanism, still I availed myself of the opportunity to give four lectures upon the Bible, which was the means of making me acquainted with many of the liberalists and Spiritualists there. Mrs. Dettenrieder is a model reformer in every way. She invited me to her house, where I was made welcome, a la a clergyman, and then she sold more than a dozen season tickets to my lectures, refusing to even accept a complimentary for herself or daughter. I am so unaccustomed to such generosity that I take pleasure in recording it. I was also the recipient of another favor there—the parties who invited me to give the lectures against Romanism tendered me the free use of a hall for my four lectures on the Bible, which would have otherwise cost me $10 per night. Verily, the people of Virginia city have won my lasting gratitude.

I also met with several mediums and lecturers while there. Mrs. Dr. Larkin arrived just as I was leaving, and commenced a course of lectures to the ladies. Mrs. Larkin is doing a good work by teaching her sex the laws which govern their being, and their rights as wives.

Mrs. Bell Chamberlain was there, lecturing, giving seances and healing the sick. I engaged her to lecture before the Philomatheans when she visits San Francisco, which will be during March. Like myself, Mrs. Chamberlain is a sort of scout, fighting on her own responsibility, with no ism to support, and therefore not afraid to lecture before the Philomatheans. San Francisco is large enough to sustain several liberal platforms, and at least one the chief aim of which is the devotion of the race. Mrs. Chamberlain will probably remain here several weeks, during which other towns and cities will find it to their interest to engage her services.

Since my return home I have received a letter from Dr. E. W. Shortridge, whom I met in Virginia city, saying that he should arrive here inside of three weeks, with a view of remaining some time. He will make San Francisco his headquarters, but will answer calls to lecture before Spiritual and liberal societies in the vicinity of this city. The doctor was formerly an Advent clergyman of many years experience, and was, in 1872, when I first made his acquaintance, in Oregon. We came very near having a public debate on the Bible, at the time, and were introduced with that object in view. Since then he has become converted to Spiritualism.

I ought not to close this sketch without acknowledging the pleasure I experienced from a brief acquaintance with Dr. Stevenson. He is a most earnest reformer, and a very intelligent gentleman. He thinks of coming to this city at some future day, to practice his profession.

W. H. CHANEY.

MRS. L. E. DRAKE.—We learn by a letter from a friend in Stockton that this lady is meeting with good success there. On Sunday afternoon she gave a lecture exclusively to ladies, and in the evening she spoke in Pioneer Hall on "God in the Constitution." A note from Mrs. Drake herself, concludes as follows:

I sometimes feel discouraged on account of the lack of interest among Spiritualists, but the only way is to work the harder, and if we fail at last, we will have the consolation of knowing we have done our duty. It is better to fail in a good work than never to have started, for others who will come after us will take up the work where we leave off and carry it on to a full completion; therefore let us all work, and hope, and wait.

Most respectfully and earnestly yours for Truth.

L. E. DRAKE.

The out-look over the world shows a fearful increase of the family of idiots, insane, blind, diseased and wretched people. That there are active causes at work producing these effects; none can doubt. What are there causes? We reply. Whatever fathers and mothers in their creative capacity have left undone or whatever they have misdone previous or subsequent to birth, the criminal judge or idiot trainer must try to do for the irresponsible victims of their thoughtless or willful ignorance. The people are taxed for public and private charities. The causes of premature decay, resulting in sorrow and suffering, filling asylums with orphans and the street with hoodlums, lie deeper—are found far back of barrooms and whisky shops. Come, let us reason together and unmask the demons that seek to destroy the people.—Mrs. C. F. Young.

CO-OPERATION.

At a recent meeting of the Friends of Progress, Mr. Edward Dieren, in the course of some remarks criticising the action of the Circle, made some practical suggestions on the subject of co-operation in the purchase of family supplies. He said :

For a successful Co-operative Association, we require five hundred members, each of whom will pay $10 into a common fund as a working capital. Our Friends of Progress number now 100 or more members ; I hope every one will sign $10 for the purpose of establishing a co-operative store. When we have secured 250 subscribers to the stock, the money will be called for and a store established.

My estimate is that with a working capital of about $5,000, a yearly trade of from $50,000 to $60,000 can be reached, and after deducting expenses, the company will make a profit of about $5000.

Mr. Dieren here made a calculation concerning the future accumulation of capital, which could hardly be realized. He intimated that if it doubled the first year it might continue to increase in the same ratio ! A very hopeful calculation, to say the least. He continued :

When we will consider that we have the second year a working capital of $10,000, properly invested, we may hope that as our capital increases, and our industry advances, we shall soon be on the road to Independence. Our working class will not be required to beg for work from the capitalists. We, the Friends of Progress, will then employ the Friends ourselves ; we will then have our own schools, and give the masses an education. Organization makes strong and independent, and we all will then be an organized force against the oppression of capital.

Friends, I wish you would commence the work at once, and I assure you, we will be successful. Our Order will be spread quickly over the whole United States ; our co-operative stores established everywhere, we will then work as a body, and in time those who sympathize with us will govern cities and States for the good of humanity, and will pass laws, not for the rich man, but for the poorer classes, and will give in general an impulse to the advancement of the race.

A. C. Stowe remarked that stores on the co-operative plan have been thoroughly tried, and proved failures. He believes in co-operation, but not in that form. Mr. Pierson could see no reason why co-operative stores conducted by honest men should not be successful. Mrs. Smith explained the method adopted by the Sovereigns of Industry, which has been highly successful at the East. They do not establish stores of their own, but combine to throw their trade into one channel, then make arrangements with dealers to furnish goods at a discount. In this way a great saving has been effected. After further discussion a committee was appointed to examine the subject of co-operation, obtain statistics, and report their conclusions to the Circle.

[As the United Order Friends of Progress is a secret society, we do not feel at liberty to publish the remarks entire, especially those of Mr. Dieren, which were appropriate at the time and place, but not for publication.—Ed.]

Mr. Parkes, a London photographer, has developed the power to take pictures of invisible spirits at night by the use of the magnesium light.

RADICAL TALK—THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The Society for Self Culture on the 14th inst. discussed the question : Is the present mode of managing mining stock defensible ? Among the speakers was Pat J. Healy, a radical thinker, who spoke in substance as follows :

It is no more reprehensible to flood the community with watered mining stock than to flood it with shoddy made in mills where children under eight years have to work eleven hours a day under the cruel eye of a Massachusetts slave driver ; and it is quite as moral as to flood the market with cove oysters 11 ounces to the pound. In fact we have no standard of morality except success in accumulating the "coin of the realm." Unfair dealing in mining stock is the logical outgrowth of the false system of society under which we exist, and which we are responsible for, in so far as we recognize the evil, and do not seek to mitigate it.

As long as the people of this country allow the Government to dispose of the public domain as if it were in a hurry to get rid of it, so long will we have corruption from one end of the land to the other. Why do people invest in mines, and seek other risky means of making a livelihood ? It is because society is so constructed that there is no guarantee that the efforts of the individual will be rewarded with commensurate results. There is no just correspondence between honest efforts for existence and the product enjoyed. These adventurers recognize this fact, more or less clearly, and consequently seek to obtain an amount of intrinsic value without giving therefore the usual equivalent in time. Society makes the precious metals a medium of exchange, and of intrinsic value—valuable independent of the manner of their production or of the function they perform—and this value is mainly attached to them from the fact that society allows its individual members to alienate from themselves the essential conditions of life for a certain consideration of these precious metals. It allows one individual to extend his personality over the elements of another individual's existence. Nearly all the evils that result from grinding monopolies are directly traceable to this fatal principle of individual ownership of land ; in as much as he who controls the land controls the water upon its surface, as well as the atmosphere that bathes it with its recuperating zephyrs ; and J. S. Mill never uttered a more profound sentence, that "He who controls my physical subsistence controls my moral nature." Among the many evils which this evil system may be justly charged with are the following : The insecurity of life and personal property ; the necessity of a constantly increasing multitude of laws and their interpreters, which alienate men from productive industry, and render exorbitant taxation a necessity ; unnatural competition, which destroys itself periodically by over-production, thence idleness and periodic famine by which whole districts are liable to starve or live on the charity of others ; the destruction of moral and physical integrity, by which the present state of things is intensified, and the destruction of the family and all the associations of home. These are a few of the evils that are the result of the system of private ownership of the soil, a system which is gradually making our government a government of the few over the many for the benefit of the few ; and I claim that Sharon, Ralston, and others of that ilk, are not a whit worse than we are ; but on the contrary they are "building wiser than they know ;" they are unconsciously bringing about a state of affairs which will render a change imperative, and are thus helping on the car of progress. Our duty lies in striving to root out the cause or causes of our present condition of society, so that the grandest possibility ever given to man for enjoying a free and pure government may not result in failure.

"COME TO JESUS."

The success which that Reverend mountebank, Hammond, is meeting in California is not creditable to the good sense of our people. He travels about from place to place, telling the same stories, in precisely the same way, and bringing to bear the same theatrical appliances to aid him in producing a temporary impression on his hearers, called "conversion." The influence of "revivals" is essentially evil, especially on children, who are the main objects of Hammond's efforts. Revival preaching gives them false ideas of their own position, and worth, inculcates false notions as to their duty, and cheats them with the hope of obtaining good by other means than the cultivation of their own character; it narrows their souls, dwarfs their intellect, and makes them little bundles of self-complacency, unchildlike and unnatural. It is most pernicious in its effects. Of the "children of an older growth" who are converted more than half of them, when the psychological effect passes away, are worse "sinners" than before; and of the other half a large proportion, ashamed to "backslide," become hypocrites, while the very few sincere are those who are naturally inclined to piety, and would have been in every respect better, more liberal, more charitable and truly religious, if they had never been roped into a church during a revival excitement.

We are indebted to a Sacramento friend for the Record's report of the debate on Sunday last, in Pioneer Hall, at a regular meeting of the Educational Association.

Josiah Johnson said that in view of the religious excitement, it would be well to direct the discussion into the religious channel. He believes that the business of life should be the development of the faculties—education, mentally, morally and physically. This is what it is "to be saved," but those who ask the question, "what shall we do to be saved?" are told by our religious teachers "Come to Jesus." If by this they mean to do justice, to act rightly, to be obedient to all moral and physical law, then the free thinker is with them. But when they are asked what is meant by coming to Jesus, no intelligent answer is given. * * * The naturalist says that nature does everything, and that there is nothing outside of nature—there is no need of going outside of nature to account for anything that is or is done. The scientist refers everything to energy, for energy fully accounts for all that is, and is fully competent to perform all that is done in the universe. Another class hold to the idea of spirit all pervading, acting upon matter—that spirit is ultimate force. Another class resolves that there is one God—Jehovah—of sufficient power to perform all the creative acts we see done. In their final analysis these things are all alike. In the first place, it is nature; in the next, it is energy; in the next, the Spirit of God. Can you assume anything outside of nature? Can you think of anything not done by energy? Can you think of anything done outside of the spirit? Can you conceive of anything outside of God? It will be perceived that the use of different terms to designate the same thing has produced superficial and intangible differences. In a fundamental sense there is a unity in these truths—all amount to the same thing. Paul says, "God is the Father of us all, over all and through all." Then nature, science, law, the emotional nature of man and his reason, are all prophets of God. * * * Our religious friends are undoubtedly doing the best they can, and we ought to say "God speed you," and we ought to help them to a better understanding of things, so that they may the more easily gain the results they seek. An ordinary mind does not understand this "coming to Jesus," while the more intelligent mind only understands it to mean an application of the laws which govern this life and which govern the growth of the soul, to the actions of men. They might say, "It means you must be merciful, just, and live to be good and do good," but to the masses, this is entirely blank—they can see nothing in it. Of this "coming to Jesus," they know nothing of the philosophy or the use.

Mr. C. W. Hoit referred to the "awakening," and characterized it as a misdirected educational effort. It is an attempt to educate the public mind in theological myths not founded upon fact or proceeding in any line of special utility. What is it to "come to Jesus?" Stripped of all its glittering generalities, it is to come to the ideals and conceptions of those who bid us "come" in that name. All religions have their high ideal, their standard which they hold aloft and bid men come to them. The "Come to Jesus" of the Christian is simply another form of the expression, "Receive my doctrine." To come to our Jesus is to come to us, to be molded by us, to be fashioned in our theological and spiritual likeness. Whatever of differences may exist between Christian sects, the one shibboleth, "Come to Jesus," answers for them all. It must, therefore, be understood to mean the embodiment of the theology of him that uses it. Sects not Christian have its equivalent, and in all cases it must be understood to mean, "Accept my faith—believe my doctrine—come to my ideal—be like me."

Whenever a large number of people are together, holding in active mentally to one single idea, they produce a mental force which overcomes the will of negative persons. This power is exerted in bringing the few to the ideas of the mass. The operation is very simple, and its successful management involves no question of tact or skill. Produce the conditions and the force sets to work itself. With grown people, this requires a strong mental effort on the part of those intent on producing a conversion. As to children, the operation is quite easy. The tender mind of a child is highly susceptible to the influences surrounding it. Men in the audience could take that little boy (pointing to a child) and make him completely subject to their will. When once under that will, the child, of course, would reflect the opinions of its magnetizer. Under this mesmeric state, let the magnetizer question it as to what it feels and believes, and its answer will be in accordance with its desires. Its will has been supplanted by his. In the revivals, these things are taken for the uncontrolled and original experiences of the child, while, in fact, they are but the reflection of the prevailing mind about him. It is the mind of the adult speaking through the child. This is all there is of infant conversion. Referring still to the religious meeting he spoke in a spirit of tolerance and commendation. There are many men living lives not the best to whom a conversion is fraught with promise of good. Conversion to them would produce a change of motive and bring them into new relations, giving hope of reformation. But there is a class of full grown minds to whom this conversion has no significance. They have grown beyond it—many have come up through that road—and these could no more go back to the orthodox faith than a full grown chicken could go back to the shell from which it was hatched.

Mr. Alfred Taylor spoke briefly as to the part the old Church has taken in the education of the world, and said that it has given to mankind many grand truths which will live forever.

TRAINING CHILDREN.

Children who are unsympathetically treated become relatively unsympathetic; whereas treating them with due fellow feeling is a means of cultivating their fellow-feeling. With family governments, as with political ones, a harsh despotism itself generates a great part of the crimes it has to repress; while conversely a mild and liberal rule not only avoids many causes of discussion, but so ameliorates the tone of feeling as to diminish the tendency to transgression. As John Locke long since remarked, "Great severity of punishment does but very little good, nay great harm in education; and I believe it will be found that, ceteris paribus, those children who have been most chastised, seldom make the best of men. * * Do not expect from a child any great amount of moral goodness. Not only is it unwise to set up a high standard for juvenile good conduct, but it is even unwise to use very urgent incitements to such good conduct. Already most people recognize the detrimental results of intellectual precocity; but there remains to be recognized the truth that there is a moral precocity which is also detrimental. Our higher moral faculties, like our higher intellectual ones, are comparatively complex. By consequence they are both comparatively late in their evolution. And with the one as the other, a very early activity produced by stimulation will be at the expense of the future character. Thence the not uncommon fact that those who during childhood were instanced as models of juvenile goodness, by-and-by undergo some disastrous and seemingly inexplicable change and end by being not above but below par; while relatively exemplary men are often the issue of childhood by no means so promising. Be content, therefore, with moderate measures and moderate results. Constantly bear in mind the fact that a higher morality, like a higher intelligence, must be reached by a slow growth; and you will then have more patience with those imperfections of nature which your child hourly displays. You will be less prone to that constant scolding, and threatening, and forbidding, by which many parents induce a chronic domestic irritation, in the foolish hope that they will thus make their children what they should be. Satisfy yourself with seeing that your child always suffers the natural consequences of his actions, and you will avoid that excess of control in which so many parents err. Leave him, whenever you can, to the discipline of experience, and you will so save him from that hot-house virtue which over-regulation produces in yielding natures, or that demoralizing antagonism which it produces in independent ones."—Herbert Spencer on Education.

Spirits, though not mortals, are yet human beings, who continue to possess, for a greater or less time after their transition, all their desires, habits of thought, virtues and vices, in force and activity. The gay and sedate, the cheerful and morose, the kind and unkind, the loving and malignant, the benevolent and miserly, all retain those traits and characteristics which together constituted their earthly personality, and nothing is lost in the change by death but the physical body, the outer covering which has served as the medium through which the purposes of the real man—the spirit—could be effected in the external life. Of the truths that have been revealed through Spiritualism, this is perhaps one of the most difficult to realize, so strong and enduring are the bonds of education; and yet no truth in Spiritualism is more evident, and nearly all the evils that proceed from spiritual intercourse arise from ignorance of, or failure to appreciate, its importance.

BRIEF EXTRACTS.

There are men and women who can never rise to the idea of serving God for nought, and whose devotion and pious observances are little less than a sagacious and safe investment.—W. R. Greg.

Things are either possible or impossible—you can easily determine which in any given state of human science; if impossible, you need not trouble yourselves about it, if possible, try it.—Ruskin.

Woman is not exclusively made for man, or man for woman; sexual harmony is impossible until each is conceded to be an individual exponent of truth, and that real union results only from mutual and constant deference to Essential Right.

No being can have been destined to live merely for the good of man. All that lives has an equal right to exist, and it is merely the right of might which permits man to subject or to kill other living beings. There are no ends which nature had in view to favor a privileged being. Nature is an end in itself.—Buchner's "Force and Matter."

The time is not distant when the pressure of public opinion will not tolerate any idle class living by the sweat of others and affecting to look down on all who have to gain their bread. Every man will have to work regularly and steadily in some way or other, as a duty to society—and when all work, the false shame which the industrious now feel in the presence of the idle, will disappear forever.—Thomas Wright.

The Christian world teaches that labor was cursed; that God cursed man for sin, and its penalty was that he should go out and labor—that he should earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. This is a most pernicious doctrine. Only imagine the effect upon mankind of such a feeling towards labor—labor, without which nothing is or can be done. Christianity would do well to eliminate from its teachings this idea, and teach something more in consonance with nature. Our motto should be "Work and be saved—be idle and be damned."—Josiah Johnson.

Trade Unionism, we are told, tends invariably to the self-emancipation, and, therefore, to the advance of the working classes. Yet at Kidderminster the carpet-weavers have resisted with all the means at their disposal the employment of women in their trade. Who have the truest notions of progress, they who fetter or they who enlarge the scope of woman's activity? Is it endurable that, while the door is being opened for the refining influences of education to reach the hearts and homes of our working women, their husbands and brothers should be denying them the elementary right of earning a living? It is miserable to find the jealousy of one sex seeking to exclude the other from the means of livelihood.—Capital and Labor.

For the Government to issue paper, as it now does, to banks on the purchase with gold and silver of interest-bearing bonds, the Government paying interest on the bonds deposited with it, at the same time it issues notes to the value of the bonds to the banks upon which they can do business and draw another rate of interest out of the people, is a financial outrage upon industry, and ought to damn any government that will tolerate such a thing. It is a management to at once bankrupt the Government, break down industry, and impoverish the masses of the people, while it makes wealth King, and offers a premium for speculation at the expense of industry.—California Agriculturist.

LIBERTY.

BY JOHN HAY.

What man is there so bold that he should say,
 "Thus and thus only would I have the sea?"
 For whether lying calm and beautiful,
 Clasping the earth in love, and throwing back
 The smile of heaven from waves of amethyst;
 Or whether, freshened by the busy winds,
 It bears the trade and navies of the world
 To ends of use or stern activity;
 Or whether, lashed by tempests, it gives way
 To elemental fury, howls and roars
 At all its rocky barriers, in wild lust
 Of ruin drinks the blood of living things,
 And strews its wrecks o'er leagues of desolate shore;—
 Always it is the sea, and all bow down
 Before its vast and varied majesty.
 And so in vain will timorous men essay
 To set the metes and bounds of Liberty.
 For Freedom is its own eternal law.
 It makes its own conditions, and in storm
 Or calm alike fulfils the eternal Will.
 Let us not then despise it when it lies
 Still as a sleeping lion, while a swarm
 Of gnat-like evils hover round its head;
 Nor doubt it when in mad, disjointed times
 It shakes the torch of terror, and its cry
 Shrills o'er the quaking earth, and in the flame
 Of riot and war we see its awful form
 Rise by the scaffold, where the crimson axe
 Rings down its grooves the knell of shuddering kings.
 For always in thine eyes, O Liberty
 Shines that high light whereby the world is saved;
 And though thou slay us, we will trust in thee!

THE MEADOW LARK.

BY E. P. AVERY.

Thrill, happy lark, thy brief, sweet lay,
 From out a breast as brown
 As were the hills in Autumn day
 Before the rains came down.
 The beaming sun, the dripping showers,
 Are in thy simple notes;
 Earth smiles to hear in grass and flowers,
 And bright the cloudlet floats
 On Alameda's mountain line
 The violet's tender hue,
 With dappled spots of shade and shine,
 Is painted 'gainst the bine.
 The meadows slope to meet the bay,
 The gulls in flocks uprising,
 And far above the waters gray,
 Soars purple Tamalpais.
 Beyond is ocean's wide expanse,
 Where, through the Golden Gate,
 The ships with snowy canvas dance,
 Or on the breezes wait.
 Fair day, bright scene! The hill, the tree,
 The poppy's running flame,
 The silver cloud, the sunny sea,
 Spring's coming all proclaim.
 But sweeter, dearer far, than all,
 I love the liquid sound
 That from the sky the lark lets fall,
 Whene'er he spurns the ground.
 Though all too short, its cadence gives
 Back to my heart once more
 The thoughtless joy that used to live
 In happy days of yore.

Beecher must be tired of "acting a part" so constantly as he has been doing for a year past. Even in his prayers he is insincere—telling the Lord how happy he is, and thanking him for the blessings he enjoys. In a late sermon he told the story of his deepest sorrow. It was when his aunt Chandler sent him down town to buy snuff, and he returned to learn that his father had gone hunting without him! Terrible disappointment! The boy's heart was nearly broken. No sorrow of after years could compare with grief like this; and so some of his tender hearted hearers must have felt, for the papers say many were affected, even to tears. Beecher is evidently whistling his way through the grave-yard. It is still very dark. He is not half through yet, and the ghost may rise any moment with terrible voice and aspect of horror. The ghost's name is public opinion.

THE PEOPLE'S ADVENT.

BY GERALD MASSEY.

'Tis coming up the steep of Time,
 And this old world is growing brighter!
 We may not see its dawn sublime,
 Yet high hopes make the heart throb lighter!
 Our dust may slumber in the ground
 When it awakes the world in wonder;
 But we have felt it gathering round—
 We have heard its voice of living thunder!
 'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

'Tis coming now, the glorious time
 Foretold by seers and sung in story,
 For which, when thinking was a crime,
 Souls leaped to heaven from scaffolds gory!
 They passed. But see the work they have wrought,
 Now the crowned hopes of centuries blossom!
 How the live lightning of their thought
 Is flashing through us, brain and bosom!
 'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Oreeda, empire, systems, rot with age,
 But the great people's ever youthful!
 And it shall write the Future's page,
 To our humanity more truthful;
 The gnarliest heart hath tender chords
 To waken at the name of "Brother!"
 'Tis coming when these scorpion words
 We shall not speak to sting each other!
 'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Out of the light, ye Priests, nor fling
 Your dark, cold shadows on us longer!
 Aside, thou world-wide curse, called King!
 The people's step is quicker, stronger!
 There's a divinity within
 That makes men great whene'er they will it;
 God works with all who dare to win,
 And the time cometh to reveal it.
 'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Freedom! the tyrants kill thy braves,
 Yet in our memories live the sleepers;
 And, though doomed millions feed the graves
 Dug by Death's fierce, red-handed reapers,
 The world will not forever bow
 To things that mock God's own endeavor!
 'Tis nearer than we wot of now,
 When flowers shall wreath the sword forever!
 'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Fraternity! Love's other name!
 Dear, heaven-connecting link of being!
 Then shall we grasp thy golden dream,
 As souls, full statured, grow far seeing!
 Thou shalt unfold our better part,
 And in our life-cup yield more honey—
 Light up with joy the poor man's heart,
 And Love's own world with smiles more sunny!
 'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Ay, it must come! The Tyrant's throne
 Is crumbling, with our hot tears rusted;
 The sword earth's mighty have leant on
 Is cankered, with our best blood crusted!
 Room for the men of Mind! Make way,
 Ye Robber Rulers! pause no longer!
 Ye cannot stay the opening day!
 The world rolls on—the light grows stronger—
 The People's Advent's coming!

Thick mists upon the hills Toward which my pathway lies; The signals of a storm Over the darkening skies; Vainly to pierce those distant glooms, I strain my eyes.	But still about my feet The warm, sweet sunshine glows; Just for a little space My way it clearly shows, And step by step, as I pass on, With me it goes.

Signs of the Times.

The Golden Age says Rev. Dr. Miner has for twenty-five years been engaged in sectarianizing the Universalist denomination, Hepworth's Church in New York, sometimes called the Holy Hippodrome, is $180,000 in debt.

Sydney H. Morse says Liberty Party is a misnomer, because where there is liberty there is no party. Liberty leads to individuality.

The Rothschild family are commended for their large charities, their kindness to the poor and struggling, their aid to institutions of learning and benevolence, and for their industry and general usefulness.

Some wretch whom it would be wrong to call man, on Sunday last set fire to the herb house of the Shakers, at Hudson, New York. Loss $50,000. The chief source of income of the Shakers is from the sale of seeds and herbs.

The Civil rights Bill has passed both Houses of Congress, and has been signed by the President. The colored men have their rights. When will white women have theirs? The laws almost everywhere discriminate against women.

Alvan Clark, the Cambridge telescope maker, who worked ten years to establish a reputation, is getting ready to manufacture an immense telescope for the Austrian Government, and is also negotiating with the trustees appointed by Mr. James Lick for the erection of an instrument in the Lick Observatory.

The most humiliating spectacle recently exhibited in San Francisco is that presented at the "Revival" meetings, where cultured and gifted men, like Dr. Stone, Dr. Carpenter, Rev. Mr. Dunn and others are observed playing second fiddle to a coarse clown, an ignorant, empty fellow like Hammond. It is most pitiable.

The jury in the Beecher case is said to consist of one Methodist, one Baptist, one Lutheran, two Episcopalians, two Roman Catholics, three Presbyterians and two of the world's people. Is it expected that such diverse elements can agree? Of course not, unless they agree to acquit. They realize that not Beecher merely but Christianity is on trial.

William Denton, who is wholly absorbed in his own pursuits, which he follows in a groove marked out for himself, and has in great measure lost sympathy and charity for the great mass of humanity, refused to appear on the platform at the dedication of the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, because, in his opinion, some of the invited speakers are immoral. He could not join them without being compromised!

Mrs. Swisshelm, in reply to Dr. Van De Walker's assertion that women, on account of their sex, are unfitted for professional life, says: when it is proved that professional work and large pay are more injurious to woman than household drudgery and small pay, we shall begin to appreciate the zeal which seeks to protect women from the evils of the former, and is quite content to let her toil on in the dull routine of the latter.

A large majority of seceders from the Mormons become Spiritualists, and nearly all of the remainder fall back to a belief in materialism. Very few join Christian churches.

The Truth Seeker suggests, in view of the acquittal and consequent purification of Beecher, that the name of Plymouth Church be changed to The Church of the Holy Adultery.

Government should care for its subjects, as a parent does for its children. The mere protection of property rights is not worthy the name of government.

The Virginia (Nev.) Enterprise says: The State of Nevada, with 55,000 people, has 900 licensed places where liquors are retailed. This is at the rate of one liquor dealer to each 61 inhabitants.

Christians are evidently making a grand concerted proselyting movement throughout the world, and especially in the United States, and as they despair of reaching intelligent men and women, they are using every means to make proselytes of little children.

Holloway's pills should now be more popular than ever. Holloway recently spent over $700,000 to build a sanitarium for the insane in England, and he is now given $100,000 for ground on which he will erect, at a cost of $1,000,000, a college for women.

Labor reform frequently gets more help from generous capitalists than from a thousand of the uninformed laborers, who, divided into cliques, and blinded by ignorance, distrustful, jealous and narrow, do nothing practical, and even growl when any generous soul does something for them. Really, ignorance is a curse.

Beecher in his last week's lecture room talk says that after preaching the word of God over thirty years, God has seen fit to afflict him in his old age with prolonged trials. Well, we think it too bad, for to say nothing of preaching, Beecher has certainly practised what is taught in "God's Holy Word," and now to have the old gentleman go back on him in this shabby way is ungrateful indeed.

Beecher trusts that his example may be that of a patient, trusting follower of Christ Jesus. Of course. The sinner who does not forsake his sin hopes through Christ to be forgiven. This is what constitutes the immorality and the danger of the Christian religion. He shoulders off his own crimes on to Jesus. Of course this system is a sham, and Beecher knows it, but it answers present purposes.

A Catholic Bishop and seven priests recently arrived in America on a special mission to make proselytes among the negroes of the Southern States. They judge that the colored people will be attracted by the glitter and show of the ceremonies, until what was democratic, and in many respects the most hopeful and progressive body in the country, has become a close corporation with its face set backward and its fingers poking over the embers to find a live coal where once there was a blazing beacon fire.

PHILOSOPHY OF ASTROLOGY.—No. 2.

ANTHROPOMORPHISM.

"Nothing has got so far
But man hath caught and kept as his prey.
His eyes dismount the highest star:
He is in little all the sphere.
Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they Find their acquaintance there."

* * *
Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one limb to another,
And all to all the world besides:
Each part may call the farthest, brother.
For head with foot hath private amity,
And both with moons and tides."

The construction of Astrology recognizes man as the center and circumference of everything conceivable. That without man there is no God; without God there is no man; that every form or force is from God—is God, developing the God idea through every grade of being in the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms into manhood, into the fulness of the Godhead bodily. That in the joys, glories, sorrows, and miseries of the world, everywhere, in everything, man hears the sentence shouting or sighing in his ear. "I am thy brother," "I am thy sister." There is no knowledge to which he may not attain, no being to which he may not claim kinship. Everything in the universe finds in man its representative, the fulfillment of all things inferior, the germ of all things superior; therefore by his spirit affiliating with the spirit of things surrounding him he can learn their nature, and how to appropriate them unto himself. Even the influence of the stars can be made obedient to his will, as Agrippa taught:

"For our mind can through imagination, or reason by a kind of imitation, be so conformed to any star, as suddenly to be filled with the virtues of that star, as if it were a proper receptacle of the influence thereof."

The soil on which a man is born, the leading traits of his ancestry and surrounding circumstances, all combine to determine his disposition: but these are subordinate to the influences of the planets, as the spiritual is higher than the physical; for the horoscope at birth does prefigure the disposition and mental capacity; and if, instead of sneering, the skeptical will put it to the test, burdened as Astrology is with follies and absurdities, nevertheless, they will learn that the sneer should be upon the ignorant defamer of a principle eternal as time itself.

For as man is a microcosm, every influence above and beneath radiates towards him in his formation. Therefore, every characteristic in man finds its counterpart in the heavens above or in the earth beneath.

Those who laid the foundations of the Astrologic art, were not only close observers of human nature, but were deeply impressed with the idea that man is a microcosm. In conformity with this we find the zodiac symbolizing man in his varied relations. The signs are alternately masculine and feminine; thus recognizing the principle that all things are male and female, a property of the Godhead, after whose image all things were created, for "male and female created he them." It is now held by most scientists that men and women seek their opposites in marriage.

This has also been taught by Astrology from time immemorial, as the following table will illustrate:

SIGNS	TEMPERAMENTS		SIGNS	TEMPERAMENTS
Aries.....	Fiery	(Nervous)	agree	Libra.....	Airy	(Sanguine)
Taurus.....	Earthy	(Bilious)	with	Scorpio.....	Watery	(Lymphatic)
Gemini.....	Airy	(Sanguine)	their	Sagittarius.....	Fiery	(Nervous)
Cancer.....	Watery	(Lymphatic)	oppo-	Capricorn.....	Earthy	(Bilious)
Leo.....	Fiery	(Nervous)	sies	Aquarius.....	Airy	(Sanguine)
Virgo.....	Earthy	(Bilious)	---	Pisces.....	Watery	(Lymphatic)

As in the signs, the fiery found their affinity in the airy, and the earthy in the watery, so with the planets, the Saturnine temperament found its equilibrium in the Solar or Lunar temperament, where old age and inexperience, political intrigue and sober wisdom, impulse and calm reflection, were wedded in harmony; Venus dallies with Mars; and intellect and reverence, science and religion are conciliated in the union of Mercury and Jupiter.

Thus temperamental adaptation was a doctrine recognized by Astrology thousands of years ago.

Throughout the entire range of the mystic language of Astrology the key note is, progress from matter to spirit, from spirit to deity; and that in the lowest material form is a spirit from the highest preparing to again pass through every form of being till it again reaches the highest. In this light the words of Fichte have a peculiar significance:

"Wherever thou mayest live, thou, who carryest but a human face; whether thou plantest a sugar-cane under the rod of the overseer, as yet scarcely distinguishable from the brute creation; or whether thou warmest thyself on the shores of the Fireland, at the flame which thou didst not kindle, until it expires, and weepest bitterly because it will not keep burning by itself; or whether thou appearest to me the most miserable and degraded villain, thou art, nevertheless, what I am; for thou canst say to me 'I am.' Thou art, nevertheless, my comrade and my brother. Ah! at one time surely I also stood on that step of humanity on which thou standest—for it is a step of humanity, and there is no gap in the development of its members * * * ; but I certainly stood there also at one time—and thou wilt also stand certainly at some time upon the same step on which I now stand, even though it lasted million and million times million years—for what is time?"

The more the philosophy of Astrology is studied, the more beautiful, the more truthful it will appear. In view of our divine origin and divine destiny, will faith, hope and charity become delightful though incumbent duties, and we will strive to reach the condition of

"All, whose steadfast virtue thrice
Each side the grave unchanged hath stood,
Still unduced, unstained with vice,
They by Jove's mysterious road
Pass to Saturn's realm of rest,
Happy isle that holds the blest."

VOX STELLARUM.

THE INDEPENDENT LYCEUM, (Sixth and Market) the new Free-Thought Society, discussed "The Vicarious Atonement" question last Sunday afternoon. Mr. H. L. Knight, the opening speaker, gave a convincing argument, showing the inequitable, sin begetting, and stultifying nature of this priest invented fallacy. A letter from Charles E. Pickett, Esq., was read, bearing directly upon the subject, and dilating upon the unjust treatment he has received from Bigotry in Power.

DOCTORED TO DEATH.

Many an upstart philosopher imagines himself full of original ideas, but a slight acquaintance with history will undeceive him. The great Dr. Boerhave, who flourished in Europe, in the early part of the last century, spoke to this effect: "When we contrast the small amount of good achieved by a few practitioners of the healing art with the great amount of harm done by the vast body of medical men, we cannot avoid the conclusion that it would have been infinitely better for mankind if doctors had never existed." And Hoffman, his illustrious cotemporary, thus spoke: "Flee doctors and drugs if you wish to be well." In the Cyclopedia of Practical Medicine, Art. "History of Medicine," page 228, alluding to the fact that one boasted remedy succeeds another, running through the same career of expectation and disappointment, the writer says:

"Let us apply these remarks to the case of Fever, the disease which has been styled the touchstone of medical theory, and which may be pronounced its opprobrium. At the commencement of the last century, when the doctrine of Callen was generally embraced, typhus fever was termed a disease of debility, and was of course to be cured by tonics and stimulants. To this treatment succeeded that of cold affusion. * * * We were doomed to experience the ordinary process of disappointment, and the practice was, after a short time, supplanted by the use of the lancet. But this practice was even more short lived than either of its predecessors, and thus, in the space of less than forty years, we have gone through three revolutions of opinion with respect to our treatment of a disease of very frequent occurrence and of the most decisive and urgent symptoms."

This was written about twenty-five years ago. And now they have got around to the tonic and stimulant plan again, with the sole improvement of allowing the patient a glass of cold water! Nevertheless the doctor of the period, he of tender years especially, with the delusion that his medical method is scientific, and though he were born with lateral spinal curvature, will straighten up at once on being asked if he is a "regular." Now this is a very serious matter; yet I find that comparatively few are at all aware of the chaos which has ever existed and which still exists in the medical world. Had I space I could write a chapter of revelations, aye, a volume of them, forming the darkest pages of human history. The enquiry, therefore, whether the medical art gives promise of better things to come, is exceedingly interesting. I confidently affirm that it does.

The fundamental error of all the methods of cure of the past, and, with one exception, of the present, is that disease is a material entity which is to be forced out of the system, by sweating and purging and bleeding and stimulants, and so on. And meanwhile a portion of the drugs administered for the attainment of these effects remain in the system to afflict the victim through life! or a taste for alcohol or opium has been thus acquired. This materialistic view of the origin of the disease is evidently shared by Tyndall. But this is not strange, considering that he "discerns in matter the promise and potency of every form and quality of life." An "impalpable haze" is his nearest approach to anything spiritual; and he confidently points to "the train of deadly disorders over which science has given modern society such control, disclosing the lair of the material enemy, insuring his destruction." I would like to know whether "science," even with its spectroscope, has discovered the poison of scarlet fever, or even of whooping cough or mumps? Has science yet discovered any difference between the pus of the common boil and that of the virulent ulcer? I say no, because these and all causes of disease are, so far as human tests avail, intangible. Science, it is true, may have discovered the "lair" of these things, but not the things themselves; and so it has ever been with the materialistic philosophy. It exposes only the shell or garment of things.

But there exists a class of medical philosophers who, in view of the facts referred to—the etherial or even spiritual origin of disease—have set to work accordingly. The spiritualistic philosopher recognizes the existence of a spirit, or etherial essence, in all things; and while the imponderable agents which cause disease have eluded discovery, their full cousins are well known. A very near relative of the cholera poison is found in the arsenicum album and the black hellebore of the ancients, and a very near relative of the deadly typhus is found in the belladonna and hyoscyamus, and of the typhoid poison in the baptisia and rhus toxicodendron, and so on. How do we know that they are at all alike? Because they affect the system similarly, and the effects being alike the causes must be. But these drugs are not given in material quantities, but are so attenuated as to be but a mere breath of the substance, and so much the more like their prototypes. Now these substances have an affinity for one another in accordance with the law of similarity, and neutralize one another, thus curing disease; and this is called Homeopathy, from Homois, similar, and Pathos, affection or suffering.

There is nothing claimed for this system because of any plausibility in its theory. The theory has only been adapted to the facts, which facts are vouched for to-day by over 6000 medical men in America alone, most of whom are converts from the other methods. Its peculiar features are the Laws of Nature on which it is based, the law of similars. The etherial or spiritual essence of the drug alone being administered, ergo, by this system people cannot be Doctored to Death. E. STEVENSON, M.D.

Virginia, Nev. Feb. 24th, 1875.

The project of forming an inland sea in the northern part of Africa, by letting the waters of the Mediterranean into the depressions of the desert in Tunis, has again been under discussion in the Paris Geographical Society. The cost of the proposed work is estimated at one hundred and twenty millions of dollars, an expenditure which would hardly be likely ever to yield any adequate return. Fears are also expressed that the introduction of such a vast body of water would so affect the climate of the Sahara as utterly to destroy the date culture now extensively carried on in this region. The subject has attracted a good deal of attention in France, and an expedition has gone out from that country to Africa, to investigate the merits of the scheme.

INTEREST ON MONEY.

The "financial problem" is really no problem at all; it is as simple as any question in social science can be; but money lenders, schemers and swindlers have combined to complicate the question and mystify honest people. Very few have been willing to strike at the root of the evil and get rid of our present system in toto; but all the talk has been on modes of mitigating the curse, for such it has become. The following is the Granger Plan for solving the problem, and it appears to us simple and practicable:

1st—To a trafficking people like us of the United States a circulating medium is a necessity, in order to facilitate the transaction of business.

2d—This circulating medium should be something that is current in all parts of the country among all of the people, and it will be proper to call it currency or money.

3d—This currency should be of some material that is of little value in itself, so that, if it is sunk in the ocean or lost in any other way, there will be a minimum quantity of human labor wasted; and it must be light and easily transported from place to place with facility and little expense.

4th—The value of this currency must depend upon the honor and ability of the party issuing it.

5th—Paper properly executed will answer the first three of these demands.

6th—The people of the United States are able to fulfill the conditions of the fourth demand, and be great gainers individually and collectively; but the question is, how shall it be done?

7th—The Government shall make one uniform currency of convenient denominations for business, and establish banks in every State and territory, according to the wants of the people, where this currency can be obtained by those who give the proper security.

8th—This currency shall be loaned to every one who will give the proper security; and the interest shall not be over four per cent. per annum to begin with, and be gradually reduced after a few years, when the Government is out of debt, to two per cent.

9th—This currency shall not be called in until the borrowers wish to pay it, provided the security is good and the interest promptly paid.

10th—This currency shall be lawful money after the banking bill is passed, to pay all debts, salaries, taxes, fees, Custom House duties, etc., except our gold debts and bonds, which shall be paid in gold if demanded.

11th—We will dispense with all of our mints except one, which we will keep to coin some gold if it is necessary, to pay our debts that call for gold coin; and when the gold debts already contracted are paid, we will contract no more; then, of course, we will have no more use for mints.

12th—Any person can change this currency into United States bonds, which shall draw about  $\frac{1}{2}$  less per cent. interest than the Government receives for currency.

This plan, if adopted, will work against monopolies; it will give every person a fair chance; help the Government pay its debts; help many a family in moderate circumstances to give their children a superior education at the proper age without burdening themselves with too much labor, or encumbering their property with exorbitant interest or sudden payment. It will put an end to money crisis; will place interest on such a basis that there will be no need of usury laws in any of the States. It will induce many private bankers to invest their money in such manufacturing establishments as we stand in need of.

Then we can export more manufactured articles and import less. It will place the country and the people on the high road to prosperity greater and more permanent than most of us ever imagined possible, even for the people of this flourishing nation.

GEORGE L. BARKER.

This gentleman, who is well and favorably known to many of our readers, took part in the proceedings at the dedication of the Paine Memorial Building, Boston. We extract from his speech as follows:

Mr. Chairman and Friends—I am here from the Pacific coast, and I am glad that in this city of Boston, the "Hub of the Universe," you have erected a Hall where the speech of men shall be free. No event in all my life has come to me with such significance as the declaration that has been made here to-day, that, from this time henceforth, this platform shall be devoted to free speech and to the maintenance of the principles of Free-thought. There never has been a time when a hall for free speech was so much needed as now in Boston, notwithstanding it is the "Hub of the Universe." I grant you, as our friend who has so eloquently addressed you to-night has said, that great progress has been made, but bigotry, and intolerance, and superstition, and ignorance, and prejudice still live, and manifest themselves in various ways.

I hail from California, and I know very well the man who has given so liberally to your Hall, and there is one evidence of progress of which I desire to speak particularly on this platform, and it is this: that James Lick, of California, (applause,) is the first man I ever knew who had amassed so large an amount of property, who was wise enough to become his own executor. Surely, here is a fact upon which we may congratulate ourselves, that one man who has devoted his life, as Mr. Lick has, to the accumulation of wealth, is wise enough, before he departs, to dispense that wealth; and not only to dispense it, but to dispense it in such a manner that he shall see the fruits of his labors and be satisfied. (Applause.) * * * There is another point which occurred to me while listening to the speakers here, and it is this:—If it be true, as some of our Spiritualistic friends have said, that spirits live forever, and that the spirit of Thomas Paine may come back to meet us in the dedication of this Hall, how would he like to hear himself talked about as he has been here? It seems to me he would say, "Would to God that these men and women, instead of lauding me as the most remarkable man of a century ago, were earnest enough in the cause of truth, of right, of liberty, of free speech, of freedom of the press, to put their hands down deep into their pockets and do something?" (Applause.)

That is the view I take of the question, friends. I am no man-worshiper; at the same time, I have the highest reverence for the service that Thomas Paine rendered to mankind. But if I were to see the fire of liberty burning to-day in the hearts of those who laud such men as it burned in his heart, I should think, "Surely the hand of the Lord is moving upon the people."

Another thing:—A hundred years have passed since Thomas Paine wrote those wonderful works of which you all probably know, and we are now talking of celebrating the Centennial of our nation. I look upon that celebration, with the signs of the times in my eyes, as of the greatest significance—a significance that we as a people little dream of to-day. We scarcely seem to see the power that is moving behind all this commotion and chaos that is abroad in the world. Only a few years ago, after an existence of centuries, the Catholic Church came to the point where the Pope called a Convocation to declare himself the infallible Vicegerent of God upon earth, and the very papers that contained that declaration contained also the statement that France had withdrawn her troops from Rome. The very day when the Pope was declared the Vicegerent of God upon earth by that Convocation, his power was taken away from him, because the French army was removed, and his prelates and priests by that act, signed the death-warrant of Popery. I look upon our Centennial celebration, which many of us regard with pride, as an event of peculiar significance, perhaps in this same direction, because when a people come to the point that they recognize in themselves all the power in the Universe, when they laud themselves as the great "I am," and lose sight entirely of the great power which has been moving in and through the Universe and the human family for all the ages of which we know anything, right there comes in their death-warrant. That is the record of history; and while we should rejoice to know that this country has maintained itself with a Government as free as this Government has been for a hundred years, I almost shudder when I look these facts in the face, for the reason that the finger of History points to a downfall where a people raise themselves above the power that lies behind them. (Sensation.)

And now, friends, while the hundredth anniversary of that significant period is fast approaching, I tell you the time is coming when that bigotry, intolerance, and superstition which we think we have rolled back so far, will be so strong, even here in the city of Boston, that this Hall, if it still remains, will be the only place where men will dare to speak the truth, and the highest truth which they recognize. Remember that, friends, as a prophecy. And I only pray, in closing, that this Hall may be spared, and not only this Hall, but these noble souls, (Messrs. Seaver and Mendum,) who by their forty years' devotion to the cause have shown that they are worthy to be trusted with a little, and now they are trusted with more; and being trusted with more, a greater responsibility falls upon them, because more is required of them. I am confident that the power will be given them to meet this responsibility, because the hand of the Lord is behind it all; and let what will come, the position they have taken cannot be weakened, and they will swear by all that is high and holy, this platform shall henceforth be devoted to free speech. (Applause.)

How many of our friends are willing to assist in doubling the circulation of COMMON SENSE? We need twenty-five hundred subscribers to make the paper pay a profit on its publication. With a little effort on the part of those who feel an interest in its success, this number can be obtained. J. L. York is the most active friend COMMON SENSE has in the field. He is traveling from place to place and is doing a good work, but we want local agents who will do something to extend the circulation of the paper. One good agent in each town in the State would soon double our subscription list. Those of our subscribers who do not keep files of the paper can aid us by sending the paper to their friends.

Uncomfortable, high heeled shoes for ladies are once more out of fashion, but their turn will come again ere many years, unless women, by the use of all her rights, manage to rise above such follies. When women vote it is hoped she will devote to useful thought a portion of the time now wasted on dress.

LETTER FROM MRS. DRAKE.

The following letter, from Stockton, was received after last week's paper had gone to the press:

DEAR COMMON SENSE:—I wish to inform your readers of the rapid advance of the growing truths in which our workers are engaged. Last Sunday, February 21st, at 2 o'clock, according to a promise made the preceding Sunday evening, I went to Pioneer Hall to give a lecture exclusively to women. I was told many times during the previous week that there would not be half a dozen ladies there, but to my surprise a good audience greeted me and they listened with earnest and thoughtful attention to all that was said; and when I gave liberty for those who wished to ask questions, to do so, many availed themselves of the opportunity by asking questions that gave proof of their previous consideration, and knowledge of the subject of the lecture.

Let the cry that the people are not ready for the great questions of reform cease, for the time is at hand to push forward the work. The hearts and minds of the thinking people are ready for every subject that is for the benefit and elevation of the human family, and the discussion of every question of doubt and uncertainty, when presented in an earnest and acceptable manner.

Many of the ladies told me I ought to give the same lecture to the men, which I am ready and willing to do whenever they are ready to listen. If I could see the same earnestness among men that was there expressed by the women I would have no fear for the work of reform, but feel sure every obstruction would soon be cast aside, and leave the way clear for the laws of evolution to unfold and develop the human family to higher conditions.

I was requested to meet with the women again next Sunday, February 28th, at 2 o'clock p. m., at the same hall, and have promised to do so, and hope all women over sixteen years of age, who have any desire to be present, will attend. My time shall cost them nothing, and my advice they shall have without money and without price.

I have given three public lectures the Sunday evenings of this month, all of which have been well attended, and much interest manifested. I gave a lecture last Friday evening at Farmington, and shall give another on Thursday evening of this week.

Next Sunday evening closes the month of my engagement here, and I shall leave the society with the same regrets that friends feel at parting, but with the hope of meeting again.

Mrs. P. W. Stevens succeeds me for the month of March. More anon.

The ideas of God and his qualities are only founded upon the opinions of our fathers, infused into us by education—by habits contracted in infancy, and strengthened by example and authority. Hence the opinion that men are born with the idea of a divinity. We retain those ideas, without ever having reflected on them.

COMMON SENSE is furnished to subscribers for Three Dollars per annum, in advance. Letters intended for the Business Department should be addressed:

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAR. 6, 1875.

Recently we have sent bills to delinquent subscribers, which, although small, (none exceeding $3.00) amount in the aggregate to enough, if paid, to satisfy our creditors, and place the paper on a good financial footing. There are quite a large number of subscribers who have never paid a dollar. Two or three hundred of these were cut off from our list on the first of January, but a number who promised to remit their bills are still retained, and we hope they will have the justice to pay what they owe without further delay.

UN-COMMON SENSE IN TEXAS.

On the 1st of May, 1874, as previously announced in a prospectus, the first number of COMMON SENSE was issued, dated May 16, to give time for the arrangement of the subscription books before the next issue. In the month of August following, a monthly paper bearing the same name, having the same sized pages, the same width of column, and very similar in general appearance, was started in Paris, Texas. It was evident that the publisher had seen a copy of this paper, and had patterned after it; but we gave it a cordial welcome, thinking people could not well have too much of COMMON SENSE. Now the seventh number of our namesake comes to us with the announcement that the first volume will close at No. 9. This is the most extraordinary move in the annals of newspaperdom. By closing Volume One with No. 9, the second volume will commence May 1st, while the second volume of this paper will not begin till the middle of May, although it is three months older than the Texas paper. Our sharp cotemporary probably knows that in a few years not one in a hundred who see the two papers will know the truth. They will have only the dates of the respective papers to prove which is the original and which the imitator, and the prima facie evidence will be in favor of the thief who first stole our name, then stole our design, and has now stolen a march on us in point of time. We believe this impudence is unparalleled. Our brother should go back to the Christian fold, where he evidently belongs.

An acre of performance is worth a whole world of promise.

JENNIE LEYS.

Our readers need not be told that all the discourses of this gifted speaker are of a high character, the lessons taught being those of the purest morality and the broadest charity. Pure thoughts and good works are her constant injunctions; in fact, she is Christ-like in her teachings. Such being the case, it was with some surprise we read in the Santa Barbara Index an intimation that her lectures are not suitable for the holy Sabbath day. The Index says:

We hear glowing accounts of Miss Jennie Leys' Sunday lectures. We also hear it regretted that they are always given on Sunday. There are many who would like to hear Miss Leys, were she to lecture during the week.

Quite in contrast with this is a notice written by Josephine Walcott, which we find in the Santa Barbara Press. After referring to the audience, the style of the speaker, etc., Miss Walcott says of Jennie Leys:

As to her teachings, we can only say that they are replete with love, harmony, good will to all, and a religion that permeates all life, and radiates with somewhat of divine illumination its common issues, making it truly evident that inspiration is not an event of a dead and lettered past, but a perpetual and universal fact of the living present.

This is the kind of talk that is not good enough to listen to on Sunday! Some people prefer to be told how Jesus died than to be instructed how themselves to live.

Since the foregoing was placed in type we have received from a Santa Barbara friend the following:

ED. COMMON SENSE:—A week ago Jennie Leys concluded her eloquent and instructive course of lectures here. Although a somewhat preacher-ridden place, there is in Santa Barbara a large Liberal or Radical element, representing, as it does elsewhere, a considerable section of the working brain of the community, which comes to the front at such lectures; and it is under deep obligations to the few Spiritualists who so nobly encouraged this highly gifted lady to come here and speak, which she did nightly to crowded and spell-bound audiences. Her crowning effort was the elucidation of that sadly misunderstood, and willfully misrepresented topic, "Social Freedom," which she fairly illumined with her exquisitely polished, delicate, and yet trenchant style of eloquence. She spoke as the very embodiment of the spirit of purity, pleading for the freedom of womanhood and the safety of humanity. S. D. H.

Santa Barbara, Feb. 25th.

THE PHILOMATHEANS.—Prof. Chaney gave his second lecture before the Philomatheans last Sunday night, at Social Hall, 39 Fourth street. Nearly every night was occupied, and the audience was highly appreciative. The discourse was a very interesting one, depicting the various phenomena of intellectual life, ranging from Geology to Astronomy, from the plant to the human. The next lecture will be by Mrs. Hanks, on "Physiognomy," to-morrow evening. A rare treat may be expected, for she will demonstrate her subject by tests from the audience. This is not mediumship, but science, just what the "lovers of learning" desire.

Our subscribers will conser a favor by sending to this office the names of persons to whose address we can send specimens of COMMON SENSE. We pay the postage, and send the paper without charge.

SOCIAL SCIENCE.

What are the chief evils of the present state of society? Are any feasible remedies proposed?

In the United States our productive power is enormous. Our domain is ample and rich. We have an abundance of all material resources, with fine mechanical contrivances, and a skillful and industrious people. There is enough to supply all our wants, purchase five hundred million dollars worth of foreign luxuries, and lay up a thousand millions of accumulated capital besides.

If all were taught to labor at something useful, and content themselves with the pleasures of the mind, and a modest style of food and dress, three or four hours labor per diem would suffice to maintain all in absolute comfort and happiness.

Instead of that, we have adopted a system of bartered exchange, of supply and demand, of scheming and stealing, of falsehood and fraud, of violence and bloodshed, that naturally and necessarily produce the following results—the evils of our system :

A few rich people who have got their traps so set as to catch scores of dollars a day, indulge themselves in utter idleness, gaudy show, and wasteful and injurious luxury. They are grand, but not happy. Envy, anxiety for their property, and hardened indifference to the condition of the poor around them, deprive them of the sweetest pleasures of human life. The men are often debauched, and the women sold for money and position.

A large class of semi-rich people, professional people, trades-people, who spend their time in waiting, watching for a chance to make a dollar, and rise with the rich class. They do no labor. For a little skill and attention they are paid prices that, compared with the laborer's wages, are in the highest degree extravagant ; but often they simply live and wait. They are seldom happy. Waiting for customers in their normal condition. Yet they are perhaps among the happiest ; because they are the best cultivated, and their bodily wants are well supplied.

We then come to the real workers, the bone and sinew of the land, making about one-half of our male population. Before the advent of machinery, they were nine-tenths ; but labor is now so productive, that full one half of the male population live in idleness, or by some petty scheming and waiting, instead of working. The workers toil ten hours a day, six days a week, from early manhood to the close of life. Hard hands, black faces, dirty, close workshops, or the burning sun, or dark damp mine, tell upon their health and bearing, and stamp them as coarse, earthen vessels. Their wages are light ; preyed upon by the capitalist, the trader, the professional man, the schemer, the beggar, the thief ; they are fleeced by all, and retain only a small proportion of their earnings. Yet they are often as happy as any, and as reckless in the enjoyment of what they have. The sturdy mechanic, with his wife and children, are often as free from anxiety and as independent as any members of the community.

Then come the thousands who are habitually out of employment, the poor, who from defects of body or mind are not wanted, or even the able or willing whose labor is not in demand. In every civilized country, how many thousands of these ! And what a loss to the community !

It is not necessary to enumerate the dangerous classes, a direct result of our present social system ! How multitudinous they are ! Those who prey upon society, doing only evil continually. Among these may be classed the keepers of all saloons, dance houses, houses of ill-fame and their inmates, thieves, frauds, sharpers, robbers and cut-throats. Some of these are comparatively happy in their occupations ; but most live a life of misery, and apprehension.

Then to keep these last in some degree of order and subjection, come another class, the repressors of crime, the army, the navy, police, judges, courts, etc. etc. etc. Some of these have a very comfortable life, and yet have an incessant round of disagreeable duty.

Thus, is our society divided into classes, none of which enjoy more than a fair share of comfort and real enjoyment, while others are plunged into degradation, misery and crime. There is an antagonism throughout, which is a common loss. There are extremes which produce no good, but immeasurable evil.

Amid all this chaos, one general principle is observable, and that is, that those in medium circumstances are generally the happiest, the most moral, and the most useful. The very rich families, wholly removed from labor and business, lose the loveliest quality of humanity, that blessed spirit of Christ, that broke the little fishes and the five small loaves and gave them to the multitude. Oh no, say they, we must hold our hands tight, and reduce wages, keep ourselves up and others down, that our children may live as we do. They live in luxury and idleness till their bodies are fragile and their minds frivolous, and they become mere semblances of humanity. Their example corrupts and debauches all around them. The richer classes of America have not yet attained those highly aristocratic vices that prevail in Europe ; but they are learning fast. The Beecher scandal and similar exposures in high places show that we are coming to it. The republican puritanism of our fathers, says "away with him, the foul adulterer ;" but the aristocratic church of Plymouth says "No, no, if our pastor is guilty, what does he more than the Bishops of England, or the Cardinals and Popes of Rome ?"

The extremely rich people are daily menacing our republican form of government. They put their wealth together. They buy Congress to do their bidding ; and there is no telling what day they may combine to destroy the liberties of our country. They are a dangerous class. They soon learn to dislike liberty and equality, and with the aid of the low and ignorant, they have succeeded in overthrowing nearly all the free governments of the world.

On the other hand, the extremely poor and degraded are equally dangerous and obnoxious to our free institutions; equally immoral, useless and unhappy. A man cannot be a good and useful member of society, cannot do a good day's work, cannot be a good husband, father, or friend, or patriot, unless he has a good share of common sense, a sound body, and is well fed, clothed and sheltered. The moment he falls below this condition, his usefulness is impaired; and in proportion as he so falls, does he become, first useless, then a burthen, and then pernicious.

This being the case, it would seem that a certain policy is clearly indicated, and that is to prevent these two extremes; to abate them at least; to adopt some system which will not only prevent the accumulation of vast wealth, but will tend gradually to take from the rich the surplus wealth that enervates and destroys, and use it for the education and consequent elevation of the poor, that they may be kept within the sphere of morality and usefulness. It would be killing two birds with one stone. It would be indeed blessing him who gives, as well as he who receives, and adding to the power, wealth, virtue and happiness of the whole nation. It would distinguish the Great Republic from all the other nations of the world, and make it indeed the home of the working man, safe forever from the machinations of rich monopolists.

Would we then repress industry, energy, enterprise, invention, by taking away the reward? No, we want all these things, and they should be rewarded to a certain extent. We would not prevent men from becoming moderately rich; but we insist that the power of the wealthy should not be used to crush their poor neighbors into the gutter.

Our national resources are sufficient to keep a people four times our numbers in moderate comfort; to decently feed, clothe and educate every child born on our soil, and see that it comes to maturity well qualified to earn an honest living, and perform all the duties of a good citizen. And it is of further importance to the nation that this should be done, than that any man or woman should powder their hair with gold, or wear diamond necklaces, or ostrich feathers.

To this end we should have a graded system of taxation. All property under a thousand dollars, belonging to one person, should be exempt from taxation. It is not necessary to take anything from those who have so little; and the cost of making up the amount, and collecting it, is almost equal to the tax. He who is worth over one thousand dollars should pay whatever rate may be required—suppose it to be one per cent. Then he who is worth two thousand should pay one and one-tenth per cent.; and for every additional thousand, one-tenth of one per cent. additional. Thus, on ten thousand, two per cent. would be paid, and one additional per cent. for every ten thousand. It would follow that a hundred thousand would pay ten per cent. And no man would care to own much more at such a rate of taxation. Thus wealth would be more divided, and the dangerous rich be few and far between.

And the tax collected should be ample to raise all the children as we have heretofore said, and to keep every man and woman out of the gutter of despair and the path of crime. We feel assured that a far less sum spent in this way than is now required to repress crime and punish disorder, would meet all these demands. It is a shame that in a land to which Providence has been so bounteous the mismanagement of man should cause so much misery and crime. The extremes of wealth and poverty are the prolific sources of both. Let them be abated as much as possible!

REMARKABLE LECTURES.

The lectures given by C. Fannie Allyn, at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union, are of the kind one would think would attract crowded audiences, they are so novel, so radical, so witty and so well spoken. The Hall should be full of curiosity-hunters, to say nothing of the truth-seekers. She answers questions sent up by the audience, and does so without hesitation, without consideration, in a lively, somewhat slashing style, weaving a dozen subjects into one discourse, making them all harmonize, bringing out gems of truth, exposing error, ridiculing shams, and delighting all who listen to her. The most fruitful theme on Sunday afternoon was the "Revival." She explained the modus operandi, the magnetic influences, the effect of the combined will power of those engaged in it, all led by one man of great physical force. Those affected are led by sympathy. It is a mere matter of feeling. The intellect has nothing to do with it, and the whole performance is a great effort on the part of the ministry to make proselytes and maintain their hold on the community.

In answer to a question concerning re-incarnation, the Control expressed a decided opposition to the doctrine, averring that it is not founded in truth. After her lecture, and before the poem, Mrs. Allyn took occasion to urge Spiritualists to sustain their organ, COMMON SENSE.

In the evening there was a large audience. Mrs. Allyn's replies were in main to the questions, "What shall we do to be saved?" "What is it to be Free?" etc. She dwelt at considerable length on Truth and Freedom. "Knowledge makes man free." Men and women are necessary to each other. When we have developed the truth within us we shall be free, and the truth would direct us what to do to be saved. Our salvation depends upon ourselves. If we learn properly to use our powers and faculties we shall be saved. In reference to the effect of revival preaching on children, she said it answers a purpose similar to that of the patent arrangement called the baby jumper; it takes children out of a condition of inactivity and prepares them to grow into something better. [If this is what the Control meant, we beg most respectfully to dissent. Instead of assisting growth, like the elastic baby jumper, conversion represses natural expression in the child, binding its mental faculties as an unyielding cord to the free limbs. It is not in any sense an educator. Ed.]

The speaker closed, as usual, with an inspirational poem, on subjects given by the audience. The power exhibited in this difficult species of composition is truly wonderful. Of course neither rhyme nor rhythm are perfect, but the wonder is, that they are nearly so, and at the same time sensible, witty and to the point. Mrs. Allyn speaks again to-morrow afternoon and evening. Do not fail to hear her.

Rev. Dr. Rexford will preach to the children Sunday afternoon, at Pacific Hall, on Bush street, near California Theatre. Go and hear something sensible. Take the children with you.

LYCEUM FOR SELF CULTURE.

The debate on Sunday last was on the "Influence of Christianity on Civilization," or Christianity versus Civilization. The exercises opened with vocal and instrumental music by Mrs. Morgans, which was deservedly applauded. This lady has a fine voice, and knows how to manage it. Mr. Farrell in a few words deprecated the discussion of things of no practical value, such as metaphysics and theology, and read an article on money and values. Mrs. Olmstead read a short poem.

The discussion was opened by J. W. Mackie, who, referring to the remarks of Mr. Farrell on facts and values, said the uprooting of errors is the work of the iconoclastic reformer; that truth will take care of itself. He defined Christianity to be Christ and him crucified, which implied the dogmas of Adam's fall and the history of the progenitors of Jesus. And such a history! As wonderful as the Arabian Nights; as sublime as Mother Goose's Melodies; as chaste as Paul de Kock's novels, and as moral as the Newgate Calendar. Civilization, he said, is self culture, refinement, education, but we can have but a faint idea of the highest civilization possible to man. That as Christianity discountenances the study of profane science, and relies upon the spirit of God to lead man unto all truth, there is necessarily a conflict between science and Christianity.

He read Tertullian's description of the early Christians, to prove that Christianity can develop a high state of morality; but morality is not all that is necessary to complete civilization. If intellectual development is neglected, there must certainly be a reaction, even in morals, as was exemplified in the Dark Ages. Christianity, Mr. Mackie said, is based on the theory that the innocent may suffer for the guilty, something that can never be done except at the expense of justice, even if done by God himself, and such an act as an example for men is bad.

Rev. Mr. Simonds followed, saying that dogmas and doctrines do not constitute Christianity. Christ was Christianity, and he engrafted a higher life into the world, a life which is in itself the very essence and promoter of science and civilization. The Bible had nothing to do with the downfall of man. Christ lived the highest and best life that has ever been lived. The passages of scripture to which the first speaker referred are all susceptible of a harmonious and natural interpretation. To the Spiritual minded the Spiritual meaning will be perceived. When the eyes of the interior man are opened the refined and grand influences of Spiritual truth are felt, and the time will come when this will be realized, not only by individuals, but by the world, and its influence will be felt in lessening crime and in leading to the highest and most exalted civilization.

Dr. John Allyn maintained that Christianity has been the enemy of science, and that civilization and morality depend upon other causes entirely; they were in existence before Christianity had a being, and are the common property of mankind in every age.

Mr. — spoke in favor of Christianity, and Mr. Lohmuller, in turn, caricatured the Trinity. Mr. Smythe, though not a believer in Christianity, spoke in the affirmative, because he believes it to be a civilizer, attributing to it a high state of morality and intellectual activity. Dr. Smith, who said he is not a Christian, approved of the teachings of Christ, who spoke what was given him by the Father. He (the speaker) thought we should seek to become Christ-like, and speak freely whatever is given us from above. The intellect is skeptical, and is always asking questions which intuition answers.

Dr. Favor occupied the last five minutes in tracing the wonders accomplished by Christianity since the Reformation, contrasting the condition of the countries where Christianity is, and where it is not.

After the regular time for closing, Mrs. Cummings (or her Control) made a few remarks, denunciatory of the cruelties perpetrated by Christians—the persecutions and wars they have inaugurated to extend their faith.

Mr. Batteraby, the President, said the subject would be continued for further discussion, and he hoped that some of the clergy now engaged in psychologizing little children, would consent to come and talk to men and women of mature minds. If they can show the good that they claim has resulted from Christianity, they will find intelligent listeners, and if they can prove it, they may make converts.

NEW BOOKS.

The author of Junius Unmasked sends COMMON SENSE a copy, and from a hasty reading, we consider it, as a compilation of facts, the best defense of Thomas Paine ever written. While giving strong evidence that Paine was the writer of the Junius Letters and of the Declaration of Independence, it shows by numerous extracts the highly honorable, truth loving, just and even religious nature of Paine's character. It is a book of three hundred and twenty pages, published by John Gray & Co., Washington, D. C. For sale at all the book stores.

"Scientific Materialism Calmly Considered" is the title of a small work by George Sexton, London, and published by J. Burns, to whom we are indebted for a copy. It is a reply to Prof. Tyndall's Belfast Address. The author holds Materialism to be "unscientific, a grave philosophical error, utterly subversive of religious truth." The work is an able argument against the atomic theory.

A Guide to Spiritualism, by J. Tyerman, of Melbourne, Australia. A book of 150 pages, in which the author, who is a come-outer from the Church of England, states the causes that influenced him to leave the church. He examines the various theories put forth by opponents of Spiritualism to account for the phenomena, and replies to objections raised against the Spiritual theory. The book contains a great many interesting facts well told, and is a valuable addition to Spiritual literature. It will probably be republished by the Religio Philosophical Publishing Co. of Chicago.

We have also received from the author, J. Tyerman, several pamphlets, the most interesting of which is on Reincarnation, being in opposition to that doctrine. The others are "Spiritualism in its Relation to Orthodoxy;" "Is there a Hell?" "Creeds and Dogmas;" "Is there a Devil?" "Shall we Live on Earth Again?" Mr. Tyerman is a good speaker, as well as writer, and will probably visit California next winter.

Social Life, or a Story for the Times. Many of our readers are personally acquainted with the author of this book,—Mas. Marion Todd, formerly of Grass Valley. She has for several years been in the lecture field, at the East, but this is her first attempt at book making. The plot of the story shows some ability, but the book is full of faults, giving evidence on almost every page of haste and inconsiderateness. We fear that our friend was impelled to write by poverty, hoping thereby to add somewhat to slender resources, but we doubt her attainment of this object, while at the same time she injures her reputation as a writer by hurrying a work so crude into print. Yet Social Life has its merits. It will incite the reader to reflect upon the evils of our social system, and may assist in leading to a remedy, though it does not clearly point the way. The writer is a radical; she is a lover of nature; she is not afraid to tell what she believes to be the truth; she is also poor in purse, and her book costs only 50 cts. It is for sale at this office.

Hymen's Victims, or the Rane of Wedlock, is the title of a pamphlet of 50 closely printed pages, published as an advertisement for the sale of some remedy, by W. Wallace Cowles, Indianapolis, Ind. Price ten cents. It is a wordy dissertation, the pith of which could be put in two pages.

The Commotion in Moontown, a little book of seventy-five pages, by Edward R. Place, sold by Mrs. Place. The book contains some good ideas on the labor question, but the sensible portion is almost buried under the trivial talk of some of the signoramus the author has deemed it necessary to introduce among his characters.

There are many friends of Spiritualism in Oakland, but it is seldom that any of our lecturers visit that city. Recently a small number have met by appointment, without public notice, in Liberty Hall, near Market street station, on Sunday evenings, and have listened to lectures given through the organism of Murray Curtis, a son of Marshal Curtis. The lectures are philosophical, the Control seeking rather to give instruction as to principles than to incite to any special work of reform. The speaking, when under this Control, is in a low voice, and colloquial in style. After the lecture, the Control changes, and questions are answered. The medium is employed at manual labor during the week, and makes no preparation for the Sunday work. He is conscious of what is said, but does not know what is coming in advance of its utterance. He may be deceived in the belief that it comes from an intelligence outside of himself, but he is evidently honest, and gives only what he believes himself impressed to say.

ANCIENT AND MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

I find a singular confusion of ideas in the Old Testament as to the personality of the manifesting "spirit." Whoever appeared was called the "Lord." Take Abraham's case—"And the Lord appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre, as he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day; and he lifted up his eyes, and lo! three men [in buckram?] stood before him." This was a strong case of materialization, as the three "did eat" the veal cutlets and jhonnycake which Sarah made ready, and then (in different verses called "he" and "they" and the "Lord") made wonderful prophecies. You see our orthodox friends find themselves in an "Eddy" as soon as they begin to read with their eyes open.

Genesis, xxxii.—Jacob wrestles, "collar and elbow," all night with a materialized spirit, who gets no advantage over him until he takes an unfair hold and put the patriarch's thigh out of joint. This, like many of the others, ought to be counted out anyhow, as it was a dark seance and there were no witnesses. This spirit was "nowhere" as soon as the light was turned on.

Genesis, xlii.—Joseph puts himself among the ordinary Egyptian "diviners," by sending after his divining cup. Divine nota bene, that all these ancient wonder-workers only claimed to "go one better" in the same line as the ordinary magicians.

All through "the plagues of Egypt" we find that when Moses changed rods to serpents, turned rivers to blood, brought up doves for frogs, etc., the magicians did so with their enchantments. He "stumped" them first on the plague of lice. Then they gave up beat. But he gave them a fair chance and did not scorn the competition. The reason of this is that they were the orthodox diviners of that time, and he had to show his hand or "go hang."

Exodus, xxxi.—In the Sinai manifestation there was "slate writing" on a large scale, but Moses got angry and broke the first stone tables, and he was forty days behind the cloudy "curtain" before he produced the second set.

Numbers, xvii.—Aaron's rod buds. Any cunning magician can make plants grow "miraculously."

It will be found that most of the wonderful things spoken of as seen and heard by the old prophets, were encountered by them when in the condition described by Balaam, Numbers, xxiv.—"Which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open. Take away the dreams and solitary trances and commonplace clairvoyance, and "miracles" become very few.

In Joshua vi., is recorded the greatest "tipping" manifestation in history. It took the Jews seven days to "prepare the magnetic conditions" for tipping over the walls of Jericho. The whole people formed a circle all around the city on seven successive days. They concentrated their will power and magnetic force upon the wall as one man. Then "music was called for," and the priests tooted on the ram's horns. Instead of singing a dismal song like a modern spirit circle, the whole people shouted with a will. No wonder the wall fell (if it ever did), though no mention is made of sappers and miners.

Judges, xv.—We find Sampson at the rope and cabinet trick. He had himself tied successively with new cords, green withes and new ropes; but every time the "committee" approached the medium to examine the knots, the stupid fellow, instead of slipping the ropes off, broke them by main strength and awkwardness. At his last seance, though his eyes were banaged, he smashed the cabinet and the affair broke up in a row, with many sore heads.

1 Kings, xviii.—Elijah called down from heaven a fire that consumed a sacrifice, a stone altar and the water in a trench. Well, they say that an old woman up at the Eddy's made a fire burn by pouring water on it. Shall we believe the old story sooner than the new? Do gray hairs make folly venerable?

2 Kings, iv.—There is commotion in the Syrian Court, because "Elisha the prophet that is in Israel (and many miles away) telleth the King of Israel the words that thou (Syrian King) speaketh in thy bed-chamber." Very simple clairvoyance. Some of the "seventh sons," who advertise in the Herald, can equal it.

2 Kings, xxii.—Hezekiah is magnetized into thinking that he sees "the shadow brought ten degrees back in the dial of Ahaz.

1 Chronicles.—David produces plans and specifications for a temple, and says, like many a modern writing and drawing medium, "All this the Lord made me understand, in writing by his hand upon me—even all the works of this pattern."

Daniel, v.—We find Israel's great prophet, Daniel (in accordance with a previous statement), gratefully receiving the position of "master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans and soothsayers," and ever ready to beat them at their own games.

In the same chapter we read about "the part of the hand" that wrote on the wall; but no expert, like Olcott, handled that hand, "finding no arm behind the wrist," or looked for a hole in the plaster. Can we trust the old test more safely than the thousand new materializations?

Turning to the New Testament, and conning over the stories there, so variously rehearsed by the different apostles, the story of the miraculous feeding of 5,000 persons is seen to stand out most prominently. If the statement is to be credited at all, modern science shows us that the most likely explanation is that the 5,000 were magnetized into a belief that they were being fed. If the modern materializing of all sorts of things by spirit power were credible, we might suppose this food concentrated from the atmosphere; but as that is out of the question, and as we find such men as Mr. Beecher able to convince even an audience of 5,000 of anything, the first theory seems the right one.

The "Transfiguration" scene, and others where unearthly lights appeared, seem capable of a natural explanation, after reading the writings of the great anti-Spiritualist, Baron Reichenbach, who showed that a light called by him "odyle," emanates from magnets and from the magnetic poles of the human body. A great accumulation of this by will-power might be visible in the day time.

The stories about the healing of the sick are nearly paralleled in our day, without making much impression on the general public. A few years ago the wonderful healing power of the Zouave Jacob, of Paris, brought such crowds around him that the priests became fearful for their goddess Diana, and the government was induced to force his withdrawal from the business. We hear frequently of "healing mediums" in this country, whose offices are thronged for months by such crowds as no doctor draws; but we all know that this is only the result of the fact that the credulity of the people has been aroused by the uncommon power of a mere magnetizer.

The perception by Jesus that a certain man would be willing to have him keep the Passover in the upper chamber, his seeing Nathaniel under the fig tree, his knowledge that the owner of a certain "foal of an ass" would put the same at service, his perception of the treachery of Judas and Peter are of the same style of "clearseeing" as that everywhere practiced, with varying success, by fortune tellers, astrologers and clairvoyants in this city. Nobody but simpletons pay much attention to these phenomena now occurring about us; why will the religionist make such a bother about similiar things said to have occurred thousands of years ago, at a time when scientific investigation was impossible.

Again, the miraculous draught of fishes. Why, clairvoyance could show the seer just when and where to order the net dropped, as certainly as an "inside view" can show a Washington official when to telegraph to his Wall street pal to "go in" on Pacific Mail or Union Pacific.

Acts, viii.—The spirit of the Lord caught away Phillip, and he was found at Azotus, miles away. So now, we have so-called well authenticated stories about Home and other mediums being hoisted long distances through the air; and what sort of people are they who swallow these yarns? Yet many of our solidest men really seem to believe the old story.

Acts, xii.—It is thought a wonderful thing that a light shone in Peter's prison and his chains fell off. There certainly have been some queer concentrations of magnetic light around some of the mediums, and they have a queer way of shaking off handcuffs; but if we find so many ways of explaining these phenomena on rational grounds, why make such a time about the bare possibility of one Peter having had the same experience 2,000 years ago?

I have thus shown how readily these old stories can be put in the same boat with the new ones. If any of the D.D.'s "cry for more," I am ready.

AN EXAMPLE FOR SAN FRANCISCO.

About a century ago a gentleman in the southwestern part of France found that he could plant the moving sands near the beach with pines, in such a way that the plantation should be continued inward year after year. After becoming satisfied that it might be done, and how it might be done, he presented a memorial to the Government of France, and they gave him authority to act. The consequences are that a region of country one hundred miles along the coast, on the best part of the southwest of France, and from four to eighteen or twenty miles inward, which was, when he began, given up to sand-hills sometimes three hundred feet high, and of no value, has been restored. Not only was this tract of no value, but the sand was continually encroaching upon the land. He was set to thinking about this from the fact that the little town in which he was living had twice, in the memory of persons living, been obliged to move further inland, because the sands washed up by the Atlantic Ocean covered everything, and he determined to see if he could not prevent its being moved once more. The whole district is now covered with great forests of pine, and a beautiful city, Archachon, has been built in the very center of the forest. Two winters ago a hundred thousand persons from Paris and other great cities visited it on account of the delicious climate, because they believed that the resinous influence of the pines was beneficial to health. The pinus maritima was the particular tree made use of, and the whole country covered with it, while now all the other forest trees have grown up under it.

There is one noble means of avenging ourselves for unjust criticism; it is by doing still better, and silencing it solely by the increasing excellence of our works. This is the only way of triumphing; but if, instead of this, you undertake to dispute, to defend, or to criticize, by way of reprisal, you involve yourselves in endless troubles and disquietudes, disturb that tranquility which is so necessary to the successful exercise of your pursuit, and waste in harassing contests that precious time which you should consecrate to your art.—Canova.

THE TRUE REFORMER.

AN ALLEGORY.

It happened, so traditions say,
And too, I know the story true,
Two travelers started on their way,
With the same object both in view;
Determined they a home to gain,
Where justice, truth, and freedom reign.

Good friends they were—old neighbors kind—
True to the right, as each conceived it;
Each thought in each a friend to find,
Through good and ill, and each believed it;
Nothing, they thought, could break the spell—
The love that linked their hearts so well.

Their names—no matter for a name,
For short, we'll call them B, and A,
For many travelers, much the same
As they, are on the toilsome way,
Though some, I find, much rather talk,
Than tire themselves with such a walk.

But on they went without a fear,
And pleasing talk beguiled the way;
The road was smooth, the path was clear,
They'd no desire, nor thought to stray,
The goal they sought was dimly seen,
But still a distance lay between.

But soon their way, that seemed so clear,
As on they pass, uncertain grows;
Perplexing thoughts of doubt and fear,
And discontent between them rose,
And every way seemed dark and drear—
To travel this or that they fear.

At length, says A to B, "I fear
"We've altogether lost our way,
"I will no further go, but here
"I'll pitch my tent, and here I'll stay;
"In travelling on I fear is found,
"Uncertain roads—much dangerous ground.

"Or turn we back? The way is clear;
"Our friends are many whence we came;
"They'll welcome back with many a cheer,
"And light us with the same old flame.
"Tis madness thus to press along;
"We're torn and scratched with briar and thong.

But B, with care, looks o'er the way,
And owns with doubt he is oppressed;
"But longer here I will not stay,
Nor seek to find inglorious rest;
"I'll onward press, though death should lie
"Broad in my path my zeal to try.

"To that bright land that yonder lies,
"I press with unabated zeal,
"Away where meet the earth and skies,
"Its outlines to my sight reveal,
"Uncertain to my sense 'tis given,
"To know if 't be of earth or heaven.

So with a firm, unyielding mind,
He moves with cautious steps along,
O'er untried ways a path to find,
Uncertain if 'tis right or wrong;
But thinks it manlier far to try,
Than in supineness there to lie.

But steep and toilsome are the grounds,
And thorns and brambles hedge the way.
With garments torn, and bleeding wounds,
He turns from the uncertain way,
Then tauntingly his friends reply,
"Tis tempting heaven such way to try.

"Your garments soiled, betray your shame;
"Your bleeding wounds no pity crave,
"Your zeal for truth was but in name;
"Go hide your shame within the grave,
"You've torn the body, stained the soul,
"But still no nearer to the goal."

Now will he yield and try no more
A better world, a heaven, to gain?
Disheartened and discouraged sore,
And with the idle throng remain.
He will not yield—no! if a man,
With strength renewed he'll try again.

He'll try again, perseverance to fail,
That better way he may not find,
That soul, undaunted, will not quail,
Till earth and toll are left behind;
Others will join the race to run,
Nor cease until the goal is won.

And will the man, who spends his life
In searching good, the world to share,
And dies in the uncertain strife,
Find no reward for all his care?
If justice to the world be given
He'll find reward in earth or heaven.

BEAR AND FORBEAR.

BY DON FULANO.

A good old man, in days of yore,
Towards Bethel's town was toiling,
The way was long, his feet were sore,
The sun his brain was boiling.

He was a prophet of renown—
What we a parson call—
He strolled about from town to town;
Their profits them were small.

His coat was old, his turban torn,
His last half shekel spent,
His paper collar muchly worn—
He had no poes to rent!

To little Bethel as he came Forth troops of children ran,
And, naughty kids, they there made game
Of that most holy man.

They followed up that man of God,
And railed at his sore toes;
"How's yer sore feet?" they cried aloud,
And "What a jolly nose!"

"Who is yer 'atter?" too, they asked,
And "Twig his holy coat!"
In fact their infant minds they tasked
To chaff that sacred bloke.

He raised his tile, to wipe his brow,
And then there came a roar,
"Go up, thou bald head, go up" now
Far louder than before.

Excellent man! He raised his voice
And cursed that infant school;
They shouted with redoubled noise,
"Don't swear, you holy fool."

Ah! then he called upon the Lord
To curse each infant head;
And God his servant's prayer heard
To strike the children dead.

Two female bears rushed from the wood,
And crunched up two and forty,
Whilst he enjoyed the shrieks and blood
Of that grim dinner party.

The devil grilled them in that hole
Where naughty children go,
Where heavenly love hath left man's soul
No bottom for its woe!

And these young innocents were slain
By His divine decree,
Who shortly cried, in melting strain,
"Oh! bid them come to me!"

Who owneth America's soil?
Is it he who graspeth the hard red gold;
Whose glittering gains are by millions told;
Who bindeth his slaves to the woof and loom,
And chaineth their souls in a living tomb,—
The tomb of hopeless toil?
Not he, not he—by Heaven!

Who shieldeth America's land?
Is it he who counteth his ships by scores;
Who plucketh his gains from a thousand shores;
Who buyeth and selleth, and worketh not,
And holdeth in pride what by fraud he got,
With hard and gripping hand?
Not he, not he—by Heaven!

SPIRITUALISM, ITS PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY, SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE, ETC.

Signs of the Times.

A Springfield clergyman lately dealt severely with Rev. E. P. Hammond, in a sermon entitled "Animal vs. Spiritual Religion."

Patents are taken for every conceivable article for the use of man, and invention even goes beyond the coffin. We find a recent patent for an apparatus for depositing coffins in graves.

There are in the United States, to-day 750,000 adult white men who can neither read nor write, while of adult white women in the same illiterate condition the number amounts to 1,150,000.

The time is at hand when the people of America want to know whether there is such a principle as the inalienable rights of man, or whether it is merely a Fourth-of-July spread-eagle declamation.

The beats of the pulse can be measured with great accuracy by a photographic apparatus recently invented. By the use of this instrument the apparent single stroke of the pulse has been found to consist of three, or even four, beats in succession.

The increasing dissatisfaction of woman with her allotted "sphere" is proof that she is gradually growing towards a higher place, and in course of time it is to be hoped women will measurably outgrow the follies of fashion and the frivolities of ordinary life.

"The doctrine of evolution," says the Popular Science Monthly, "is not merely a theory of the origin of animal diversities; it is nothing less than a philosophy of Nature, and gives a new complexion to the great religious questions in which the interpretation of Nature is involved."

It is a good sign to see the San Francisco Chronicle and the Post dealing fairly, fearlessly and philosophically with the revival business. The articles in the Chronicle on this subject are admirable. The Call says little, and the Bulletin is discreetly silent.

Rev. Mr. Dunn, Dr. Stone and Dr. Patterson call it an impertinence for public school teachers to request pupils to go home from school, without stopping at the revival meetings. Has it not occurred to these gentlemen that it may possibly be a greater impertinence to waylay little children and frighten them about an angry God?

A lady writer in the Woman's Journal says: "The new under wear for woman shifts a great weight from the hips to the shoulders, and gives a delightful sense of ease and freedom in walking. One scarcely understands why it is that the body is much more evenly and thoroughly warm, nor what has become of the heat and pressure over the small of the back."

The female operatives at Fall River denounce what they term the cowardly action of the men in accepting reduced wages. They say, "We realize vividly the fact that we must resist this tendency on the part of a combination of mill owners to cut down our wages, and that every reduction they succeed in establishing renders us less able to resist the next."

Dr. Kosch, of Vienna, has discovered a method of making colors fire-proof, so that they may be used for painting on China.

A large manufacturer of Detroit, Mich., lately said: "I expect some day to see the working men rise and go clean through us."

It is reported that the plague has made its appearance in Mecca, and it is feared that it will be carried by the pilgrims to all parts of Europe.

Some French Republicans have sent to the widow of John Brown a gold medal in memory of her husband and companions who were "judicially assassinated, at Charleston, Dec. 2d 1859."

Miss Ellen D. Larned, of Thompson, Ct., is writing a history of Windham county which is spoken of as "one of the most marked historical works that have ever been produced by a woman."

Benj. Skinner, in the Word, says "The next step for humanity is not the abolition of the State, the family nor the right to hold property in land, but the next thing is to abolish stealing through interest on money."

Mrs. Maxwell, of Boulder, Colorado, has collected specimens of natural history, mineralogy, and curiosities that would do credit to a professor. She has a great variety of animals and birds, which she shot, skinned and stuffed.

The Smith sisters of Glastonbury, Ct., whose case against Tax Collector Andrews for seizing their land for non-payment of taxes, has been decided against them in the Court of Common Pleas at Hartford, will appeal to the Supreme Court.

The increased demands of modern life require that a man shall know more things than were formerly thought necessary for success, and it is proposed that the course of study in Colleges be lengthened, or that a post-graduate course be added.

An elegant imitation of marble is made in Dresden for architectural purposes, by impregnating sandstone with silicio acid and alumina. In Naundorf, such stones are prepared which are intensely white, transparent, and capable of taking a polish.

Dr. Patterson says the dictation of public school teachers to children with regard to going home instead of attending the revival meetings, will not be submitted to. We can tell him that the dictation of the priests will not be much longer submitted to.

The enforcement of the Civil Rights Law in the Southern States is likely to lead to trouble, but no more than might have been expected. People cannot overcome the prejudices of years in a day. Ere long order will come out of chaos, and all parties will be the better for the turmoil.

After Mrs. Moulton had given her testimony in the Beecher case, Beecher said it was mainly a lie. He forgot a certain letter which he once wrote to Moulton: "Not the least has been the great-hearted kindness and trust which your noble wife has shown, and, which have lifted me out of despondencies often, though sometimes her clear truthfulness has laid me pretty flat."

THE PHILOSOPHY OF ASTROLOGY.—NO. 3.

DIVINATION.

Horary Astrology is a system of divination in which the stars are symbols and signs; whereas in genethliacal Astrology stars are causes of events. The one is a system of indication the other of causation.

To better understand how Astrology can be used as a system of divination it will be necessary to first consider what divination is, and on what principles it is based. The word divination necessarily implies a belief in divinity, and that divinity can be consulted. As a belief it is almost universal, and if universality of belief is a potent argument in favor of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, then fortune-telling as a truth, rests on an argument equally well founded. As long as humanity questions, so long will there be found those who will attempt an answer; and on this questioning—this restless, this intense prying into occult mysteries and the future—has been built all the systems of priest-craft and fortune-telling the world has ever seen. For a priest is only a fortune-teller, a diviner; a D.D., a profound fortune-teller. The Bible is a book of fortune-telling, a divining of the will of God to man. Of course it denounces all methods of divination which does not employ its priests. There are no fewer than sixteen methods thus prescribed.

But why should Joseph with his divining cup be rated higher than our grandmothers who are deeply versed in the occult mysteries in the tea grounds at the bottom of our cups? If Samuel, the prophet, were alive to-day, we might expect the following card in the daily papers under the heading, ASTROLOGY.

DR. SAMUEL,

(LATE OF PALESTINE.)

SEER, CLAIRVOYANT AND BUSINESS MEDIUM.

Specialty—The recovery of lost asses and kings.

PROFESSOR DANIEL,

THE ACKNOWLEDGED ONLY LIVING ASTROLOGER

AND

INTERPRETER OF DREAMS.

Why was it orthodox and legitimate in Bible times to believe in dreams, signs, omens and prophets, and why is the same belief heterodox to-day?

In treating of divination, it will be necessary to use the word, God. This word is the indefinable factor of philosophy, the unknowable in science and the incomprehensible in theology. Philosophy uses the word under protest, as indispensable, the algebraic expression of unknown quantities. In Astrology and divination it means that subtle sympathy which pervades all nature, unifying all its parts into one grand whole; that permeating intelligence which guides all animated things—and all things are animate—to the accomplishment of the purpose of their being; in which every question that has been propounded by man has its origin and solution. The crude perception of this universal principle; vague, twilight glimmerings of truth; the broken distorted images reflected from a disturbed mind; the deceptive mirage which puzzles the wayfarer in search of truth, have originated superstitions and false theologies without number. Even our boasted enlightenment fails to eradicate the traditionary superstition which nails a horse-shoe over the door; is careful which shoulder the new moon is seen over; will not let baby see itself in a mirror, or have its nails cut till it is a year old; and covers the ground, fills the air and inhabits dream-land with signs and omens. To reach the true perception and apprehension of this principle is the legitimate mission of divination.

Divination has been divided into two classes, natural and artificial. Natural divination is that which proceeds directly from the mind of man entranced or inspired; artificial divination requires the media of arbitrary signs and symbols.

Natural divination reveals the future and illuminates the understanding, brings man nearer to God, more en rapport with Nature's self, the Soul of the World. A much broader meaning must yet be given to the word, intelligence. In Nature, we find manifestations of intelligence, but find ourselves cramped in using the word, for, limiting its meaning within the operation of intelligence emanating from our brains, we confine all intelligence to the operation of an organic person. We could have no idea of mathematics, geometry, or any of the exact sciences if they were not already in Nature; no idea of philosophy, theology, or metaphysics would ever disturb our brains, if it were not already in Mother Nature, from whom we have received every attribute we possess. The very highest, noblest attempts of human intelligence are but efforts, feeble efforts, to imitate Nature.

This all pervading intelligence, which makes the universe something more than a machine, guided by more than mechanical laws, which makes every atom a living thing, governs all things in unity. There is no inert matter. Life, motion, intelligence are the eternal conditions of everything; in dew drops and worlds; in the beating of the heart and the revolutions of celestial systems; in the heights above and depths beneath, a common intelligence governs all, a secret bond of sympathy unites all, and in all harmony exists as the grand result to be attained, an absolute necessity. This unity is the essence of Monotheism with its complementary idea, pantheism. But while there is infinite unity, there is also infinite diversity.

If there be indivisible atoms, they must in themselves be self-existent, eternal in being and attributes; if there be in us an individuality, a germ, of which we are but the expression, the ego which asserts itself, then it too is self-existent.

There can be no genesis to the essence of any existence, whether you call it matter or spirit. Nor is there a beginning to a principle.

This assertion of individuality, this universal diversity is the essence of polytheism and its complementary idea, atheism.

Monotheism and pantheism, polytheism and atheism, are each in itself only a portion of truth, each equally demonstrable, equally true, while the whole truth embodies them all.

When the individual is in complete harmony with the universal, when he has become one with God, he has reached the highest point of human aspiration, the culmination of all that is possible in man or angel.

The attainment of this end is the purpose of all true divination. The union of the individual and the universal, in its various imperfect manifestations in human history, has originated its varied theologies and philosophies. All religions point exultingly, in proof of their divine mission, to some one, who, absorbed in ecstasy, in union with God, manifested extraordinary mental and psychic powers. Prof. Tyndall alluding to this phenomena says: "As states of consciousness those phenomena have an undisputed reality, and a substantial identity. They are, however, connected with the most heterogeneous objective conceptions. Porphyry wrote against Christianity; Mr. Page-Roberts is a devout Christian. But notwithstanding the utter discordance of these objective conceptions, their subjective experiences are similar, because of the similarity of their finely-strung nervous organizations."

Mesmerism has demonstrated the existence of a medium which connects mind with mind; and psychometry reveals the fact that connection is still further established between mind and everything else. The following is given on the authority of Prof. Huxley, as illustrative of this idea:

"Suppose that we take away from the brain of a frog all that portion called the hemisphere, the anterior part of the brain. * * * It sees nothing: it hears nothing. It will starve sooner than feed itself, although, if food is put into its mouth, it swallowed it. * * * And what is still more remarkable is this, that if you put him on a table, and put a book between him and the light, and give him a little jog behind, he will jump—take a long jump, very possibly—but he won't jump against the book; he will jump to the right or to the left, but he will get out of the way, showing that, although he is absolutely insensible to light, there is still a something which passes through the sensory nerve, acts upon the machinery of his nervous system, and causes it to adapt itself to the proper action."

Thus gradually and surely is Science resurrecting the forgotten ideas of the past, of which little is left but superstition, traditionary fables and the fossils embedded in works on Astrology and occult philosophy.

Vox STELLARUM.

We behold modern spiritualists as one vast bedlam; no dozen, nor in fact scarcely any two or three agreeing in their ideas of right, morality or sociality. What wonderful stupidity it is in any spiritualist to say Christ or the spirit of truth has come, when there is no unity and harmony with spiritualists.—Kingdom of Heaven.

We have no sympathy with either political party. We know no policy, but go straight for truth every time. Both parties are doing the best they can, but are both ephemeral, for they are only plotting and planning—ignorantly, the destruction of the government they falsely profess to love—because it is their own dear selves that all these partizan leaders love so dearly.—Kingdom of Heaven.

OUR CURRENCY AND TAX LAW.

A representative of intrinsic value is the great mistake of the age. Demand and supply will regulate prices under a steady currency, but when unsteady, as a mixed one must be, dishonest and designing men take advantage and make rings and corners in both currency and trade, to the detriment of the poor and the producers. The old parties have got in the same rut, and there is no hope from them. The only plan is to turn them out and put in the new party; abolish all outstanding paper money, then issue legal tenders for all manner of debts direct from the Government, in sufficient volume for all business purposes, exchangeable for bonds, at the pleasure of the holder, and convertible again into currency, when needed.

Let gold and silver take their chances either as coin or bullion among the things of commerce, but not as a regulator of prices in the home market. Then a great many clerks, bookkeepers, money shavers, brokers, stock jobbers, etc., could take the plow-handles or jack plane, much to the people's advantage and little harm to them. By the same rule we might turn into producers several thousand revenue and custom house officers, as their occupation would be gone, for free trade and direct taxation would take the place of the tariff swindle, and all laws for the collection of debts might be swept from the statute book, and most of the lawyers sent to earn an honest living.

Labor demands first, a labor currency that will not fluctuate, and in sufficient volume to pay as we go, based upon the honor and credit of the Government. Second, the exemption of one thousand dollars of every person's property from all manner of tax. Third, a graduated tax above one thousand. Money sharks say, "Give us the control of the currency, and we care not who has the Government." And well they might, as the people can testify from sad experience. The Government and people are both at their mercy. The currency we advocate will remain of the same value, will diffuse itself all over the country; interest will be the same every where; money centres will not be known; the people of the State will not all crowd to San Francisco in hopes of shaving somebody out of a fortune, but will follow the legitimate branches of industry everywhere.

The Government might well turn some of its large and unnecessary buildings, mints, custom houses, etc., into store houses, buy grain of farmers with the new currency, use government vessels or build others and ship grain to pay debts in Europe or other places. This principle of co-operation of the people through their Government, like others already established, would be a great step in progression. Building railroads, or aiding farmers to do so, to remote farming districts, would circulate the new currency, and relieve distress in the distant points of our country.

But you may say, your graduated tax principle will drive large capitalists from the country. Where will they go? If the plan is once started, there will be no stopping place in America, and if they want to go they can't take the soil or any other fixtures, and the rest we can do very well without, if we have the new legal tenders, so we can stop interest, decrease business credit and dispense with nearly all our law proceedings. The manipulation of the currency under its gold basis is the principal cause of distress and misery in the political, religious and social relations of life. Abolish the system and adopt graduated taxation, and man and woman will move together side by side, down the stream of life, harmonious, and in peace. When man obtains his rights, woman will have hers, and both be happy. Neither can be while we have a currency and a system of taxation that robs thirty six millions of people, that three millions may roll in wealth, and waft their pride and insolence through the land.

THE SOCIAL PALACE.

BY MARIE HOWLAND, AUTHOR OF "PAPA'S OWN GIRL."

Woman, whoever you are whose eye catches the above heading, read this article carefully. It is written especially for you, and for this reason: you are suspicious of community life, combined households, etc. They suggest to you a place where there are duties and sacrifices for principle's sake, the compensation being, among other things, society, which you feel pretty certain, from all you have read and heard, would not benefit you much unless you are one of the shirks. Hence when your male friends tell of combined households you either oppose the idea or you assent simply because you do not wish to be considered unprogressive or old foggyish in your sentiments.

You are right enough generally in your opposition. When your male friends talk of establishing a community say this to them. "Will you organize social life so that women may be emancipated from the cradle, the cook stove and the wash-tub? If I must be still a slave to these, I shall not make any great effort to change." You may say this without any fear of being called unprogressive by any one whose opinion is worth considering; for there never was a housekeeper so devoted that she did not long to get free from cooking and scrubbing and washing as a duty, unless indeed she had grown old in such service, and had become a mere hard handed unattractive scrub, with all hope and ambition crushed out of her; and there never was a mother so tender and so devoted that she could not be exhausted in strength and patience by nursing little ones hour after hour, day after day and month after month. What man can comprehend what it is to steam over the wash-tub and the cooking stove all day, and then when almost sinking for want of rest, to have a baby tugging at the breast all night. Why the half of what thousands and thousands of women endure has never been written or spoken, and can only be fully understood by women themselves!

Mr. Godin, the founder of the Social Palace of Guise, in France, seems to have had a marvelous insight into the wants of the people when he organized the social life in that magnificent home which his humanity led him to build for his workmen and their families. He reasons in his book thus:

To know what the poor should have we have only to see what those who have riches invariably supply for themselves; for mankind is one in all essential needs.

The rich build themselves palaces with spacious grounds and gardens to delight their leisure hours.

Very well; the poor should have their palaces with spacious grounds and gardens to delight their leisure hours.

The rich have separate rooms for sleeping, for dining, for cooking, for washing, etc.

Very well; the poor must have all these.

The rich do not drag out the lives of their women with the never ceasing nursing of children. They have nurseries and nurses whose special function is to see that the children are well cared for and happy.

Very well; the poor must have their nursery where the needs of children can be better supplied than in the family rooms.

The rich have fine schools for their children where the best teachers are engaged and every means taken to secure them a good education.

Very well; the poor must have fine schools, the best teachers and every means to develop all the forces of their children.

The rich have leisure to study and for social entertainment. They have libraries and works of art. They have baths every day, comfortable and becoming attire for all seasons, and a generous supply of good and wholesome food.

Very well; the poor must not be obliged to work all the hours of the day. They must have leisure for study and for social intercourse. They must have libraries and works of art. They must have baths every day, comfortable and becoming attire for all seasons and a generous supply of good and wholesome food.

And so Mr. Godin goes on showing that all which wealth and industry can obtain should be at the disposal of those who do the world's work. This logic was the inspiration of the grandest enterprise of the century, the Social Palace at Guise.

This palace stands just over the river Oise opposite the city of Guise, and has been in successful operation over ten years. It is adapted to accommodate nearly fifteen hundred people. He is a noble and generous man, a day laborer himself during his younger years. He would gladly have his workmen own the Social Palace, but through trouble with his heirs, and especially through the laws of France, he has not been able so far to accomplish this.

There is the same trouble in this country. The law does not recognize the responsibility of ownership except in the individual. An associative establishment must be controlled by one or two trustees or whatnot whom the law regards in the light of owners of the whole. But to return to the Social Palace. It is a magnificent structure surrounded by fields and groves and gardens through which winds the picturesque river Oise. The great iron manufactory is at a little distance. The palace consists of three great quadrangles each one having its interior court with an immense roof of glass. These quadrangles join, and corridors on each of the floors permit free communication. Around the interior courts, under the glass roofs on each story, run corridors, protected by strong iron balustrades, and to these the apartments open. The walls are very high, studded and elegantly "hard finished;" the windows are large and open in every suite of apartments on the court and also on the outside of the palace. A steam engine forces the water from distant living springs on to every floor of the building, and on the roof of the principal one is a great reservoir of this water. This reservoir is connected with hydrants in the courts, and on warm days the courts, the walls, the balconies and even the great glass roofs themselves are thoroughly sprinkled, thus rendering the air cool and sweet. The floors of the balconies being of tiles the water can do no harm.

The ventilation of the palace is on a new plan. So far as I know it is the only building in the world that can be called perfectly ventilated. This is effected by immense subterranean galleries opening north some distance from the palace. These galleries run all around the cellars and under the courts, and the fresh air passes through them into the courts and up through interior passages in the walls that open by register into every apartment. It is the design of Mr. Godin to put hot air furnaces in these passages and thus warm the palace at the same time it is ventilated; about the time his book was written (1871) this had not yet been accomplished.

The ground story of the palace is used for shops of all kinds. Everything that families or individuals can want is there supplied without going into the open air, and at a moderate advance upon the cost. Mr. Godin has suffered untold persecution through the merchants of Guise who considered him as an enemy to their profits.

The adjuncts of the palace are the school building, with the nursery on the first floor, and connected with one of the quadrangles by a covered corridor, so that all the little and big children can attend without umbrellas or overcoats, whatever be the state of the weather; the theatre a very beautiful ornate building, with a fine auditorium, stage, stage wardrobe and all modern appointments for theatrical representations; a restaurant, a bakery, a cafe, a billiard room and a reading-room; Swimming baths, a fine steam laundry with the best modern improvements; Stables and carriage houses, and an abattoir (slaughter-house.) These are the adjuncts of this splendid working man's home. The management is under the control of two councils of twelve, one of men the other of women which unite in deliberation whenever necessary. These councils are elected by universal suffrage. Citizen means person in the Social Palace and no certificate of sex is required in the elections! All vote who are over sixteen years of age, and younger than that even, if they are able to support themselves by their industry. Mr. Godin says this may not be considered wise by many people but it works admirably. There is a reason for this. The children, even in the lowest classes of the school, understand well the simple system of democratic government that prevails. They elect by ballot their little industrial Chiefs who lead them forth into the gardens on fine days, where, supplied with their implements, they carry out the instructions received by their chiefs from the head gardener. For this they receive a certain amount of money; and Mr. Godin says these little chiefs are exceedingly anxious to fill their office so well that they may gain the approbation of their constituents. From what Mr. Godin says it is evident that the young generation growing up in the Social Palace, use the words ballot, election, constituents, candidate, &c., with the same comprehension that they do doll or hop-scotch; so when they come to vote for the officers controlling higher departments they understand that they are dealing with different features in the problem of which they have studied the first principles already.

The law "Attractions are proportional to destinies" is fully recognized in the Social Palace. The woman council can discuss any part of the management, but it is found that they naturally gravitate towards the domestic department, the nursery, the schools, the laundry, and they oversee and report upon the quality of the supplies.

"There is but one law in the Social Palace, and that is, Liberty," says Mr. Godin. Any woman can do all her cooking and washing in her apartments, she can keep her babies there all the time or a part of the time, and the rest in the nursery, just as she pleases. There is only one thing obligatory, and that is that the children must be kept at school. It is hardly necessary to add that there is a remarkable unanimity of sentiment among the women relative to the advantages of the laundry, the nursery and the great cuisine or kitchen. This last supplies a constant demand for hot soups, roasts, made dishes, vegetables and everything necessary for the simple or the elaborate repast. As the women are free from nursing and cooking cares, they take various positions in the industries, schools, shops, laundry, etc. Over seventy are thus engaged on regular salaries. These women, coming in at noon and meeting their children from the schools and their husbands from their work, send to the great cuisine and order whatever they want, all hot and perfectly cooked, and at a cost which is but a very slight advance upon the actual cost of the articles, and thus, an excellent dinner is quickly served without the loss of time, or incurring the trouble of making and preparing it. Wines being purchased in great quantities directly from the producers, are furnished cheap and pure to the members of the Social Palace.

Of the internal order of this residence of over a thousand people, one comment alone is sufficient: there has not been one single police case in the Social Palace since its founda- tion; and as the courts are lighted with gas all night, the opportunity for the operations of burglars is reduced to a minimum.

Education in the schools embraces a wide range of scientific and practical drill. In the lower classes the Froebel exercises constitute an important part. What are Froebel exercises? many readers will ask. This is most easily explained by an imaginary tableau. You enter a large room where you see from eighty to a hundred children seated at an immense long table, a plank on trestles that can be easily put in its place when wanted—small cabinets are brought and placed upon this table, and from numerous drawers are produced miniature boards, blocks, posts, sticks, plastic clay and many other objects, and with these the children commence to construct houses, villages, fences, balconies, furniture, statuary, etc. You think they are playing with toys. So they are; but they are pursuing a method, and their play is constructive play. Some of them show remarkable invention and skill, stimulated by friendly emulation and the natural love of beautiful forms; and to all it is a rare culture of the mind, at the same time it trains the muscles in skillful and exact manipulation. When the exercise is finished the same little hands replace every object in its allotted place in the cabinet, and thus the whole ends with a lesson in method and order.

All the educational advantages are free, and in the nursery and pouponnat (the poupons are the little tots from the age when they can walk well up to about four or five years, when they enter the bombinat or lowest department of the school proper,) food of the best kind and prepared in the most proper manner is supplied. Parents take the poupons home for the night, and the nurselings also if they desire it. The mother can leave her babe in the nursery all or part of the time, go and nurse it from her breast at intervals, or keep it wholly in her own apartment, just as she pleases. Freedom reigns everywhere. Women volunteer as nurses, or are chosen for known capacity, and though mothers at first thought they could not leave their infants out of sight, they soon learned to be grateful for the nursery, because the babies themselves fretted at home and were cross until they were taken back among their peers. The nursery is kept as sweet as a rose garden, the youngest babies go to bed without crying and without rocking. Strangers have freely testified to this. They have toys of all kinds, and from the broad balcony of the nursery on fine days they watch the parrots and gay birds in the aviary, and are taken into the grounds and gardens to frolic and roll on the lawns. There are magnificent hot and cold and shower and swimming baths for all. One of the latter has a floor that is brought up nearly to the surface of the water, so that the very smallest children may disport themselves with entire safety.

In the palace there is a medical department where two physicians and a midwife are in constant attendance, and all surgical and nursing paraphernalia are at the service of the sick. Whenever a workman is ill he draws a daily amount from the sick fund for the support of his family, and if he dies his children are adopted and trained up to a useful industrious career.

In the schools there are many prizes. Those who take high rank for politeness and grace of bearing are rewarded by being admitted to the dramatic society—a much coveted honor. Music, both vocal and instrumental, is taught thoroughly. In May and September there are two great festivals, one to the children and the other in honor of labor. On those occasions the vast court of the great quadrangle is decorated from base to dome with garlands of flowers, banners and trophies of labor, physical or intellectual, and there, amid thousands of spectators that pour in from miles around, filling the tiers of galleries that extend all around the court, prizes are distributed, speeches are made, and when this is over the corps of firemen in gay uniforms transform the scene with magical quickness into a magnificent ball-room, where under the brilliant gas and to the sound of the Social Palace bands of music, happy feet "tread the measures of the dance" until far into the night.

For all these advantages of comfort, education and culture, the inhabitants pay simply their rent, which is about the same others pay for their crowded inconvenient tenement accommodations; and with all this, be it said for the benefit of narrow-minded capitalists, the enterprise pays six per cent. on the money invested. Capitalists can make more by ordinary tenement system, to be sure, but the result of their cupidity will be—what their worst fears anticipate. Let them learn a lesson before it is too late.

Hammonton, N. J.

BETTER THAN GOD.

The "revivalist," Hammond, told a story at one of his meetings last week, that ought to make any sensible person heartily ashamed of him and the whole story of the Christian plan of salvation, and which did make a little girl of eight years say that her papa was better than God. Hammond represented a school ma'am who had a good little girl of her own named Susan, and in her school, two girls, Sarah and Rebecca, who were very naughty. One day Sarah and Rebecca played truant, and the school ma'am got terribly angry. Susan saw that her mother's blood was up, and pitied the two runaways with all her heart. At last, her sympathy rose to such a pitch that she offered to take the whipping for the others, and her mother was mad enough, and did so yearn to be whipping somebody, that she took the poor innocent Susan, her own child, and laid the lash on till there were great welts all over her shoulders and back. And when the runaways returned, and learned what had been done, they so loved Susan that they fell upon her neck, and vowed to serve her evermore. Now, said he, this is an allegory. The school ma'am is God, Susan is Jesus Christ, and the two naughty little girls are you.

What blasphemy is this! Why a school ma'am that would do such a thing as that, would be an execrable wretch, unfit for human society; and to represent God in such a dye is blasphemy of the blackest character. Well might a little girl say that her papa was better than that God. Her brother, she said, gave her a scare, and she let the baby fall and hurt its face. Mother got as mad as a hornet, and told papa. He was about to whip the girl, when the boy, two years older, said it was his fault, and he was bigger and stronger and abler to take the whipping than his little sister, and would take it all. But the father was so happy to find his little children love each other so that he forgave them both. Well might she say he was better than God. Mr. Hammond's God is a bloody tyrant, if he would do as that school ma'am did. S. W.

POLITICS AND RELIGION IN THE GRANGES.—No. 2.

BY A. GAYLORD SPALDING.

As before quite clearly explained, politics has two very plain and distinct features. One is proper, commendable and everywhere applicable, relating to the business affairs, commerce, and social arrangements of men. The other is narrow and sectional, disturbing and corrupting the morals, and the peace and welfare of society. This latter kind is wholly incompatible with Grange principles, and is therefore rejected from the Order.

Religion too, is open to the same criticism. There is the true and the false—the practical and the speculative. Religion is natural, and no nation is found without it—being manifested according to mental and moral development. But the sectarian quality cannot come into the Grange for obvious reasons. The element of principle and humanity is not its all-pervading power. It cuts the people up into antagonizing factions, under senseless creeds and names, and consequently curses more than it blesses the world.

THE GRANGERS A HAPPY FAMILY.

The family group of parents and children is a natural and beautiful order of all grades of the human race. Each family is a home, and most happy and heavenly may it be. No such bliss exists elsewhere on earth. The Grange is devised and organized after the family pattern, in larger groups. The idea is exceedingly simple and practicable, and most intelligent, perfect and attractive. No unselfish farmer or workingman can fail to appreciate and accept it. Hurrah, then, for the Granges! Multiply and speed them over the wide continent. Every practical interest in them comes under the head of politics or religion, and must be fully discussed and fully understood. Ignorance is our ruin.

THE GRANGERS' BATTLE.

The battle of the Grangers is for labor reform against a powerful and crushing moneyed aristocracy. Old parties and sects are all under the leadership of such an aristocracy—a combined money power, with social position and office holding. They claim their privileges as a rightful heritage of the upper-ten class, on the ground of custom and precedent; and the brute force of sword, cannon, and bloody armies stands ready to defend them, while the working muscle of the common people is ground up for their use. It is a world monopoly of ages, which a world co-operation of Grangers and Sovereigns must overthrow. It is the battle of Armageddon. The monopoly of politics in our country is well represented by such men as De Hon. Bill King, of Minnesota. How he gobbled up the votes in his district, by the power of Durham bulls and subsidized newspapers! He won the election, but is bound to hang himself, Judas-like, as a compensation. Shame on the people, and shame on the newspapers. They hang themselves, effectually by such voting, and disgrace the ballot box.

THE BEECHER SCANDAL.

The clerical and church monopoly and aristocracy is powerfully and proudly represented by the Beecher stripe. Money unstinted is invested in Henry Ward & Co. But that first-class Brooklyn scandal, though a black disgrace on civilized christendom, will fortunately do very much to break the yoke of sectarian slavery on the working class. Thanks to the Most High, then, for Beecher-Tilton scandals. They will leaven the whole lump. Thousands of similar cases may exist around us; but they are plebeian, and fail to come to the surface, or get into the newspapers. We needed a big one, and we have got it.

CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION!

The character of our much-boasted civilization may be judged by our police gazettes, as well as by the quality of brag clergymen, and men high in office. What Indian tribe can show a worse moral record? Yet we send abroad our pious missionaries, and talk of exterminating the Modocs, and actually hang them! Now shall Grangers patronize any such religion, or any such politics? God forbid. Our common religion is threadbare, stale, and dead, with formalism and Sundayism. If it is Bible it isn't common sense, and the Bible needs making over. The religion is hid away too far in the sky. It is sky religion, with a sky heaven, and its steeples run too high up. Come down, saints, come down. The Grange brings things down among the people, into their houses and homes. A heaven right at our door is far more convenient than one up in the moon. How long will it take to make earth a paradise by devoting a hundred and fifty millions to splendid church buildings in New York, while ninety thousand stout men there are unemployed, with no potatoes in the cellar? A million years won't do it. And yet that is the sectarian method all round, and partly politics joins in to help it. It is the anise, mint, and cummin Sunday religion of professional aristocracy, with Andover kid-glove minister graduates to pound and expound in velvet cushioned desks. But the true Grange religion is better suited to the wants of plain, homely, and sensible workingmen.

"He who knows our greatest needs,
Recks not man who counts his beads,
For righteousness is not in creeds,
Nor solemn faces;
But lies rather in kindly deeds,
And Christian graces."

We may well expect a blissful heaven in a future life; but the important work of the Grangers now is, to avoid the hell of monopoly and aristocracy, and political damnation. Some contend that good men should stick to the old parties and sects, in order to purify and reform them. But clearly that is bad logic and poor philosophy; for a man can never lift himself in a basket while standing in it. And, as our new wine of reform needs new bottles to hold it, so we must stand outside of the basket, and outside of parties and sects, if we would lift them up. It requires a machine more powerful than any stump puller in the country.

THE GRANGERS.

The Grange movement, then, is no mixture, and no compromise, but an entirely new departure, out and out. Not in party interest of any kind, nor sect; but it is a fanning mill, a sifter, that is to be separate the cockle and the chaff of politics and religion, saving only the clean wheat of principle. That is the farmer's gold. We may discard old names altogether, and be known only as the Grange party. Then nothing is left ambiguous, but all is distinctly understood, and boldly outspoken.

THE DRONES.

No dependence for reform can be placed in any but actual and responsible workers. None of your lily fingers, that seek the easy places and shirk the hard. That style of business is playing out. That is what spoils church and state, and sets them tumbling. We are told a hard story of the carpet-baggers, in the shape of dandy peddlers and traveling agents for patent speculations, to make quick fortunes, and avoid the sweat. Thousands graduate from our colleges, and strive to stand in public desks and professional offices, because such positions are easy, genteel, and well paid. But the money comes out of farmers and workers. Fifty thousand pulpit men in the nation (including H. W. B.) are so many two-legged grass hoppers—and worse than the little famine-breeding insects, because they (the two-leggers) stay by, and eat all the time. Such shirks and vampires are always on hand to be chaplains, and such like pretty things, that require the least toil. But we find the true emblems of trust, honor, manliness, and national prosperity, are the axe, hoe, spade, and plow, with "hay seed in the hair."

CO-OPERATION.

The principle of fraternal unity and co-operation is fundamental in the Grange. This not only kills all monopoly, but it will wipe away that old red dragon of gory war—that most fearful scourge of mankind. Government officers and military men, under the present violent order of things, are interested in the plunder of battle-fields, and would therefore be slow to accept any doctrine of permanent peace. Their trade is war. But when all shall become Grangers and Sovereigns, then human carnage will be forced to stop. Othello's occupation will be gone. So roll on the glorious Grange ball, round the world. Roll it along!

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The woman question now fills up the book. We speak of the Grange as a family order; but no family is without a woman. She is mother, wife, sister, and does a great deal, wherever she is. In the hive she is a queen; in sickness, she is the best nurse; and she can tend the baby better than "any other man." If we sleep well at night, a woman has made the soft and downy bed. Every man is proud of his table when a charming lady pours the tea. Where woman is, there is sweetest music, and the perfume of roses; and where happiness dwells, and love, surely woman is not far away. Then, would not all these beautiful things be represented in her vote? Indeed they would. Good government is not wholly made up of bull-dogs, swords and guns, and the noise and smell of gunpowder. And the still, small, gentle voice of woman's ballot could certainly do no harm, could it?

Champlin, Minn., March 1875.

Could society, by some omnipotent fiat, determine that, from this day, no sexual intercourse should occur, save when there are sound minds in sound bodies, less than half century would witness the closing of hospitals, saloons, penitentiaries and houses of ill-fame—the extinction almost to a man of physicians, and the cessation of every movement whose purpose is the lessening of human suffering and vice. Taxes would sink to a minimum; men and women would tread the earth with the springy, buoyant step of perfect health; and the millenium would commence its glorious reign upon this our sin-bestridden and disease-cursed earth.—Chicago Times.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAR. 13, 1875.

Several long articles, two of which we have had in type for months, waiting for a place, are published this week, and the consequence is we do not present our usual variety of matter. The articles will all be found interesting.

Having recently received a letter pronouncing as fraudulent certain Spiritual manifestations in this city, we have spent considerable time in an investigation, and have concluded that they are genuine, but we have no room for a report. Next week we will give both sides.

Probably there is no doctrine connected with Spiritualism that has excited so much opposition as that of Reincarnation. The Banner of Light has been its advocate in a mild way, for years, and there are many believers for the theory, but the great body of Spiritualists look upon the idea unfavorably. We give on page 517 an article which we took from the London Spiritualist several months ago, and which has been waiting for a place in our columns ever since. It is intensely interesting, and furnishes the most positive proof in favor of this repulsive doctrine we have ever seen. Reincarnation is not a pleasant thing to think of, but if it is a truth, let us know it.

A friend in Los Angeles writes as follows :

I have enjoyed many a happy hour in perusing your highly valuable paper, "Common Sense" which I believe is destined to become the "leading exponent of Spiritualism" on this Coast, and a burning shame it will be if all—not only the Spiritists, but Liberals—do not give to "Common Sense" their willing support. * * * * "Common Sense" will win. The Angel world will aid you in speaking the gospel of truth, which will free all mankind from Priestly mummery—and aid in the sundering of dogmatic Church bondage.

D. W. C. FRANKLIN.

Another friend in Santa Clara county, who subscribes for stock, says : "I do so not so much in hopes of dividends, as to assist in upholding the good cause you so ably defend. I am well pleased with the course COMMON SENSE takes in all the reforms of the day, and hope it may get a sufficiency of the 'one thing needful' to sustain it in its struggles against the error, bigotry and superstition so rampant all over the country."

CALL FOR A STATE CONVENTION.

ED. COMMON SENSE :—For several days the Powers Above have been prompting me to issue a call for a mass meeting of the Liberalists of California to be convened in San Francisco on the 31st of this month—the 27th anniversary of the dawn of the great Spiritual Dispensation, which is the crowning event of this age. The occasion is worthy of a significant commemoration by all the progressive men and women of the Pacific Coast, and while the enemies of Free Thought are "compassing sea and land to make proselytes" to stem the current of liberal ideas, it behooves all who love religious liberty, and the Truth which has made them free from idolatry and superstition, to especially signify their appreciation of the momentous event which ushered in the era of Spiritual freedom which has now dawned. In pursuance of this purpose, I would suggest that the Liberalists of San Francisco at once make suitable arrangements for holding a State Convention for agitating the great practical questions of the age, and for the purpose of mutual acquaintance, and fraternal fellowship among the Liberal fraternity of this progressive State. There is now an unusual amount of speaking talent on this coast, and it seems to be an opportune occasion for a grand rally of the scattered forces of the Pacific department of the Grand Army of Progress. What say you Brothers and Sisters,—Shall we not show to the world that the Spiritualists and Free Thinkers of California are not behind their Eastern co-laborers in activity, and a soulful appreciation of the most important event of the century? Time for preparation is brief, but ample if fully and actively improved. I would suggest that the Friends of Progress at once meet for consultation, and take such action in the premises as will secure the co-operation of the various speakers, and make all other preliminary arrangements necessary; then issue an official call for a mass convention as above proposed, through the leading papers of the State.

Assuring all of whatever aid I may be able to render, I submit this proposition for the action of all interested.

Yours for Truth and Progress, DR. DEAN CLARKE.

We warmly approve the proposition for a Convention of Spiritualists, and trust that a call may be issued immediately, signed by those who are willing to exert themselves to make it a success, but we fear that the day proposed by friend Clark is too early to permit of extended notice and preparation. We shall refer to the subject again next week; meantime we hope to hear a favorable response to the suggestion from all parts of the State.

MEETINGS OF INTEREST.—The Free Thinkers in this city who desire to attend public meetings on Sunday has his choice of several Liberal Societies. The lectures of Mrs. Allyn, the discussions of the Society for Self Culture; the Independent Lyceum at Grand Central Hall, and the Philomathean Society at Social Hall are places for the utterance of radical thought. In all of them, excepting at Mrs. Allyn's, the visitor has the privilege to talk, and even there he can ask questions. Reports of these meetings this week are crowded out, but they were all interesting.

The Chronicle justly says, with regard to the "conversion" of children, "a morbid self consciousness is developed that unbalances both the intellectual and moral nature, and destroys that innocent spontaneity which is the chief and crowning charm of childhood."

THE PHILOMATHEANS.

Mrs. Hanks was unexpectedly called away, and Prof. Chaney again lectured, his subject being, "The Phenomena of Moral Life." He commenced by reading a portion of the record which tells of the drunkenness and incest of Lot. This man had been christened "Righteous"—Righteous Lot. Only Lot and his accomplished daughters were saved from the shower of "fire and brimstone" which fell upon Sodom and Gomorrah. They were saved on account of their goodness, their purity and high moral character! The lecturer next alluded to David, "a man after God's own heart." On his death-bed David required Solomon to swear that he would kill Shimei. Solomon took the oath, and David died with murder in his heart. Solomon fulfilled the bloody mission, and poor Shimei was slaughtered. Solomon was called the "wisest man" of his time, yet what fools the others must have been, for Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines; only a fool would surround himself with a thousand women, for Nature evidently intended one man for one woman, since the sexes are produced in about equal proportions. These are the phenomena of moral life as shown forth in the lives of the ancients, and popular theology demands that they should be accepted as models; that the Bible should be received as our highest standard of morals. Reason and philosophy revolt at such teachings, and only those who are wedded to an ism would ever subscribe to such absurdities.

At the conclusion of the lecture several questions were sent up which he answered. Prof. Chaney lectures again to-morrow (Sunday) evening at half past seven on "The Phenomena of Spirit Life."

THE SPIRITUALISTS' UNION.

The lectures of Mrs. Fannie Allyn are generally of a practical character, but on Sunday last, in answer to questions, the Control took a new tack and spoke mainly on the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism. The natural qualifications for mediumship were alluded to; the power may be developed, but there must first exist in the organization of the individual a germ for development. The philosophy of materialization was explained, and the prediction made that within the next twenty-five years the truths of Spiritualism will be firmly and scientifically established.

In answer to a question concerning Hammond, she said Hammond of himself, is a small gun, but that he draws force from the battery of ministers on the platform with him. If he worked alone he'd soon be out of ammunition, and wouldn't win a battle. The answers to questions were, as usual, apt and to the point. The speaker has in great measure recovered her voice, and speaks with her old-time force and eloquence. To-morrow is the last day of her present engagement. Next Sunday the platform is to be occupied by

SOCIETY FOR SELF CULTURE.—Rev. Mr. Simonds opened the discussion last Sunday, in an able and interesting argument. The speeches generally were excellent, and the same subject "The Influence of Christianity on Civilization," was continued. The society under the Presidency of Mr. Battersby, is regaining its popularity.

LETTER FROM SANTA CRUZ.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—There are quite a number of Spiritualists and Infidels in this part of the country, but I do not know of many who take liberal papers. I think we shall build a Hall for meetings etc. this coming summer. I have talked with several on the subject, and they are willing to help towards building a hall where Infidels and Spiritualists can meet—a place that Christians shall have no control over. If we succeed in building it, I will try to have liberal papers taken for the use of the meetings.

We had quite a time last month in hiring a Teacher for our public school. One of our trustees is a Methodist, one of the bigoted kind. Another did not belong to any church, but rather favored them, the other is an Atheist. It was generally thought that the Atheist would have a hard time, but he went to work and suggested that a petition be circulated in favor of Mr. Ingraham, who has taught our school before, and gave good satisfaction, except to some of the very pious ones. The petition was a success. The Atheist presented the petition to the Board of Trustees, when the Methodist began to object, and also to state things not in accordance with the truth. The Atheist stated the case truly, and our liberal Christian brother saw it at once, and took sides with the Atheist, and the result was that the "Infidel" teacher was engaged, and of course the Methodist is disgusted and keeps his children away, fearing that they might be led into infidelity, but at the same time his boy will god damn, and use other language of the same sort used by Christians, but very repugnant to Infidels. Consistent, isn't it?

Last Sunday I spent a very interesting time at a friend's. Mrs. Mathews the wife of a lecturer on Phrenology, etc., was there. She is quite a Spiritualist, and says she expects to have her ideal home in the Spirit World, but I am like Mr. Ingraham, who says, he would not trade his ranch for a mansion in the skies. You know the old saying "one bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

I see by the papers that you are having lively times in San Francisco on religion. Sinners of five and six years old are being converted. The Lord is certainly making bare his arm, and Satan's Kingdom will have a shaking. While reading the account of Hammond's meetings, I was almost led to draw the conclusion that there is not so much liberality in the world after all.

I must tell you of a curious circumstance that took place in Santa Cruz lately. The Rev. Mr. Willey, Congregationalist Minister, some time ago went to the Chinese and wanted them to come to his church and have a Sunday school, when they might give up Josh for Jesus, and said they might rely upon him (Willey) as their friend. The Chinamen did not wish to change their religion, but have set apart a small house of worship in honor of Josh. This house happens to be near where Mr. W. lives. A week or two ago they were having quite a lively time, attending to their religious services. This annoyed the Rev. Mr. W., and he sent word to his landlord (Mr. Hihn, who rents to the Chinamen also,) to turn the Chinamen out or he would leave his house. Mr. Hihn took no notice of this demand,—which shows good sense on the part of Mr. Hihn. Now let us look on the other side: Mr. W's church is surrounded by dwelling houses. He has been having Union meetings and other meetings almost every night, to the annoyance of respectable people, who feel that if the worship of the Chinese is a nuisance that ought to be abated, this also should be served in the same way. The bigots are not all dead yet.

UNIQUE FUNERAL SERVICE.

There are in California a large number of people who are or have been members of the Church of Latter Day Saints. Most of them came here from Utah, after struggling there for a living. They are in the main, honest, sincere people, and some are gifted with more than ordinary intelligence. Of the latter class, the majority have severed their connection with the church. Recently one of these apostates visited Mr. B——, an old Utah friend in Alameda county, whose wife was lying at the point of death, and having been an elder in the Mormon Church, he was urged to conduct the funeral services. He told Mr. B. of his change of views, but he still desired him to officiate. He accordingly did so, and soon after, in a letter to a friend, he gave an account of the services, which, although not written for publication, is worth printing for its novelty. He says :

There was a large company of the friends there, of different religions, some Catholics, Methodists and Congregationalists, but most of them Josephites with their Presiding Elder. As it would be expected that I would read from the Bible, I read the 7th chap. of Job, and the 14th chap. of Job from the 1st to the 14th verse, also the 39th Psalm. In the remarks I made I tried to show the lessons we could learn on the occasion of the death of our friend. 1st, the uncertainty of life ought to impress us with the necessity of doing good to-day, because the present is all we are sure of ; none of us can say that the future will be ours ; we can hope so, and try to have faith in a future life, but still we are only sure of the present moment, and when we are sufficiently awake to this truth we will try to do all the good we can now, instead of in the supposed good time coming. 2d, a love for all, not only for our relatives, but for all who come within the circle of our acquaintance. 3d, that true liberality does not confine its efforts in doing good to one particular sect, but it tries to live up to the immortal saying of a much abused man: "The world is my country, and to do good my religion." In my closing remarks I referred to our friend's journey through life, and the good example she has left, which will be a source of comfort to her husband and children, as well as to all her friends.

You will get an idea from this of the nature of my remarks. I concluded by reading David's prayer, 86th Psalm, and repeating the prayer, Our Father, etc. We went to the grave, and after the body was lowered, I stepped to the end of the grave and with uplifted hand, said something as follows : "And now we commit the body of this our sister to the grave, there to mingle earth to earth, and dust to dust, feeling sure that while living she did her duty faithfully, and may that spirit of charity, so beautifully illustrated in her life, be with all of us forever. Amen."

Thus ended one of the most peculiar scenes I have ever been called to pass through. Had it been an Infidel friend I should not have felt embarrassed ; but I got through better than I expected, and had I belonged to the church I should have said the Holy Spirit helped me. The remarks I made appeared to have an effect for good, but I do not doubt it was one of the most peculiar funeral discourses they ever heard, the name of God not being mentioned, in fact not at all in the service, only in the Scripture read.

The best preachers of morality are education, mental culture, scientific enlightenment, and spread of knowledge.

JOHN COLLIER.

This gentleman, one of the best of the Spiritual lecturers of England, has now been nearly a year in America lecturing before Spiritual societies in New York, Boston, Salem, Springfield, Baltimore and other places. He might find it advantageous to visit California, notwithstanding we have just now a large number of home speakers here. It is understood that he will make an extended western tour during the summer, and if encouraged, will come on to this coast. The officers of our various societies may do well to address him on the subject, care of Banner of Light, Boston. Wherever he has been he is spoken of in high terms. The London Medium says of him :

"Mr. John Collier is an able and eloquent speaker, and a young, earnest, and valuable worker in the cause of Spiritualism. He is also an accomplished elocutionist."

Mr. J. Burns, President of the London Spiritual Institute says "Mr. Collier possesses rare qualifications for platform work. He has a fine voice, a good presence, an extensive range of information and a high degree of mental culture. He is also gifted with a valuable order of inspiration."

The papers in this country commend him highly, and Hon. J. M. Peebles, who is well known to California audiences, says he has listened to Mr. Collier several times, with interest and profit. He adds :

"His matter is solid, his teachings hightoned, and his voice excellent. I am sure he will be found a most able exponent of the spiritual philosophy. Such speakers, inspired as they are to do a glorious work for humanity, should not only be kept continually in the field, but should be encouraged in every possible way, thus hastening the freedom and moral redemption of our common humanity. I take great pleasure in recommending Mr. John Collier, as a faithful and eloquent advocate of Spiritualism."

It seems to be the desire of the people to have a frequent change of speakers, and we do not doubt Mr. Collier will receive a warm welcome, if he concludes to come to California. If he could spend next winter here, he would find an agreeable climate, a generous people and a fruitful field for his work.

HAMMOND AND HANGING.

ED. COMMON SENSE :—When Hammond, the Revivalist, was in Sacramento, he said that the unfortunate man, Cruse, who was murdered here a few months ago, has gone to hell, because he was not converted, and that the two men who murdered him, and were hanged for it, went to heaven, because they repented and turned to Jesus. If this is true it must be safer to do than to suffer evil ; better to be the injurer than the injured. How does this agree with Christ's doctrine of non-resistance—when smitten on one cheek, turn the other also ? Are the good to be always the sufferers, and to go to hell at last ? What a confused mess these Christians make of their religion. But, passing all this by, is it not time that this barbarous custom, hanging people, should be done away with? SACRAMENTO.

REINCARNATION.

The London Spiritualist of Sept. 18th, contains a letter from Emile, Prince of Wittgenstein, which gives a most remarkable statement in favor of the somewhat repugnant doctrine of Reincarnation. He says that in 1869 he had a number of sittings with Madame C., a French medium, during one of which he asked if it was not possible to evoke the spirit of a living person during sleep, and the reply was yes; by possessing something the person handles frequently, or any article which the spirit of the person may have used during a previous incarnation. The narrative proceeds :

Soon after there fell from the ceiling, on the table where Mdme. C.—was writing under spiritual control, a small oval bronze medal, quite tarnished, with some dry yellow earth sticking to it, bearing on one side the likeness of Christ, on the other one that of the Virgin Mary, and seeming, by its style, to belong to the 16th century. We were then told, that this medal had been buried a long time ago, with a person who had constantly worn it, and who had died a violent death—that this person was now reincarnated in Germany—that an object which had belonged to her formerly was necessary to establish between her and us, a connection, which might enable her to come and appeal to us for assistance against a sort of painful obsession under which she was laboring.

The spirit was willing to come, and in answer to questions it gave a history of its former life. The person had been a nun, in France, in the reign of Louis XIV, and was killed by a blow on the head. She adds :

I then roamed about the chapel, always thinking myself alive still. I only understood that I was dead when those who were burying me said a prayer before covering my body with earth. A great trouble overcame me then, and I felt it a hard task to pardon them. I have great difficulty in obeying your call, because as soon as I am asleep, I am usually forced to return to Dreux, and to haunt the church under my former aspect, as I used to do before my present incarnation. It is a terrible subjection, a constant hindrance to my progress, as it paralyzes all my efforts to come into contact with the good spirits who guide and comfort those who are in the flesh and asleep. Emile! You must help me to free myself.

The spirit described the location of the old monastery in Paris, and a search afterward revealed a wall which was said to be the foundation of an old monastery, but it had been covered with modern buildings. The name of the Countess Amelie, a cousin of Prince Wittgenstein, was given as the one in whose body the spirit now lives. The Prince continues :

Q.—How am I to ascertain your identity, and make sure that you are not a frivolous spirit, mocking us?

A.—When you meet me, before long, ask whether I have any dreams in which it seems to me as if I were killed? I shall say no, and add, that I dream sometimes of a priest murdered by ruffians : You may also show me the medal : I shall feel then as if I had known it before.

With this communication we closed our evocations of Amelie, which had taken us several evenings.

A few months later I met my cousin at my sister's country seat. Amelie, as was her wont, began joking with me about my faith in Spiritualism, declaring that it was all delusion and deception. I bore her merry attacks merrily, defending, however, my theories about dreams, reminiscences, spirit messages, and so on, till, I came to ask, as in a joke, whether she, for example, never dreamt that she was being murdered? She answered "No," adding, after a slight pause, that, in fact, she had sometimes a disagreeable dream, always the same—a sort of nightmare—which made her nervous and uncomfortable for the whole day after. On my insisting upon receiving the particulars, she said at last, that she dreamt of a Catholic priest in sacerdotal dress, flying from a burning church, with armed men at his heels, who wanted to kill him. After changing the conversation, I took the medal out of my pocket and showed it to her, feigning to have bought it at an antiquary's. She began to examine it so long and so closely that I, at last, asked her, "What is the matter?" whereupon she answered that "she could not understand how that object seemed as familiar as if she had possessed or seen it formerly, although she could not, for the world, recollect under what circumstances?"

I now told her about our evocations; and she, being very much struck by my narrative, requested to be shown the medial writing. This writing, I had thought, was not like her own. I had known hers only by her letters, in German, written with pen and ink, while the former, traced by a French medium, was in French. When she saw it she exclaimed that it was positively her writing, when she used a pencil instead of a pen; and forthwith she wrote some words which I dictated, and proved to be exactly like the original.

She got into a great fright at the thought of her soul haunting an old church, and I advised her, in order to paralyse the attraction, to pray every evening for help to her guardian angel, and to say three times aloud, before going to bed, "I will not go!"

Since she has done this, I was informed by my leading spirits that she has entirely succeeded in ridding herself of the aforesaid subjection.

BUSINESS WOMEN.

The following is a portion of a letter from Robert S. Nickerson, of Trenton, New Jersey, commending the action of the Common Sense Company in giving women the preference as employees. Although personally a stranger, he is so much pleased with the idea that he sends for stock in the Company, and says :

Success to the efforts of woman! God speed her in the attainment of industrial and pecuniary independence of the lawmaking man-power as the most effective means of securing her social independence. Let woman take the lead with a resolute will, and man—the best of men—will not hesitate to follow her. Man could only build the framework of a social structure. It remains for woman to round it out with life and beauty. The time for talking seems nearly to have closed. The time for action seems nigh unto our doors. Let the few words that yet remain to be spoken, be sharp and to the point. Men will go out to battle and murder one another, to settle their differences of opinion. Upon the women will fall the task of providing for themselves and children, with the aid of those who are not called to battle. In time of peace prepare for war, will apply to America's daughters now. Let them organize for business—industrially, socially. "In union is strength;" harmony the key-note. Fraternally, R. S.

We can pass over many inconsistencies in an earnest, sincere man, when we feel that behind them all, the spirit of love is struggling to better the condition of all God's creatures.—Kingdom of Heaven.

CALIFORNIA POETRY.

Young as California is the State has produced several poets who have acquired a national reputation, and one or two whose fame has extended to the Old World. That these were nurtured, though not born here, proves the natural fitness of the clime for developing poesy, as it turned to thinkers—not mere dreamers—those who came with sordid views. There has scarce been time, as yet, for the culture of native talent; the children are not born who are to sing our sweetest songs. Only one has yet given us a taste of what is to come, and he is a crude specimen, perhaps a diamond in the rough. Edward Isaac Dobson, a youth not yet twenty, has published a little volume from which we have heretofore given several extracts, some of them without credit, as an experiment, and have been gratified to see eastern papers copy them as if written by an author of acknowledged ability. This little descriptive sketch has gone the rounds:

The dear old house! I see it still,
The willows drooping at the door,
All withered now, and grey and hoar—
The brook that babbled by the mill—

The woods where I was wont to play,
Or sit and hear, from out the breeze,
The low, sad moanings of the trees,
As if a friend had passed away—

Or watch the moonbeams on the lake,
And from the shore the wavelets chase,
Around about, from place to place,
Until some mountain wave did break

Upon, and hide them from the sight,
Or wash them back upon the land,
Where negligently old, and grand
In solemnness, and bleak and white,

Decayed, tall trees arise and reach
Toward the skies, and sullen stare,
Across the mount, snow-capt and bare
For miles along the pebbled beach!

Our young poet declares himself an atheist by nature, forming his opinions intuitively, without reading any atheistic writers. He says: "I have regarded Nature as the one creative power of the universe, and have disbelieved the doctrine of the immortality of the soul ever since I can remember."

Like most young writers he is painfully self conscious. He is the centre of the universe, not a mere point, but an individualized centre, around which all things revolve. He is ambitious as well as egotistical, and sings of himself as follows:

I sing of one, as yet unknown to Fame,
Who hopes, ere he has run his dreary race,
To write on Glory's sacred scroll a name
That will assume in ages hence a place,
Such as the bards of yore so proudly claim,
Which full ten thousand years will not efface,
In grandeur, looming out the mists of Time,
Towering, o'er dim centuries, sublime!

A youth, yet not like others of his age,
Upwards, from his boyhood, he stood alone;
Possessing all-enduring strength to wage
A war with all the world, he did not groan
When Envy's hosts—combined to make him rage—
All-breathless watched, and hoped to hear him moan
Beneath the disappointments piled around—
His heart was pierced, he uttered not a sound!

Knowing the World, he hated it, with all
Its ostentatious virtue, hiding sin,
Degraded soulless worms content to crawl,
That false society might let them in
To share the pleasures of her banquet hall,
Amidst alluring vice, a name to win,
Each smirking hypocrite to kindly greet,
And 'neath his smile see lurking his deceit!

Some of his friends have evidently taken it upon themselves to advise him to turn his attention to other pursuits, and he says:

Now is the age when Malice reigns as King,
When men are warned to check desire for Fame,
When bards are kindly cautioned not to sing,
To quell a useless longing for a name,
Which only years of toil and labor bring;
That on posterity they have no claim;
Yet still there be possessing strength and will,
Who dare to climb by aid of pen or quill!

And I myself am one of them—I'll write
Whate'er best pleases me, let read who may.

This has the merit of independence, at least; and is plain and outspoken, as is every thing else he writes. He says:

I am no hypocrite—no infidel;
I think old Nature is the fountain head
Of all the Universe, the God as well,
That when the body dies the soul is dead;
That man's remorseful thoughts are his one Hell;
For dreamless, endless sleep I have no dread,
That far along the verge of Time I see
New Worlds arise, when this has ceased to be!

We have no space for lengthy extracts. The following stanzas are among the best:

Whoever hopes to climb above
The envy, hate, and grief of Earth,
For honor and for better worth,
Must learn the Sacredness of Love!

'Tis this incentive makes men great,
That leads them on from height to height,
That guides young Genius in his flight,
And shapes the destinies of State!

A Love revered inspires an aim
For higher things within the soul,
And beckons us on toward a goal,
To tread the secret walks of Fame!

The Newspapers generally have given Mr. Dobson a cool reception; but whoever will take the trouble to read this little book will find among his crudities and extravagances much that gives promise of a brilliant future. For sale at Bancrofts.

"Nothing has got so far
But man hath caught and kept as his prey.
His eyes dismount the highest star:
He is in little all the sphere.
Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they
Find their acquaintance there.
Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one limb to another,
And all to all the world besides:
Each part may call the farthest, brother.
For head with foot hath private amity,
And both with moons and tides."

Ed. COMMON SENSE.—The Seances, at Charter Oak Hall every Tuesday evening during the past three months we trust have been beneficial. The Yests given by various mediums have caused tears of gratitude to flow. The Skeptic and Believer have seemed alike interested, and it is with a degree of satisfaction that we look over the past and bring to mind the unselfish mediums who have yielded themselves so passively to spiritual control to further the cause of truth, and by the politeness and kindness of the Proprietor of the Hall to make everything pleasant and agreeable, perfect order and harmony have been preserved on each occasion, and really the good spirits in and out of the farm seemed delighted to come, and commune one with the other. We have however concluded to discontinue the circles in San Francisco and to hold them in Liberty Hall near Market street Depot Oakland, every Thursday evening at 7 o'clock. Those desirous of becoming mediums especially invited and yet a small fee of 25 cents will be taken at the door to defray incidental expenses.

Thine for Truth and Progress.

In explanation of the fact that some members of the Tennessee Legislature voted for Johnson who were not friendly to him, it is now made known that in the city of Memphis it was agreed to submit the question of Senatorship to the vote of the people at the general election. A separate ballot box was placed at each election precinct, and in it were placed the votes for United States Senators, Johnson receiving three to one of the entire vote. The members of the Legislature were thus pledged to Johnson, and in obedience to the popular demand they voted for him, although some of them were opposed to him.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF ASTROLOGY.—NO. 5.

ARTIFICIAL DIVINATION.

Having briefly illustrated the operation of that subtle sympathy which exists between the individual and the universal, upon which all natural and artificial divination depends, if those whose patience have enabled them to follow me thus far apprehend the ideas intended to be conveyed, we will be enabled the more intelligently to discuss artificial divination. Whether by Urim and Thummim, Numb. xxvii, 21: 1 Sam. xxvii, 6; by the ephod Ex. xxxix, 2; Judges xvii, 5; 1 Sam. xxiii, 9, 10 11; by lot, Prov. xvi, 33; Acts i, 26, or by whatever artificial means the will of God was, according to Scripture, obtained, the same principle was exhibited which gave support and authority to the Pagan priesthood in their well known rites and sacrificial soothsaying: which underlies fortune-telling by cards and tea grounds and which is fundamentally true of horary astrology.

Horary Astrology is a system of divination in which the stars are used as the symbols. When a question is propounded the exact time of day is taken, from which is drawn a geocentric scheme of the heavens, divided into twelve equal parts, six above and six under the earth. These twelve divisions are termed houses, to each of which is given a particular signification, briefly and respectively as follows:

"First shows life, the second wealth doth give;
The third how brethren—fourth how parents—live;
Issue the fifth: the sixth diseases bring;
The seventh wedlock; and the eighth deaths sting;
The ninth, religion: the tenth honor shows;
The eleventh, friendship, and the twelfth our woes."

The ascendant, or first house, is the first thirty degrees below the eastern horizon, the second the next thirty, and so on till the circle is completed. On the cusps or division lines of the houses are placed the transiting degrees of the signs of the Zodiac; To each of the signs is given a character, which marks the individual at birth when on the ascendant, and describes the significator of an astrological house. For example, those under Aries are said to have "a spare, dry, strong body, piercing eye, long face, black eye brows, long neck, thick shoulders, sallow complexion, sandy or red hair, and the disposition is violent and intemperate."

Cancer	" "	The Moon
Leo	" "	The Sun

Uranus is eccentric and revolutionary; Saturn, the greater malefic, is contemplative and reserved; Jupiter the greater fortune, is just, temperate and virtuous; Mars, the lesser malefic, is iconoclastic and impetuous; the Sun, the greater luminary, is authoritative and proud; Venus, the lesser fortune, is amorous and graceful; Mercury is neutral, studious and ingenious; The Moon, the lesser luminary, is sensual and mutable.

The planets are placed in the scheme of the heavens in their respective signs according to the right ascension of each at the time the question is asked; then the Moon's ascending and descending nodes, and lastly the Part of Fortune, which is always the same distance from the Ascendant that the Moon is from the Sun. The next step is to discover whether there are any aspects between the planets, or between the planets and the houses signified by the questions.

The aspects are aliquot parts of 360 degrees of a circle.

The opposition	180	degrees is very evil.
The trine	120	" " very good.
The square	90	" " evil.
The sextile	60	" " good.
The semi-sextile	30	" " moderately good.
The Conjunction	0	" " good with good, and evil with evil.

There are other aspects of no particular consequence.

Every thing is now completed, and the Astrologer is prepared to question the stars in regard to the solution of human perplexities.

If the heavens are favorable, and a radical figure be obtained, that is, a figure in agreement with the party proposing the question, a solution is certain; for, it is said, "No person moves a question at any time, with earnest desire of satisfaction, but the ascendant of the figure will be either the same, or of the same triplicity with the sign ascending at birth." For example at 7.40 A. M. on the 20th of October 1863, the following question was propounded: Shall Abraham Lincoln be re-elected to the Presidential chair? Scorpio ascended, the significator of Lincoln. The tenth house on mid heaven represented the place of honor, in which was placed Leo. Mars, the lord of the ascendant, and the Sun, the ruler of the tenth, were in conjunction, giving an affirmative reply to the question. But they were situated in the twelfth house, the most malefic of the twelve—the house of assassination; while Mercury, the lord of death or eighth house, was translating the rays of the Malefic Saturn, the ruler of the grave or fourth house, to Mars ruler of the ascendant: while Uranus in the house of death beheld the Sun and Mars in a trine aspect. A more unequivocal reply could not have been given, nor one more exactly fulfilled. But those who have faith enough, and patience and sincerity enough to practice this mystic art, find in their daily experience questions answered in as remarkable a manner as the above. That such should be the case seems beyond the bounds of probability and limits of rational philosophy. However, how are the facts to be disposed of? Wilson says: "All instinct is sympathy; and the same common affinity between various parts of matter which induces rats to forsake a falling house, ants to quit their nests carrying their young with them, before an inundation, and dogs to forestel disaster, will enable a human being to propose a horary question at the instant of time when the heavens are favorably disposed to give a solution." Like Spiritualism, much depends on "conditions," the chief being sincerity between the querent and the quesited, as Wilson further adds. "Much depends on the Artist, for, in this science the most extensive practice must be united with sound judgment, quick penetration, and a strong memory; he must be a person of cool habits, no ambition, unlimited patience, and one who will rigidly adhere to the truth: few possess these qualities." Too often has Astrology fallen into the hands of men

"Who note the Astrologic signs of heaven,
When e'er the goats or scorpions of great Jove,
Or other monstrous names of brutal form,
Rise in the Zodiac; but do not regard
The sensible facts of earth, on which they tread,
While gazing on starry prodigies."

"Of little service are the Mordian prophet,
The Harsupl of the village, the Astrologer
Of the thronged circus, or the priest of Isis,
Or the imposturous interpreter
Of dreams. All these are but false Conjurors,
Who have no skill to read futurity;
They are but hypocrites, urged on by hunger;
Ignorant of themselves, they would teach others,
To whom they promise boundless wealth, and beg
A penny in return, paid in advance."

VOX STELLARUM.

There are those who, unable to refute their opponents by arguments of reason, think to damage them in public opinion by casting suspicion on their moral character. Science has no concern with morals, and all free inquiry would be at an end if it were made dependent on them. The person of the investigator and his moral convictions have nothing to do with his investigations, and such tactics merely prove the immorality of those who use them.—Buchner.

AN EXCELLENT SPIRIT TEST.

Ed's COMMON SENSE:—No matter how well assured any of us may be of the eternal existence of human life, coming up through the deeps of the past to the present, reaching out into the infinite future, every additional test of the identity of the dwellers on the "other side" is siezed upon with the avidity of a thirsty, famished traveler over burning plains for a cup of cooling water. The test I am about to give has to me a value above rubies, though previously I had no shadow of doubt of the life, and possible return of our so called dead.

Six years ago, in my own parlor in this city, at a family seance, my wife was suddenly siezed with a violent pain in the back of the neck, and while she was yet suffering the most excruciating agony, it was written by the hand of a gentleman present, sometimes so controlled.

"I am John Brewster, I was killed by the falling of the building, corner Montgomery and Sumner street, a large timber falling upon me breaking my neck."

My wife had known this individual, years before, in an Eastern City, but had not met him here, nor did she know of the manner of his death, or even that he was dead. Subsequent inquiries informed us of both. This, at the time, we deemed a good test of spirit identity, and do yet, so far as it had gone. There is more of it; a second part which greatly appreciates its value.

Being, a few evenings since, in the company of a number of persons, a lady present, from the State of Nevada, spoke manifestations through a medium in Virginia City, by a spirit calling him or itself John. He would give no other name. She then questioned him, and finally he said his full name was John Brewster; that he had lived in San Francisco, and lost his life at the time, and identically in the manner told at our circle, six years before. At the moment, though remembering the circumstance of the manner of killing, it did not occur to me that the name of the victim was the same.

To my mind the above is conclusive of one of two things—either that the manifesting power, in both instances, was at the hands of John Brewster, a disembodied man, or it was a co-incidence more wonderful and marvelous than the first assumption.

MEDICAL PRIESTHOOD.

We clip from a friendly letter addressed to the editors of COMMON SENSE the following:

"When I read in COMMON SENSE of Feb. 20 the article entitled 'The Medical Priesthood,' by E. Stevenson, M. D., I felt inclined to reply to it, but have not had time to do so.

I will say here, however, that the similia similibus curantur M. D. (medical darkness), needs considerable M. L. (medical light) from some 'extra-mundane medical' adviser. I think one course under 'Medical Popes' would benefit him, even if a Galen held a professorship there. No matter what Dr. Galen knew 1900 years ago—no matter what style of vehicle Dr. S's great-grandfather rode to church in, the man lives, progresses, becomes wiser and is still at his favorite work. So also Galen is at his work. His prescriptions of to-day are not "a mere reflection backwards of the medical chaos of the past," A. J. Davis and E. Stevenson, M. D., to the contrary notwithstanding. Let the Dr. ride his hobby-horse;—his prescription will not kill much oftener than the one he kicks at in the Banner of Light; but when he writes for the COMMON SENSE, let him write common sense and not contradict himself more than twice in one article. Yours truly, H. B. WILLOOX."

Boston, Mass., Mch. 12, '75.

The writer incloses a spirit picture, and adds:

"A few mornings since Mr. Morrison and myself called on Mr. Mumler. He said, now I want Mrs. M. to sit for a spirit picture. The inclosed is a copy of the result of that sitting. The spirit is Dr. Galen; He is one of the leaders of her 'Medical Band.' She sees him and talks with him as readily as we do with one-another. He was there and came on the picture by her request."

INSPIRATION.

The following is a portion of a letter addressed to our friend J. W. Mackie:

Bishop Creek, Inyo Co. Feb. 9th.

FRIEND MACKIE: * * * Jennie Leys ought to be able to tell how she is inspired, or in what way the invisibles inform her of what to say in her lectures. To me, the authority of, "we the spirits say," or the, "thus saith the Lord" of ancient mediums, has no greater weight, nor as much, as thus saith the Truth in my own soul. For no spirit in or out of the form can know of what is truth only by the knowledge gained by experience and experiment.

No one can know by seeing and hearing an inspirational discourse, or can tell or judge of its truth, only by his reason and proof of what he has found to be true. Our spirit friends may be able to assist the intellect in its efforts to elucidate truths, but their ipse dixit is as liable to be in error as that of any other minds.

History shows that there has ever been magnetical waves of thought which have moved upon the stagnant sea of Thought and finally culminated into outward expression of words and deeds in a few of the most unfolded minds. Such have been the prophets warriors, reformers, poets, painters and inventors of all ages of the world. Any idea, conceived by the few or many, eventually becomes personified, and woe or glory awaits the ~~ill or good fate that~~ attends upon their mission.

Jesus of Nazareth was forced to supplement the Jewish idea of a Messiah, and his life was made to conform to the idea of Sacrifice or offering for sin. Every prominent person of historical fame, has been made to fit the shrine already prepared by the leading ideas of their generation and nationalities. Such were Moses, Saul, and many others of the inspired minds of the Jewish dispensation, while Peter the hermit, Columbus, Joan of Arc and Ann Lee were the volcanoes, so to speak, or the outflow of more modern intensified thoughts.

Feb. 21st. Since writing the above, I have been suffering from pain in my head. I had not written as much as I intended to have said on the subject, but may renew the subject at some future time.

I hope COMMON SENSE will not fail for want of support; we ought to have one exponent of free Thought on this Coast. Yours Fraternally, L. HUTCHISON.

J. J. Morse, an English Inspirational speaker, has answered Mrs. Hutchison's questions very satisfactorily. We will next week give his explanation.

Recently we have sent bills to delinquent subscribers, which, although small, (none exceeding $3.00) amount in the aggregate to enough, if paid, to satisfy our creditors, and place the paper on a good financial footing. There are quite a large number of subscribers who have never paid a dollar. Two or three hundred of these were cut off from our list on the first of January, but a number who promised to remit their bills are still retained, and we hope they will have the justice to pay what they owe without further delay.

For Common Sense.

WHO CAN TELL?

Will some one answer my question? Let us say that Marion Wilmot, for instance, happens to possess a mind of more than ordinary strength and originality. She has children to claim her attention, and a husband dependent upon her for comfort and sympathy: he has found the world ignorant of his worth, unmindful of his genius and nobility; he has no society but hers. Add to this the work of her household; for being poor she cannot hire the help she needs. And yet every hour of the day, as she goes about in the performance of her duties, she feels within her the stirring of genius. Ideas that seem to her rare and beautiful, beyond those she finds in her ordinary reading, flock to her brain and clamor for utterance. She sometimes steals an hour from the night, and writes them down. If she could convert these productions into money, that would appear a sufficient excuse for writing. And, indeed, when from necessity she prostitutes her soul to write some trashy tale, she finds ready sale for it in the monthly magazines; but the money and reputation thus earned bring her no pleasure. When she transcribes her inmost heart in thoughts that breathe and words that burn, making her productions the reflex of all that is sacred and pure within her, such articles are refused indignantly, insultingly, and only find acceptance from those journals of advanced thought which we all know are struggling for mere life, and cannot afford to pay.

If selfish ambition could influence her, she has sufficient encouragement from the popular press to pursue her literary labors; but she does not crave the privilege of being known—of having her name spoken by that class toward whom she is quite indifferent. It seems to her that such a pursuit is unworthy the energy of an immortal being. But in her life, as in most lives not devoted to the especial coddling of one's own soul, there come wonderful moments, when her aspirations rise high above the world; when all the world values is as dirt beneath her feet, and she longs to give her life to the good of mankind, fully believing at such times that it is her destiny to be the agent in the accomplishment of great things. But when the flush and exultation of this feeling have passed, she goes to work in cold blood with the precision of a surgical operator, and dissects it. "No, she says, it is nothing but the momentary assertion of the soul. The curtain was lifted, and I caught a glimpse of the splendid possibilities that await the immortal: only this, backed by that big mother love that prompts every true woman to share her happiness with all other needy hearts. It was no command to me, and I will not take it as such." Then comes the assurance that every day, as she goes about in the performance of her homely duties, although she does nothing for the elevation of others, yet she herself is steadily climbing the ladder that leads from a dark world to an illuminated heaven; and for a time she is contented with the selfish thought: "All is well with me and mine." Being also braced by the belief that in the gradual evolution of things those minds now behind her in intelligence will gradually grow upward, as her own mind is growing upward; and that in the lapse of years, when she has flown to other heights, they, in their relative position though no nearer her perhaps, will be coming on, fed by all the experiences of their lives, as she is fed by the experiences of hers. "Therefore," she says, "when I am so burdened by present duties, why need my conscience goad me into the necessity of trying to enlighten those behind me in intelligence? Suppose it is in my power to quicken their ideas, to hurry their advancement; is this necessary? It is a mere question of a little more time; and time is of small value when marked by the immense epochs of the limitless ages that stretch out before the immortal soul." Then she resolves to write no more; and resting in this resolution, some day she receives a letter from a stranger saying—"Your last article lifted my clouds and made me happy for weeks." And then she considers those brave spirits who have stemmed the tide of popular opinion and lived on husks that such hungry souls may be fed: And she remembers with gratitude the wonderful words that fell from unknown lips into her own heart, dispelling the theological mists of gathered years, and filling her with truth, love, and joy. And again she steals a few moments from her over-burdened life to dash off another article, and so, between hope and doubt, her existence wears away, the only real thing being the ever present necessity of work. In this conflict of opinions there is one aphorism that haunts her continually. "THAT ONLY WHICH A MAN DOES SHALL HE HAVE." Can this be true? Or, do "they also serve who only stand and wait?" She would rather believe the latter. "Surely she says, these hopes and dreams and longings are all my own, even though I do not write them down for other eyes to see. Surely these thoughts as they leave my brain must orb about me, as those infinitesimal atoms of fragrance orb about the flowers that gave them birth; and when my body falls away, and my last thought has been added to those gone before, will not this thought live, whether beautiful and grand in its outlines, or meager, pinched and mean, just as my brain may have shaped it, will this not be my immortal soul, my very self, as complete in its oneness as if it were photographed upon a thousand hearts?" In other words, she would gladly shirk the responsibility of her genius, if she could do so without cramping and injuring it. Her's may be a penny rush light, perhaps, but it is her all; and if to hide it under a bushel should really curtail its beams for herself, then this would be a disaster indeed.

Therefore I ask, would Marion Wilmot be justifiable, in spite of the encouragement she has received from the public, in firmly resolving to write no more? Let who can answer: for when it is answered for her it will be answered for many.

HELEN W. BAKER.

SECTARIAN REVIVALS.—For twenty years, the writer was a Methodist minister, engaged in getting up "Revivals." And, for more than fifty years, I have been perfectly familiar with "revival" epidemics. And, I utter what I know, when I declare, that all "revival" phenomena, are human in their inception, and development. In my experimental Lectures on Pathetism, in the principal cities throughout the country, from 1836 to 1850, all the "revival" phenomena were induced, by the faith of my auditors in Pathetism. In Philadelphia, 1847, over three hundred cases of trances were counted in one evening. And, from year to year, among the thousands entranced in my lectures, I have found Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians (Bishop Brownell attended my lectures in Hartford, Conn.), all of whom testified, when in the trance, and out of it, that the experience was precisely the same as had occurred to them from the exercise of faith and prayer, in "revivals."—La Roy Sunderland.

As in true commerce there is no "profit," so in true commerce there is no "sale." The idea of sale is that of an interchange between enemies respectively endeavoring to get the better one of another. But commerce is an exchange between friends, and there is no desire but that it should be just, any more than there would be between members of the same family.—John Ruskin.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILIZATION.

The talking members of the Society for Self Culture still continue, before crowded houses, the discussion of the question, "Does Christianity promote the highest Civilization?" Occasionally a new speaker comes in, with fresh ideas, giving variety to the discussion. One of the best speeches recently made was by A. C. Stowe, from which we extract as follows:

What is Christianity? and what is Civilization? A correct understanding of these must first be had before we can intelligently discuss the question under consideration. I shall give to these terms the popular definition—namely, that Christianity is that system of religion or plan of redemption through a vicarious atonement—the sacrifice of the innocent for the guilty. This plan is formulated thus: Man was created pure, holy and upright, but through disobedience he fell from his high estate and became depraved and desperately wicked, entailing upon his posterity all the sad consequences of his transgression; that God, after several ineffectual attempts to improve him, or to destroy him, either by fire or water, conceived the Christian plan of salvation; entered into the womb of a virgin, was illegitimately the cross that the world might be saved. That man, in consequence of his fall, made it impossible to save himself or to do a single good act that will stand to his credit in the great day of reckoning. All the goodness, virtue and morality he may possess or practice counts him nothing except he have faith in the atoning blood of Jesus Christ.

Christianity is Supernaturalism. It is not indigenous to the human soil; it is a celestial, rather than a terrestrial plant. The natural man cannot discern spiritual things. So all there is of Christianity, which properly belongs to it, is that which he human reason rejects—a sort of ethereal, supernatural something beyond the ken of human understanding,—the mystery of Godliness which appeals only to the marvelousness and superstition of the ignorant and weak-minded. You will be told that this is not Christianity, that the beautiful teachings of Jesus constitute Christianity; but Mr. Pres. I think I can show you that I am correct in my interpretation, and that the beautiful moral precepts of Jesus are no part of Christianity. It is claimed that Jesus Christ is the author of Christianity, that he brought this great plan of redemption to light. If this is true, his moral precepts cannot be a part of it, for they were not original with him. They had all been given to the world long before his advent. They are as old as the human soul, and as universal as its needs. They are the natural outgrowth of humanity, and Christianity has accepted them only as a necessity in its intercourse with the non-Christian world, who practice these precepts from their innate love of goodness and justice, and Christianity is obliged to conform to this system of natural religion, not because of any saving virtue, for virtue is a currency that will not pass at the Bank of the Christian Heaven. Indeed these grand precepts are largely practiced by a class whom the Christians persecute and imprison here, and eternally damn hereafter. Jesus himself belonged to this class. He was a Communist, an Internationalist, a Red Republican, a Free Lover, an Infidel, a Spiritualist and a Greasy Mechanic. For such Christianity has no place in this world, but it promises them a warm reception in the next.

Here followed an argument to prove that Christianity has not a refining influence on man, and that it does not tend to his culture intellectually or morally. The concluding portion of this part was as follows:

Of all the civilized countries, those the most exclusively Christian, where non-Christians are persecuted and Infidels are punished as criminals, stand the lowest in Civilization, as witness Spain, Italy and the States of South America and Mexico. France, Germany, Great Britain and the United States stand the highest in point of civilization, because of the large non-Christian element, which largely moulds their institutions, and influences their legislation; and that nation stands the highest whose institutions and legislation is least influenced by Christianity, where the Infidel element is sufficiently large and powerful to secure to the people that religious liberty and toleration by which alone Christianity and all other religions are permitted to flourish.

Mr. Stowe then briefly stated that Christianity is not based on scientific principles; that it has fought science and the arts until forced by the progress of the age to accept in part their demonstrations. He then proceeds:

Civilization is a growth and development by natural agencies. Christianity is promoted by supernatural and miraculous agencies.

Christianity degrades man, inasmuch as it destroys his self-respect and manhood. It teaches that he is bad, depraved and desperately wicked, and that it is utterly impossible for him to improve himself or to arise out of his lost condition, except he believe in doctrines and dogmas which his reason and judgment rejects. No system can elevate or improve man, however much of good and truth it may possess, unless it is possible for man to accept and comprehend it and incorporate it into his life. To improve man philosophically his food must be wholesome, nourishing, and adapted to his needs, so that his palate will accept and his stomach digest and incorporate it into his system. To affirm that food which the stomach is forced to reject will promote the growth and improvement of the physical body, is about as reasonable as to affirm that Christianity, which the reason and judgment is forced to reject, can promote a higher civilization.

Its government is a theocracy, the most despotic of all governments. It teaches that God is the author of all things, that Jesus Christ is the ruler among nations, and the bible is God's revealed will and must be implicitly obeyed as interpreted by his vicegerents the clergy. Its moral ethics are based upon injustice, the punishment of the innocent for the guilty. Christians themselves confess that their religion is inadequate to improve man. If this confession is true they concede the whole question. In their meetings the best of them confess that they are miserable sinners, deserving of hell, and had it not been for the mercy of God, they would have been there long ago, and they pathetically beseech this God to save them, not because they merit it, but for Christ's sake. Even innocent babies are made to confess that they are awful sinners, fit only for hell, and must fly to Jesus for salvation. For proof of this, go to Gen. Hammond's meetings, where he is marshalling his veteran hosts against these babies and sucklings.

Mr. Stowe here proceeded to show the influence of Christianity on the condition of woman, a subject of sufficient importance to deserve a chapter by itself. Being taken from the Bible it must necessarily be distasteful to some of our readers, and we reserve this portion for further consideration. It may be published next week.

COMMON SENSE is furnished to subscribers for Three Dollars per annum, in advance. To save trouble to subscribers in various localities, friends will receive and forward subscriptions, as follows: C. W. Holt, Sacramento; Mrs. G. B. Kirby, Santa Cruz; R. W. Pontius, Seattle; W. J. Sweasy, Eureka; J. M. Orr, Santa Barbara; Dr. E. Stevenson, Virginia City, Nevada; Dr. O. B. Bayne, Ferndale; R. H. Allen, Chico; J. L. Hatch, Santa Clara; Dr. D. W. C. Franklin, Los Angeles; H. S. Pope, San Buenaventura; P. H. Trask, San Diego.

In places where there is no agent, subscribers may remit a small piece in gold coin or currency, or by postal order. Address, Business Manager, COMMON SENSE, Box 2163, San Francisco, Cal.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

The twenty-seventh anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism will be celebrated in San Francisco on Wednesday, the 31st of March, continuing two days, the second day to be devoted to the consideration of subjects not exclusively pertaining to the rise and progress of Spiritualism. Prominent speakers from the East and this coast will be present. The public (Mediums and Liberals especially) are invited to attend. The place of meeting will be advertised in the daily papers.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAR. 27, 1875.

The twenty-seventh anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism is to be appropriately celebrated in this city. A committee has been chosen to make all necessary arrangements, and our friends in the interior who visit the city may depend on having a good time. A number of speakers have been engaged, and Spiritualists and friends of Free Thought will unite in making the celebration one befitting the occasion.

Six numbers more will complete the first volume of this paper, at which time a large number of subscriptions expire. We hope all who do not intend to continue, will notify us at once. We shall also be glad to hear from the friends who desire to assist us in establishing an organ of Free Thought which may be a "power for good" on this coast. Do not wait until the year has expired before renewing your subscriptions. We want to hear from you NOW.

The editor of COMMON SENSE is a practical printer, and it has been necessary for him to devote more than three fourths of his time to the printing department of the paper. But after this week, he will be relieved in a great measure from this work, and will be able to give more time to editorial duties. If the Liberalists of this coast sustain their organ financially they will have a paper to which they can point with pride as a representative of their ideas. We are determined to make improvements just as fast as circumstances will warrant. All we want is cash.

Read the challenge of B. Alston Lavender to W. H. Chaney, on page 542. If Chaney accepts, it will be a case of Greek meeting Greek.

TAXING MEDIUMS.

The Supervisors of the City have under consideration a proposed amendment to the ordinance fixing the votes of city licenses, and among the new provisions is the following:

For astrologers, seers, fortune tellers, clairvoyants, mediums, and spirit artists, fifty dollars per quarter.

The persons designated to be reached by this clause are designated in another clause as follows:

The terms astrologers, seers, fortune tellers, clairvoyants, mediums and spirit artists, shall include all persons who may, by sign or advertisement, or notice of any kind, purport to pursue any of these occupations.

A protest against the passage of this portion of the proposed schedule of licenses has been numerously signed and presented to the Board, the ground of protest being that the exercise of spiritual gifts is the religion of spiritual mediums, and that such employment should be placed on a par with that of the Clergy who are not required to take out a license to practice their profession. The ordinance has passed to print, and will probably be adopted without amendment.

Mrs. FANNIE ALLYN who, owing to the general satisfaction with her lectures, has been retained by the Spiritualists Union several weeks beyond her first engagement, gives her closing discourses to-morrow, after which she goes to San Jose. Last Sunday afternoon she spoke mainly on the connection of the spirit with the body—touching on the question of pre-existence, reincarnation, etc. Her "guide," while not assenting to the doctrine of the reincarnationists, believes in a previous existence in some form, and in immortality. The various questions sent up were briefly replied to, and at the close of the lecture Mrs. Allyn read the petition prepared for presentation to the Board of Supervisors, protesting against the imposition of a heavy licence tax on mediums. Nearly the entire audience remained and signed the remonstrance.

A LIVELY DISCUSSION.—Those who were so fortunate as to attend the discussion on Spiritualism at Charter Oak Hall on Sunday morning last enjoyed a treat. Dr. Joscelyn is an excellent speaker, an able advocate of our cause, while his opponent, B. Alston Lavender, is one of the raciest, liveliest, jolliest talkers that has recently appeared before a San Francisco audience. In manners and language he is overflowing with humor and good sense. The discussion will be continued to-morrow morning, at 11 o'clock, and in the evening Mr. Lavender will deliver a lecture in the same hall.

A writer in the Toledo Sun, a shaker, says, "We opine that Modern Spiritualism will eventually prove as great an incubus to human progress as any or all churchal creeds that have preceded it." Spiritualism has no creed. Its faith is simply whatever may be proved true; and the majority of Spiritualists are seeking to learn the teachings of science, well knowing that from the final decision of this tribunal there can be no appeal.

NEW SPIRIT MANIFESTATION.

E. W. Stevens, writing from Madison, Wisconsin, February 24th, gives an account of a singular spirit manifestation at No. 22 Jennifer street, in that city, at the house of G. W. Kenney. Mr. and Mrs. Kenney are members of the M. E. Church, good, honest people, with forty years experience in life, but they never before had such an experience as this. Nichols Hubbing, a brother-in-law of Mrs. Kenney, died in the house January 24th, leaving no picture of himself. The family often expressed a desire for a picture, and on the 7th of January, of this year, the dim outlines of a likeness of Mr. H. began to be observed on a mirror purchased by the deceased twelve years ago, at the time of his marriage. The picture is now very distinct, and seems to be inwrought with the very substance of the glass. There are three other faces, more or less defined, as if in a group with Hubbing. The latter sits in stooping posture, similar to that he occupied during the six months preceding his death.

Rev. Mr. Dryden some time since confessed to certain mild heresies, which the Methodist Conference refused to condemn him for, and people have wondered why. Perhaps one reason is that on certain points, Mr. Dryden is rabidly orthodox. In his circular addressed to the Bishop, Mr. Dryden says:

"In the divine-human or God-man Jesus, is revealed in personal unity all the triune of Father, Son and Spirit. Outside of him I know nothing of a personal God whatever. To me he is the very and only God. And in him is all the fullness of God that I need or wish to know."

"This," says the Index, "is the baldest and most absolute confession of Christian idolatry that we have ever seen, and is well worth remembering. Yet idolatry of Jesus in some degree characterizes all forms of Christianity, and this astounding confession only holds up the mirror to it."

SHALL WE KNOW EACH OTHER THERE?—This question was answered in the affirmative by Rev. Wm. N. Van De Mark, in his morning discourse, 913 Market street, on Sunday last; and very ably and eloquently did he do it. The audience was quite small, but the speaker did not seem to mind it. He spoke as well as if he had had a full house, as he deserved to have, for it was one of the best discourses we have listened to in many a day. Mr. Van De Mark, in the pulpit, appears an able, earnest and honest man. The charges against him were vague, and not well proved. It is still a matter of doubt whether he has not been very unjustly treated.

THE SELF CULTURISTS.—Elder Snow opened the debate, on Sunday last, in favor of Christianity as a civilizer, followed by Mrs. C. M. Stowe in opposition. The other speakers were Mr. Lundi, Mrs. Smith, Mr. Knight, Dr. Joscelyn, H. Dawson and J. L. Hatch. The speaking was unusually good, excepting the introductory, which was weak and without point. The same subject to-morrow, at 39 Fourth street, 2 p. m.

"BEHIND THE SCENES."

ED. COMMON SENSE:—San Jose furnished Sunday evening one of the most fully attended Free Thought meetings I ever witnessed. It was the occasion of the close of Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith's course of lectures here, and was indeed a fitting close, both as regarded lecture and audience. Spiritualists who lament the influence of our most radical speakers will please suppress all their grief when they cast their eyes over this favored section of Santa Clara valley. San Jose calls for none of these tears.

Mrs. Smith took her followers on this occasion "behind the scenes" in the great moral vineyard, and pointed out a long succession of heart-sickening wrongs, and charged home to the door of the Young Men's Christian Association the terrible responsibility for these accumulating wrongs. The cruel injustice of Society, crowning its female sinners with thorns, its male sinners with roses, was set forth in such strong yet true light, and denounced in such severe yet deserved words, that the listeners could not escape conviction. This could be read upon the upturned, serious faces by your reporter, who found a bit of standing room near the platform; and after the chairman, at the close of the lecture, stated that the collection to be taken up was for the speaker's benefit exclusively, the rapidity with which half dollars rained into the contribution hats, as they were passed round, told me very plainly that the speaker had pierced the pocket and touched the heart of her audience.

A large number crowded around the speaker at the dismissal, shook the hand of friendship and spoke words of congratulation. Among these I observed a young man, an entire stranger to the speaker. His countenance bespoke both admiration and earnestness. His words were a grateful tribute and a God-speed wish to the speaker. I am thus particular in noting these demonstrations that those who are waiting the incoming tide of popularity, may be encouraged, and come forward at once to the support of our most radical speakers.

THE OVERLAND.—The April number of this excellent magazine is out in season, full of good things, and containing more than the usual number of articles relating to the Pacific coast, viz: "Californian Indian Characteristics," by Stephen Powers; "Pioneers of the Pacific," a poem by Joaquin Miller; "Six Months in '49," by Henry Degroot; "Wild Wool," by John Muir; and "How we Did it on Scott's Bar," a characteristic OVERLAND story, by Wm. M. Turner. "Our Village School," a readable sketch by Prentice Mulford, a fine poem by T. A. Harcourt, etc. The editor pays a deserved tribute to D. C. Gilman, whose efforts for the advancement of educational interests in California have not been generally appreciated at half their value. Mr. Fisher also gives a short poem, well written, but bearing the marks of a religious fanatic. It is unworthy the Overland. The article following, by S. P. Scott, entitled "The Mission of Science," is in a much better vein. Instead of representing Science as "a ghastly fiend, gibbering empty words," it acknowledges the world's great indebtedness to it, and speaks of leading scientists as "apostles of progress." The number is a good one. J. H. Carmany, publisher, 409 Washington street.

Senator Johnson's speech against the Administration is attracting much attention.

BOOK NOTICES.

Cultivation of Art.—Charles P. Somberby, 36 Day street, New York, has issued a 48 page pamphlet on the Relations of Art to Puritanism and Money Getting. The author is A. R. Cooper, and the essay was prepared originally for the Louisville Library Association. Some things which were appropriate as a lecture should have been omitted. The introductory remarks are unnecessary. If a book requires an apology, it would be better not to publish. The writer opens with an appeal for the cultivation of art as a means of enjoyment. He contrasts the people of our day with those of ancient Greece, who lived in an atmosphere of art. We live in an atmosphere of business, politics, and what we call religion. They enjoyed life more than we do, because they had more to enjoy. At least, so the author assumes, and in his estimation "it is man's nature to make happiness the chief end of life." It certainly is man's nature to make self-gratification the chief aim of life, but the degree of happiness resulting from such desire depends upon the organization and cultivation of the individual. The author says "France is the Greece of the Nineteenth century." * * The enjoyment of life in France is keener than elsewhere. Gayety and grace are proverbial of the French." Gayety is not enjoyment. It is often quite the reverse—an outward glamour to conceal inward emptiness. The author continues: "In the knowledge and love of fine art, in what is called good taste, and in true enjoyment of life, France is immeasurably ahead of us; is indeed in advance of all contemporary peoples." We think few will agree with Mr. Cooper in this estimation of French character. If happiness consists in frivolity,—in a mere butterfly existence—he is right; but if true enjoyment is attainable only by the cultivation of the nobler and higher qualities of our nature; if it is dependent upon being good and doing good; if it is great in accordance with greater capacity to enjoy, then we think the German, English and American people are in advance of the French, as they are more thoughtful, more genuine, and more religious, in the better sense of that much abused word. The writer refers to the inartistic dwellings, furniture and clothing of the rich, and of fashion in ladies' dress, which he denounces as absurd, and says "there is no good art in all these ridiculous and abortive ways of trying to look nice." Just here it is convenient to forget that "France, the Greece of the nineteenth century," is the place where nearly all these inartistic fashions take their rise.

The best portion of this little work is that part referring to the "Relations of Art to Religious Puritanism." The author says:

It is not religion, properly understood, that is inimical to the growth of art; it is fanaticism, with its insane and morbid fidelity to the letter, which killeth; with its strife and contention; its savage intolerance, and fatal compression of generous human impulses. But true religion is ever a bountiful source of artistic inspiration, and all that the artist asks is to be left free to express his religious or other feelings in such manner and form as best accords with the law of his being. It is not religion, but religion's parody—theology—which arrays itself in opposition to that sincere and manifold expression of human impulse and power to which we give the name of art. The metaphysical and fanciful conceptions of theology are not to be confounded with religion. The essence of religion is freedom, but theology is formal, proscriptive, and arbitrary, and confuses and thwarts, as Arnold says, our perception of what righteousness really is. * * *

Thus, if we are allowed to consider religion as one thing, and theology as quite another and different thing, it will be found that all real artists, in every line, are men of deep religious feelings; that true art is never irreligious, and is often religious in the very highest sense. But it must also be noted that art and theology, like science and theology, are of a radically different lineage and spirit; they are streams which flow in opposite directions, their waters can never commingle. It is with art as it is with science: it can only nobly thrive in an atmosphere of intellectual and social freedom. What it requires is a surrounding public sentiment which craves and demands beauty, or artistic loveliness, in all our works and conduct. In order to be great in art we must be possessed by the desire for it, as we have sometimes seen nations possessed of a desire for holiness or political freedom; it must be a part of the spirit of the age, as the desire for scientific truth and knowledge is now the spirit of this age.

Antiquity of Christianity, by John Alberger, published by Charles P. Somberby, 36 Day St., New York. This little book is a compendium of facts tending to prove that there is no essential difference between Christianity and Paganism. The whole system is the outgrowth of prior beliefs, and much of it is mere superstition. For sale at this office; also by Bancroft & Co., Price 35c.

J. R. Brandon has written a calm, able and argumentative pamphlet in answer to Rev. Mr. Hemphill's discourse on the "Lord's Prayer" in our public schools. After showing clearly that the prayer is sectarian, he says: "Mr. Hemphill, in his cry about Godless schools, evidently represents that class of men who must see the name of God stamped upon everything; who are uneasy because it does not appear in the Constitution of the United States, and are continually agitating to get it there, as the first step towards sectarianizing the Government."

The Cross and the Steeple.—This is the title of a little pamphlet of sixteen pages, by Hudson Tuttle, published by Bateson & Tuttle, Toledo, Ohio. It is a brief statement of certain facts concerning the origin of the cross and other symbols used by Christians. It shows that the cross was derived from paganism; that it was one of the symbols of phallic worship. The following is a brief extract:

The past needed sects and the battle of conflicting creeds; the present has no use for them. They are dead bodies, once pregnant with vitality, now festering in decay. Something else is required. It is positive knowledge, scientific accuracy of thought and demonstration. Blind belief finds its last hold with the ignorant.

There will be conflict and change assuredly. Sixty thousand ministers in the United States will be relieved of the arduous task of 'saving souls' never lost, and allowed to follow more profitable pursuits. The $200,000,000, the yearly cost of maintaining the churches in this country, can be turned to better use. 'The hosts who go through a vale of tears in search of a "fountain filled with blood," will be emancipated, and dare to think, and even seek rational enjoyment in this life.

The conflict of the ages has been the conflict between the received religion and the tendency of civilization. The Saviors of the world, one and all, have suffered martyrdom at the bloody hands of religion.

THE PHILOMATHEANS.

Prof. Chaney discussed the question, What is to be done with the criminal? in his lecture last Sunday night. He said most crimes are made so by law; for instance, in New England adultery is declared a crime, and punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary, but in the State of New York adultery is not a crime. Christians tell us that the Bible is the true guide in all matters pertaining to morals, and that our penal laws are founded upon the ethics of the Bible. The speaker thought the Bible a very unsafe guide; he cited the case of Moses, who committed murder and then fled from Egypt to escape punishment. The God of the Bible, instead of assisting in bringing Moses to justice, appointed him to a responsible office. This incident afforded a good precedent for a "corrupt ring." Making further reference to the Bible, he cited the case of the Israelites prompted by God to "borrow" the jewelry of their neighbors, with the express purpose of stealing. This may afford a good precedent for a thief, but certainly not for men who desire to see all persons honest. The case of David, who made God angry by "numbering the people," was not punished in his own person, but seventy thousand of the innocent Israelites were doomed to death as an atonement for the sins of this man "after God's own heart." Surely, such cases as these, among the most prominent in the Bible, are not calculated to inculcate a high standard of morals. The penal code of the Old Testament is founded in the law of retaliation, "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," and according to the record it was executed in all its bloody fullness, except in many cases where a mere whim on the part of the Lord suspended its operation. If God would suspend it in one case, the embryo criminal naturally hoped that he might in his case, so that the Bible laws, instead of diminishing crime, served rather to increase it, notwithstanding the severe bloody penalties.

The lecturer maintained that the certainly, rather the severity of the punishment is what deters the criminal, and therefore he looks upon the Bible as very poor authority. But he is opposed to the law of retaliation. Mankind have been trying it for thousands of years, but crime still exists in all its horrors and abundance. Would it not be better to try milder measures, and see if love will not accomplish more to prevent crime than revenge? The speaker said he had not exhausted the subject, and would refer to it again. There will be another lecture by Prof. Chaney to-morrow evening.

Mrs. Bell Chamberlain is expected to lecture in a week or so.

THE MISSION OF SPIRITUALISM.—For twenty-five years, I have never doubted the supermundane origin of the Mystic Rap. And, if it be, really, what it is estimated for by Spiritualists, I do not see why it should not have annihilated Christianity before this time. "Certainly" this must be its "mission," if it have any mission. And, yet, cases are constantly occurring, like that of Robert D. Owen, who has published one or more large volumes, to show, that, the true intent of Spiritualism is the support of Christianity, which I know to be the greatest fraud ever perpetrated by dogmatism upon the credulity of the human mind.—La Roy Sunderland.

CONFERENCES.

A friend in Wisconsin, who has read in COMMON SENSE accounts of our Lyceum for Self Culture and other Free Thought meetings, where opponents of Spiritualism have as much freedom of expression as those of our own faith, suggests that little is gained for the cause by such discussions. Perhaps not, but such meetings have been found profitable here. They are not generally called Spiritual, and all debating societies started by Spiritualists alone have failed. The experiment has been repeatedly tried here. The people demand meetings for free inquiry, and will not sustain any other. At least such is the case in San Francisco. Our friend closes his letter as follows:

Has not the time come for making a change in the Spiritual organization, that will be an improvement? Heretofore Spiritual Conferences have been largely on the combative plane—not so much combative between the regular Spiritualists, as between the Spiritualists, and the non-Spiritualists, or those outside of the harmonial philosophy. In the infancy of this new light, and while it was struggling for an existence, this was evidently the best course. Now, it has become a permanent institution, and as such commands the respect of the world. Let us then confine the speaking in our Conferences to members, and members only, and let the corner stone of membership be a belief in the fact that departed spirits do return and communicate with mortals, intelligently, under favorable conditions.

Thomas Paine, in his "Age of Reason," says that revelation is only such except to the person receiving it; that when he tells it to another, it is second hand, and is no longer a revelation. So in our Conferences where experience is being given, the philosophy expounded, we can hardly expect the audience, composed, perhaps, mostly of non-Spiritualists, to be made converts to the spiritual science by what they receive from the speakers at second hand. We were not ourselves so converted. Also when inquirers come to our Conferences to listen, it is much more agreeable to them to pay attention to a Spiritualist who knows something of what he or she is talking about, than to a non-Spiritualist uninformed on the subject. The cause has now become so well established, that we can afford to take this solid, dignified and commanding position. We shall make a better impression, accomplish more in the way of general advancement and progress, and be very much better pleased and satisfied with ourselves.

E. W. BALDWIN.

Milwaukee, Wis. Feb. 23d.

Men dread the disturbance of dogmas, less because they have a living belief in the dogmas than because they suppose the dogmas to be necessary pillars of morality. But in the happy days to come, Morality will be as independent of Theology as are Astronomy, Physics and Chemistry. During the middle ages, all truth was supposed to have its roots, either in the Scriptures or in tradition. Science had to accommodate its results with the dogmas of the Church as best it could, and when it could not, had to abjure or abdicate. The stake was a formidable logician, and only a few insurgent minds were bold enough to agree with it. But from time to time, the few were ready—and after some thousand years of servitude, the enfranchisement began. Physics became independent; Medicine ceased to be practised by the Clergy and disease came to be treated by more effectual methods than exorcism. Confidence in drugs gives greater than in amulets and relics. The Church never welcomed these innovations. Indeed the Sorbonne condemned quinine, opposed vaccination, and declared the circulation of the blood to be an infamous heresy. But the movement had begun. Giordano Bruno was burned and Galileo only escaped by abjuration. But the tide rolled on. Astronomy became independent. Bacon and Descartes came and separated Philosophy from Theology. Then Geology and Chronology arrived at results which no ingenuity could reconcile with the Scriptures, and criticism began to make havoc with the very text of scripture itself. How long will it be before liberality is rendered independent of Theology, studied by itself, for itself, bearing in itself its own criterions and its own methods.—Buchner.

OUR MEDIUMS.

A cotemporary speaks of a medium :

"As one to whom nature has given a modest, retiring, and perhaps painfully nervous temperament, which any sudden shock may temporarily disturb in its normal vibrations, but which if allowed to work (as such delicate machinery should,) quietly and without any disturbing element—either of spoken word, or antagonistic magnetism—will give the investigator who may call on him, the greatest degree of satisfaction."

Undoubtedly this may be the case with some of the mediums of Boston. Admit that it is so; should such a one come to the front as a public test medium—liable at any time to meet such a disturbing element—receiving any such element who may pay the sum of two dollars? Is an investigator to blame if he approaches a medium in the common condition to most investigators—doubting, yet wishing to establish the truth of spirit communion? And does an investigator study the philosophy of Spiritualism before he examines the facts on which it is based? Decidedly—No. And Spiritualism has no right to endorse those mediums as public carriers, who in reality are only capable—by the admissions of our cotemporary—to be private messengers.

We write this in no captious spirit; our object is the discovery of truth and its application. If it is required of the investigator that he should be familiar with the fundamental principles of spiritual philosophy, certainly we should expect the mediums to be conversant with the laws governing mediumship. Are they? Again we answer No! Emphatically No! And underlying this fact is the basis of the many evils with which Spiritualism is beset. If Mediumship is a science—as we are all willing to admit—founded on laws the most rigid and exact, should not mediums be developed in accordance with these laws? Will not every violation have its attendant results?

We have only to turn to the "Mediums of Boston," for an answer. That something is lacking, with some of our mediums, is painfully apparent to every candid and impartial Spiritualist. We have no particular case in mind, but speak in general terms, from personal observation, and investigation.

Who is at fault, and what steps are taken to remedy the evil in the future? It has been estimated that one person in every seven is capable of being developed as a medium. It needs not this mathematical calculation to assure us that mediums are constantly being developed in our very midst. But how? Why, in the majority of cases, as in times past, by circumstances. No attempt to profit by the experience of the past—even if there was opportunity to obtain that experience. This information should be obtained as easily as you can purchase a spiritual paper: and had it been during the past ten years, we should not now have so many half developed mediums—test, trance, and physical. How many Spiritualists even, can tell the rules governing the development of mediumship.

A well known English writer in speaking of development has said :

"Yet for this end, a vast amount of experience, knowledge, and judgment is needed, and, to my mind, there is a responsibility attached to those who undertake to promote the development of media which no one should lightly take upon himself. He should at least be satisfied that the moral status of himself and associates is such as to afford ample protection against the insidious workings of spiritual enemies."

A true statement; but "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." A few friends, some of whom are unsuited for such a purpose, gather round, in curious wonder. The surging elements outside the medium push and wrangle to obtain the mastery, no order, no system, no knowledge this side, on the part of the conductors of the circle to control them, and circumstances decide the fate of that medium. Spiritualism has another sign board; for many a traveller in the path of life, the road divides at this point—one leads to truth and the other to error; he pauses to glance, and unless its directions are unmistakable he chooses the one most travelled; it has an easy slope downward, and he may never again be so fortunate as to near a point, from whence he may obtain a glimpse of the Temple of Truth.

Is the picture overdrawn? Has there been that attention paid to the Philosophy which its intricacy demands? We have the greatest charity for any person who may possess mediumistic gifts. But we love the Truth so much the better, that we dare to say that there are, among the Mediums of Boston, persons who possess the gifts of mediumship, but so pampered are they by the flattery of ignorant friends, so satisfied are they with their worldly surroundings, that they have no higher aspirations, and have no idea that their power is so slightly developed—that they are not qualified, nay more, are doing a positive injury to themselves, and the world at large, to stand forth as public mediums.

When Spiritualists demand of their papers, that they give instruction rather than flattery; when Spiritualists will dare to criticise their own faults, rather than those of others; when Spiritualists will unite for mutual improvement and development rather than divide by personal jealousies and opinions of world conditions; when their "individuality" is so strongly developed that they will stand true to their opinions,—let their actions be consistent with their belief; then shall we have better things, then shall we thank those who attempt to reconcile our faults with our conditions, and reject those who would continue us in our error.—Spiritual Scientist.

We have been accustomed for a great many years to hear the clergy indulge in the most, I must say, insincere, certainly the most offensive, maledictions against the name and fame of Thomas Paine. We have heard slanders repeated which every well-informed person knows to be slanders. We have heard them taken up and passed from mouth to mouth without the least indication of desire to find out whether they were true or not. What reply has been made to those slanders against the name of Thomas Paine? There are replies in books. These stories have been met; these slanders have been refuted. Any one who wishes to know the truth about the matter can easily learn that these stories are libels, and utterly misrepresent one of the best men whom this country ever harbored.—Frederic H. Abbott

As to the continuance of conscious individuality after death, we believe nothing, but hope a great deal. Science to-day is a mere baby; what it will teach when mature, it is for no man to pronounce. But we reverence the dignity of intellectual and moral life so profoundly, that we would treat with the utmost tenderness man's hope of its continuance after death; and we see no reason whatever to consider this hope either irrational or superstitious. Meanwhile we hold that it concerns us all to purify and elevate the quality of our life here, to the end that, if immortal, we may be highly fitted for that untried existence, and that, if not immortal, we may quit this present life with the proud consciousness of having used it nobly, usefully, and greatly.—Index.

The Christ spirit is outside of all human statutes, laws, creeds or isms—universally cosmopolitan. And all that Spiritualists have yet done is to prepare the way for its speedy coming. For this we love them; but when they refuse to allow their works to bring forth their legitimate fruits, and thus clog the wheels of progress, they merit the righteous indignation of every progressive reformer. Oh man! tear away the veil and let the good angels come in, and bear to the souls of men the balm of the sweet comforting spirit that was in Jesus.—Kingdom of Heaven.

An intelligent understanding of the laws of sex, and an open and dignified discussion of these by men and women, to the end of evolving a true social and sexual science, will do more to advance the well-being of humanity and a true appreciation of manhood and womanhood, each for the other, than all the pious homilies that were ever written regarding the duties of husbands and wives.—Elvira Wheelock Ruggles, in Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly.

AFTER THE FUNERAL.

Yes, faith is a goodly anchor
When skies are as sweet as a psalm;
At the bows it lolls so stalwart
In bluff, broad shouldered calm.

And when over the breakers to leeward
The tattered surges are hurled,
It may keep our heads to the tempest,
With its grip on the base of the world.

In the breaking gulfs of sorrow,
Where the helpless feet stretch out,
And find in the depths of darkness
No footing so solid as doubt;

Then better one span of memory,
One broken plank of the past,
That our human hearts may cling to,
Though hopeless of shore at last!

To the spirit its splendid conjectures;
To the flesh its sweet despair,
Its tears o'er the thin worn locket,
With its beauty of deathless hair!

Immortal? I feel it and know it;
Who doubts it of such as she?
But that is the pang's very secret—
Immortal away from me!

There's a narrow ridge in the graveyard,
Would scarce stay a child in its race;
But to me and my thoughts it is wider
Than the star-sown vague of space.

Your logic, my friend, is perfect,
Your morals most dearly true;
But the earth stops the ears of my darling—
Inseparable it maketh mine too.

Console if you will; I can bear it:
'Tis a well meant alms of breath;
But not all the preaching since Adam
Has made death other than death.

Communion in spirit! Forgive me,
But I, who am earthly and weak,
Would give all my incomes from dreamland
For her rose-leaf palm on my cheek!

That little shoe in the corner,
So worn and wrinkled and brown—
Its motionless hollow confutes you,
And argues your wisdom down.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

BORN TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Last Wednesday I was called upon to conduct the funeral services of Mrs. Sophia A. Decker, a Spiritualist in belief, though not publicly known as such. A few days before she passed from earth life, she told her friends she hoped they would not allow an orthodox clergyman to give the funeral discourse over her remains. Mrs. D. was a lady who was loved by all who knew her, a kind neighbor, a true friend, a faithful wife, an affectionate sister and loving mother. Her attending physician was head to say, she was one of Heaven's own women. She loved our beautiful philosophy, and was ready to go at the call. This was the first funeral under the auspices of the Spiritualists in Stockton, and of course elicited much comment. Thus far, all I have heard is in our favor. The following poem, given me the day before the funeral, I read on the occasion.

SPIRIT BIRTH OF MRS. SOPHIA A. DESLER.

Not dead, nor even sleeping, but free from earthly care,
And from the worn out body my spirit used to wear;
Not gone, for still I'm near you; not lost, for yet I see
My children and my husband, on earth so dear to me.

No more earth's chains and fetters my weary spirit binds;
No more the sighs and weeping that oft on earth were mine;
No more the darkened shadows of hope gone out in fear;
No more those midnight wakings, no pillows bathed in tears.

That night I left my loved ones with but the mortal form,
So dumb, so cold and lifeless, I was a spirit born;
I knew that I was going; I saw the spirit band,
And heard them whisper, "Sister, come to the spirit land!"

"That morn broke clear and lovely in this my spirit home,
Where skies are fair and cloudless, and angels go and come—
Yes, 'tis a land of beauty, the earth's ideal home;
Yes, 'tis a land of plenty, where all in freedom roam.

"Here hearts are never hungry, here souls shrink not with fear,
Nor do they even languish for sympathy so dear;
Free as the gentle breezes that kiss the blooming flowers,
We walk the shining pathway in their celestial bowers.

"We visit you in silence; we watch you from afar;
We warn you oft of danger, and leave the gates ajar.
Look up! oh, weary mortals! and see the light above,
Fear not, for we will guide you to bowers of peace and love."

NOTHING TO US.

The day is dark and the day is cold,—
Sing, my bonnie bird, sing!
Sing loud and long, while into the world
The sea wind saileth so swift and bold.
For it's nothing to us—to you and to me—
That the day is dark as a day may be,
And the wind but a biting thing.

You know when the sun shines!—so do I!
Were my eyes blindfolded fast,
And I alone in the clamor and cry
Of a terrible storm that shook the sky
And drown'd the lilies—and half-drown'd me,—
I should know—for my heart and my soul would see—
When the sun shone through at last.

Come to my bosom, bonnie bright bird!
I love you—and he loves me!
His story—the truest that ever was heard—
I will tell you, my beautiful, word for word;
Tell it softly and oftly, and often again,
Till its meaning is plain to your heart and your brain,
And you warble it back in glee.

The day is dark and the day is cold.
But merrily, O, we'll sing!
Sing loud and long while into the world
The sea wind saileth so swift and bold.
For it's nothing to us—to you and to me—
That the day is dark as a day may be,
And the wind but a biting thing.

THE PRIESTHOOD OF THE FUTURE.

BY JAMES W. JACKSON.

As roseate hues in eastern sky
Show where the morning glories lie
In part concealed,
So are there omens of a light
That hastes to meet our mental sight,
And be revealed.

The dawn of thought, in fitful gleams
And peerless radiance, often beams,
With radiant year,
Athwart those dark and murky clouds,
Where superstition's night enshrouds
Truths of the past.

Amidst our faith in creeds there steals
A doubt that something more reveals
Of light behind;
The scepter'd king and crosser'd priest
Would stay this intellectual feast,
For man designed.

But there's a priesthood yet unknown,
Whom theologians scarcely own,
Priests of the soul,
The tuneful bard and learned sage,
The master-minds of every age,
Whom none control.

These are the mental monarchs great,
Whose sceptre pens shall rule the fate
Of future man.
Our present chiefs must shortly fall,
Then God will on these heroes call
To lead the van.

Their mission is to lead the light,
On mental altars burning bright,
And offer there
A sacrifice more pure than aught
The priesthood of the past have sought,
In faiths that were.

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER!

PUBLIC CHALLENGE.

Since Prof. Chaney is so anxious, at the expense of common propriety and decency (ignorance and quality of course the true cause thereof), I hereby openly challenge him on the part of CHRISTIANITY and of "Christians," at whom he loves to sneer, to meet me in open, fair discussion, on SUNDAY, APRIL 4, AT CHARTER OAK HALL.

And in three consecutive debates I will take him either, or join his God-forsaken side of Atheism and Spiritism.

Respectfully, though with regret,

B. ALSTON LAVENDER,

Signs of the Times.

The Valcour Community, after a brief struggle, has gone to pieces.

Hammond gave notice in one of his meetings last week that any one circulating COMMON SENSE in the hall would be arrested. He is not favorable to common sense.

The Sorosis, the New York Woman's Club, held its seventh annual meeting recently. It has grown into respectability, but has accomplished little. It is merely a social organization.

Rev. Hyatt Smith, baptist, of Brooklyn, declines to baptize people who will not promise to join his church. He will not do "dirty work" for other ministers; or to use his own expressive language, he "don't take in washing."

By July 1, 1875, the American people will have paid, within ten years, taxes amounting in currency to $7,000,000,000. The Federal Government has absorbed about half of this. The State and municipal Governments have taken the other half.

O. B. Frothingham writes to the Index that the reason why Unitarian Bible classes are unattended, is that Unitarians do not believe in the inspiration of the Bible, do not feel religiously bound to study it, and are not interested in knowing what it means.

A Clergyman in Fond du Lac, Wis., publicly prayed: "O Lord, Thou knowest that my hated wife is the one great obstacle in the way of revival in my church. Wilt Thou, in Thy goodness, remove her?" The next day the wife removed herself to her father's house.

The trial of Theodore Tilton is still proceeding in Brooklyn, on pretence of trying Beecher. A case which should not have occupied any honest tribunal three days is likely to take over three months, and when finished the ends of justice will be effectually defeated.

An English scientist, by way of experiment, injected absinthe into the veins of some dogs, for which he was fined by an English magistrate for cruelty to animals. Shortly afterward the French Academy of Sciences awarded him a prize of $500 for his scientific researches.

The students of the University of California will spend a week of the Spring vacation in exploring and surveying the country between Berkeley and Mt. Diablo. Their out-door studies will embrace practical lessons in geology, mineralogy, botany, zoology, topography, surveying, drawing etc.

Mr. Fitz-James Stephen, in an article tracing the laws of England on the expression of religious opinion, says that, although the profession of Unitarianism ceased to be a punishable offense in 1813, Mr. Mill, had his "Three Essays" been published in his lifetime, could have been summoned to retract his opinions under pain of six months' imprisonment.

The law of Minnesota won't allow a father to thrash a child over sixteen years old, but he can beat his wife to his heart's content.

In Vienna letters and small parcels are now sent through a pneumatic tube with such dispatch that they may be delivered in a few minutes eight miles from the place of reception.

The Berlin Academy of Sciences has voted money to maintain a number of competent persons in the investigation of science. They are to have no other occupation than study, teaching and lecturing.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Carrie S. Burnham, Phebe W. Couzens, M. J. Gage, Rev. O. B. Frothingham and others are announced to speak before the woman suffrage convention in New York City next May.

A Salt Lake mechanic is perfecting a fast printing machine, which he claims will surpass in speed any press yet invented, and work a revolution in the printing business. Can any good thing come out of Mormondom?

It is stated on the authority of several reliable witnesses, that a materialized spirit preached the funeral sermon of a man who recently died in Chittenden, Vt. One of the Eddy family sat in the room from which the spirit emerged.

The Bookseller's Guide says: "Individual publishers are recognizing the fact that books must be read before they are printed, and cannot be taken on the author's word alone; that paying editions cannot be disposed of in a single day or a single week; that the books must seek the purchasers as the purchasers cannot be depended on to seek the books; hence, judicious advertisements and careful reviews are daily becoming of more importance."

S. B. Brittan writes to the New York Herald an earnest letter deprecating the present mode of dealing with prisoners by the police and police judges of New York. The system is only a little worse than that in vogue in San Francisco. Policemen make arrests unnecessarily to prove their efficiency, and after the unfortunate prisoner is kept in a dismal cell all night, with criminals of all grades, the police magistrate devotes less than one minute in the average, to a hearing, before passing sentence in the morning. Hundreds of cases are disposed of every morning by one man.

The Rescue publishes a letter from a Good Templar who is laboring in the Cause of Temperance in the Western States, from which we learn that the prospects of that Order in Ohio are by no means flattering. Their Organ—The Prohibition Era—published at Cleveland, has been obliged to suspend publication for lack of support. "Not more than five or six years ago, the Order of Good Templars in Ohio" he says, "numbered more than 40,000....now the Order in that State numbers 5,000 or 6,000 members....It seems impossible to awaken any special interest in the temperance work. We seem to have reached a sort of stand still." Surely this is a poor Exhibit.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF ASTROLOGY.—NO. 6.

SPIRITUALISM.

Spiritualism is like that tree spoken of in the gospels, which, from the smallest of seeds, grows to be large enough to give shelter to every bird in the air; every ism, onomy or ology finds a refuge, a place of shelter, at least, in its spreading branches; even Astrology has a place there, a place to which it has a constitutional right. Divination, Magic and Spiritualism are essentially identical. Astrology and Magic have been twins inseparable from time immemorial.

If between Astrology and Magic there once existed an interdependent sympathy, then between Astrology and Modern Spiritualism the same relationship must now exist.

Astrology teaches that the ever changing aspects of the stars produce a corresponding change in the physical and psychical conditions of life.

Spiritualism teaches that its phenomenal manifestations are dependent upon certain mental and spiritual conditions which are ever changing and not at all obedient to the will. Ancient Magic or Spiritualism also depended upon the same requisite conditions, and Astrology was held to be the key to those conditions. Every writer, speaker, poet, and every inspirational person knows that there are certain moods in which they excel; when ideas, thoughts and words flow easily; and other times when they have but a sluggish and uncertain flow. These moods, to a certain extent, may be traced to stomachic conditions, which have a powerful influence on mentality; but mentality has also its influence on the stomach, both being subject to the conditions of atmospheric influence, and all of them to the influx of stellar rays. The primary proof of this lies in the fact that certain configurations of the heavenly bodies at birth have been attended with consequent characteristics of the person born. Their effects upon the human constitution have been so closely observed in the Caucasian race that a description of a person can be given with considerable accuracy simply from a diagram of the zodiac at birth.

When Prof. Chaney was almost a total stranger in this city I contrived to bring five gentlemen to his room in such a manner that collusion was impossible. I gave him, during the evening, one at a time, the date of birth of each, without giving him any knowledge of the person to whom it belonged. The first was simply remarkable. He described his mental and physical character, with certain peculiarities in his life, better than his intimate friends could have done. With none of the parties did he make one mistake. His success probably depended on the accurate knowledge each possessed of his exact date of birth. Two or three months ago, in order to test the astrological ability of a lady student, I sent her two dates of birth, one of a lady, Mrs. Hardinge Britten, the other a gentleman, keeping secret the names of both. The horoscopes of each were returned with descriptions of character, ability and physical appearance, which, in accuracy, were perfectly astonishing. If further particulars be desired they can be found at the office of COMMON SENSE. These are not solitary examples. I have seen scores of them, and they are to me proof positive that our life moods and destiny are in a mysterious way linked with the stars. The transits of planets over certain radical points in the horoscope are also alleged to be followed by consequent events. To this I am not able to consent with the same assurance I have done in regard to nativities, not having had the same amount of experience, but there are others who with more experience fully assent. Nor am I assured that there is any truth in "arcs of direction" on which the predictions of genethliacal Astrology are based. I can see no connection between the degrees of an arc and the years in the future. Can space be converted into time? The outcropping realities of Astrology, even from a vast amount of crudities and absurdities, should induce those interested in the "reason why" of Spiritualism, to acquaint themselves with the subtle but powerful influences of the stars, upon which probably even mediumship itself depends.

Were the practical study of Astrology and Spiritualism united much of the incongruous, the repulsive and absurd would be eliminated from both. Nor, in order to study Astrology, is it necessary to adopt the ancient spiritual ideas which were associated with Astrology, which viewed the planetary and spiritual spheres as one, the Jacob's ladder of spiritual progress, upon which all souls ascended and descended on their journey home to God. This study should have to do with present facts, rather than past causes or future results, though all are legitimate subjects for study. For my own part, I do not know that any theory of existence, spiritual or non spiritual, is true. Life is overshadowed in mystery. Momentary gleams of light flit across the soul, bewildering its senses in the view of its own greatness and the importance of its future destiny; but equally bewildering is the darkness which follows, in which our utter littleness is felt; the hollow mockeries of all our surroundings in their mutability and utter worthlessness, the apparent anarchy and injustice in life make us forget the former light in the darkness which comprehends it not. I base my entire hope and faith on the idea that what I am essentially is eternal and perfect, and will outlive eternally the transient and organic. The organic must perish with all its hopes, affections and desires, when they have subserved the purposes of the eternal and essential.

There is a greater light dawning on the world, amid lengthened shadows, and gloomy recesses; and though we see, in the uncertain morning light, grotesque appearances, weird shapes and fitting mirage which deceive us, these as the sun rises will disappear; our knowledge will increase if we work out doors in the free air and in the pure sunlight of heaven.

I think Spiritualists, in their eagerness to defend their theory of disembodied spiritual existence, underestimate the embodied powers of their own spiritual existence. Astrology properly understood and studied will remove much of this. As the laws of occult influences, and especially stellar influence, in their relation to us, become better understood, our relationship to spiritual phenomena will be better known and be more intelligently practised. As it is, there is but little system or science in it, mediumship is a work of chance. Except in a few rare instances, it has not met with that careful experimental scrutiny which characterized the researches of Reichenbach. Nor will Spiritualism ever deserve the name of science, till it has undergone this exacting scrutiny, when the result of occult mundane and celestial influences upon mediums and sensitives will have been carefully noted and classified.

The honest investigator feels repelled from an exhibition of mediumistic powers where self importance and aggrandisement are the principal controlling spirits. The same may be said of Astrology.

But neither Spiritualism nor Astrology will be understood until they be married by the authority of honest inquiry. May you and I, dear readers of COMMON SENSE, be present at the nuptials. Till then farewell,
VOX STELLARUM.

Mrs. J. M. Spear, as one of a Committee of the Radical Club of Philadelphia, recently drafted a petition to the Pennsylvania Legislature in favor of reform in the management of the House of Refuge, asking especially that the Board be composed in part of women.

SAVED BY - A DREAM.

BY MRS. H. W. BAKER.

CHAPTER I.—A SELFISH MAN.

Bradleigh and I became acquainted accidentally (if anything really is accidental), and I showed him the specimens taken out of my claim up in Placer county. He was much impressed by their evident richness, and before many months succeeded in interesting several capitalists who finally bonded the mine for six months at what I then thought a very fine figure. Then operations commenced in earnest. Men and implements were collected, and I opened a boarding house on the premises with the intention of turning an honest penny out of this new streak of luck, whether anything came of the mine or not. All went on well in my opinion, since they had no trouble in finding pay rock in large quantities. But Bradleigh soon proved himself unfit for the position of Superintendent by his hourly exhibition of more than childish impatience, and by other symptoms characteristic of an overbearing and tyrannical disposition. It was a matter of no surprise to me that he could not keep his men; good, honest fellows, for the most part, but unable to endure patiently the almost unbroken stream of profanity he poured out upon them. It was an interesting study in human nature to note the man's peculiarities. Indeed, before I was done with him he succeeded in lowering the whole human race in my estimation—only, however, to take deeper root upon my sympathies at last, and to lead me into a broader and more comprehensive sense of justice than I had ever known before. There were times when he was so elated by the prospect of future wealth, that his native arrogance would crop out like the blisters of silver on the rock; and again he was much depressed in spirits on occasions when the lead seemed to pinch out, which it did two or three times in every one hundred feet. It appeared to be modeled after the plan of a stuffed sausage; but it never gave out entirely, and each new link of it was just a little better than the preceding one.

During his despondent spells Bradleigh was quite subdued in manner, and obsequious to the verge of humility. There was never any real occasion for discouragement, and a man of more equipoise would have been hopeful all the time. But poor Bradleigh! There was not one element of repose in his whole composition. I never saw a man who chafed himself and others as he did. His very walk—almost a run; his quick, irritable pronounciation; his glance darting here and there—not boldly, but furtively, as if trying to detect us all in some act of cheating. He impressed me so disagreeably and continually that even when I was at work in the kitchen, with the length of several rooms between us, I could still feel the influence of his nearness, and the impossibility of disburdening my thoughts of him. His appearance at the door would check any stream of merriment within as suddenly as if a thunderbolt had fallen. The very dog—an old hunter that my husband had loved—would scurry around the house in a panic, as Bradleigh came through the gate; and if he followed him, as he sometimes did, in a forced attempt at conciliation, the dog would show his teeth, a thing he had never been known to do before. "A bad man, Missis," Billy said to me, the next day after he came. "Bet your life, if that 'ound don't know, nobody do." The man haunted me, and before three months passed I commenced dreaming about him. One morning at the breakfast table I told him I had a strange dream of him the previous night, and was asked to relate it. At that time they had just discovered a very rich body of ore, and he was in great spirits—felt himself a perfect nabob, and treated us all as if he owned us, and would be glad to sell us off at any price. But the dream, which I shall never forget, for reasons to be hereafter explained, was as follows:

I thought I was in San Francisco, one morning; on Montgomery street; and that one whole side of the street was lined with beggars. Blind men and women with their organs, singing men on crutches; in short, all the beggars in the city stood in a row on the sidewalk. The first one I passed moved me to compassion, and I gave him money; and to each one along the line, for a short distance, I gave something, but each time a smaller amount as my pity diminished, which it did more and more, as my eyes became familiar to the spectacle of their misery. At last, I not only ceased to pity them, but my heart gradually hardened into anger toward them, so that when I saw other people giving, I could not but consider them fools in my mind, and condemn them bitterly. Then I passed into another street filled with beautiful things for sale; and I made many purchases, each time finding more gold instead of less in my purse. There was now a sudden transition in my dream, and I found myself back among the beggars, and face to face with one whom I knew. Clothed in rags, pale, worn to a skeleton, trembling with premature old age, yet with the same look of irrepressible greed flashing right and left from his sunken eyes, and with palsied, outstretched hand, stood Bradleigh. His whole attitude was pitiful, beseeching, humble to the last verge of degradation. I took out my purse and gave it to him. He opened it and ran his eyes eagerly over the yellow coin; then, with an air of supreme pride and arrogance, he stepped out of the beggar ranks and pushed me into his place. And without one glance behind him, with head erect, and all his old insolence of manner, he passed up the street and out of sight. As I glanced down on my miserable dress, for I had become a beggar, I said to myself: "There seems to be a premium on selfishness in this world. While I attended exclusively to my individual wants, I became richer all the time; but I no sooner turn philanthropist than even the man I relieve scorns me." And then came to my mind the grand question of the present age: "Will it pay!" After that I fell into an awfully despairing mood, and was filled with selfish repining. But this passed; and as I began to look about me I was able to enter into the feelings of those other unfortunate mortals like myself; and my heart grew, by sympathy, to such Godlike proportions that I would gladly have taken all their sorrows upon my own shoulders so that they could go free. And then feeling an impulse to look upward, I saw the heavens open, and a shining host look down smilingly. And a great hope took possession of me, and filled me with such joy that I awoke in a tumult of blissful emotion.

Having told my dream, not as it is written, but in a most fragmentary manner, interrupted by remarks from Bradleigh, whose arrogance exceeded all bounds that morning, we dispersed our several ways and met no more until dinner.

And now, one word with regard to Bradleigh's position and my own. I had met him in San Francisco, at a boarding house, and learned that he had a family, though I did not see them, and have never seen them until recently. He had been one of the richest men in the State. His legitimate business was banking; but embarking in speculation, he had ruined himself financially. His wife was a proud, selfish woman, whose repining at poverty was enough to drive him crazy. He had six children. At the time I knew him first he was about forty-two years old, the handsomest man I ever saw, with a face and figure so perfect that any honest messenger of the gods, seeing him, would hand over instantaneously his own seal of office. Nevertheless, his beauty did not win on one as beauty often does. He lacked magnetism. He had no desire to please. He was absorbent by nature. He appropriated everybody's surplus vitality, and gave out none. He was a sponge, gathering all the moisture of the neighborhood, leaving us only the arid, desert air. Not until he left the room could one of us breathe freely.

At the time I met him I was a widow, not far from forty, with one child, the dearest girl a mother was ever blest with. I was in the city on business, my home being in Placer county, my property consisting of a flock of sheep and a small range on which the mine was accidentally discovered. I had carried some specimens with me when I left home, and this circumstance resulted in our after connection. The men who were engaged in the mine with him were rich; and as he had nothing, he put his services against their money, and he was allowed to come in as one-fourth owner. His manner toward these men, when they came about the place, was disgustingly subservient, truckling—indeed the very reverse of his manner to us, whom he considered beneath him, and from whom he expected nothing. He would crawl on his knees before a rich man, and spurn a poor one with his foot. Now will it be believed that such a man would ever gain any influence over a plain, practical, common sense woman, who knew him as well as if she had lived with him always, and who was never for one moment blinded as to his real character? But this influence he did finally gain, and that too through her pity, which we all know is akin to love.

A SCOTCH PRAYER.

The following is one of the reminiscences of J. C. Young, as given in the first volume of the "Bric-a-Brac Series":

One of the most notable man for the homely fireside eloquence was Adam Scott of Upper Dalgleish. I had an uncle that herded with him, and from him I had many quotations from Adam Scott's prayers. Here is a short sample:—

"We particlarly thank Thee for Thy great gudeness to Meg; and that it ever cam into your head to tak ony thought o' sic a useless bow-wow as her (alluding to a little girl of his, who had been miraculously saved from drowning). For Thy mercy's sake—for the sake o' Thy puir sinfu' creeturs now addressing Thee in their ain shilly-shally way, and for the sake o' mair than we daur weel name to Thee, hae mercy on our Rob. Ye can yersel' he's a wild mischievous callant, and thinks nae mair o' committing sin than a dog does a licking a dish. But put Thy hook intil his nose, and Thy bridle intil his gab, and gar him come back to Thee wi' a jerk that he'll not forget the longest day he has to live. Dinna forget puir Jamie who's far awa frae us the night. Keep Thy arm o' power about him, and eoh, sirs, I wish ye wad endow him with a little spunk and smeddun to act for his sell; for if ye dinna, he'll be but a bauchel i' this world, and a backstiter i' the next. Thou hast added one to our family. (One of his sons had just married against his approbation.) Sq it has been Thy will: it wad never hae been mine. But if it is of Thee, do Thou bless the connection. But if the fule hath done it only out o' carnal desire against a' reason and credit, may the cauld rain o' adversity settle in his habitation."

The last part of his prayer is left open. First it was God who had brought the couple together; but notwithstanding the work of the divine hand, the father boldly tells him he would have made a better choice. Then there creeps a suspicion about God having done it, and, if he really have, a blessing is asked; but, to be safe, in case he have not, a curse. Many snch prayers I have heard myself in Scotland; but do we hear many more enlightened ones here? Are not all prayers inconsistent, and more or less blasphemous? If we believe unchangeably in natural laws, what have we to pray for? Or if, for us, prayer mean only thanks and praise, cannot these best displayed in our lives? Does not "he pray best who loveth" and worketh "best"?—Index.

A California inventor, Mr. Brooks, has devised a mode of distilling at a temperature so low that the fusil oil is not vaporized, but remains in the wort, to be thrown away, while the ether is evolved before the alcohol begins to vaporize, and that is also eliminated.

REVIVALS.

BY LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN AN EX-METHODIST MINISTER AND THE READER.

Reader.—I would very much like to have your present opinion as to the philosophy by which those wonderful revivals were "got up" under your preaching when a Minister in the Methodist E. Church?

Ex-Minister.—The phenomena of my revivals were the same as in all revivals, and all concerned at the time believed, as Methodists now believe, that those mental epidemics were produced by the immediate "power of Almighty God, manifested through his preached word." But a longer experience has put this fact beyond all doubt, that all revival phenomena, from first to last, are human in their inception, human in all their means, and human in their results. There is no more of God in these epidemics than there was in my lectures on Pathetism; when numbers (by suggestion) became entranced in my audiences, as they often did in the streets a mile from my platform.

R.—And how could that be?

E. M.—Why, my friend, I had cases where one was entranced by reading my advertisement; another by reading my book on Pathetism; and, when lecturing in Tremont Temple, Boston, in 1847, a man was entranced on seeing my portrait in the window of Ross & Hatchman, where it had been sent to be framed. Each of these persons had probably been entranced before, though I do not know; and it makes no difference if they had, as we know that the mind, if once deeply impressed with an idea of the trance, and the temperament is "sensitive," is sufficient to induce that state.

R.—And yet, our christian friends call these mental epidemics "religion," as if they superinduced the relations of life, which are the source and the highest authority for religion.

E. M.—Pathetism proves that all "revivals," as all mental epidemics, involve psychological laws, and here are some of them:—

1. Saving faith, which is such an intensification of credulity as creates the "evidence of things unknown."—Heb. 11:1. Faith is such a trust on this "evidence" as leads to action.

2. The laws of association. All are more or less governed by these laws. The sight of tobacco excites a desire for its use; the sight of a keep-sake, the memory of the giver. Animals and the feathered tribe are governed by these laws. And by these laws the trance and various states of the mind are induced, depending on the leading idea in the movement.

3. Sympathic imitation. We gape, we laugh, we weep, from an aptness that is natural when we witness these things in others. St it is in war, and in all revivals and mental excitements. Hence, Hammond's earnest efforts to get one sinner "forward for prayers," because the sight of that one will have a tendency to excite others.

4. Dogmatism. Without this there never was a revival nor any Pathematic (Mesmeric) results, i. e. I. the repetition of the revival Idea, made from fear of an angry vindictive God, an old boss devil and hell fire torments; II. the dogmatic assumption of the authority and power essential for the work to be done.

And here comes in that error respecting the human "will." Jesus said, "I will, be thou saved." And the revivalist says, "I have this power from God" to threaten hell and eternal torments to all who venture to doubt what I say on this subject. Quincy, Mass, April 2.

CHRISTIANITY VERSUS WOMAN.

In the course of the able argument of A. C. Stowe, before the Society of Self Culture, on the question "Does Christianity promote the highest civilization?" the speaker used the following language:

The most fatal defect in Christianity is its degradation, and subjection of woman. No system can improve or promote civilization that affirms the inferiority of woman; that does not place her in equality with man. Christianity has not done this, on the contrary, it has not only incorporated into itself false and unjust notions concerning woman, but it has endorsed the despotism of the Jewish Scriptures and their divine origin. The fall of man is laid to her charge. She is cursed with a terrible curse. "In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children and thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee." A more damning curse could not be conceived even by a God; and all this because she sought and obtained knowledge, because she desired to be wise. This curse means the absolute slavery of woman's sexual nature to man's lust, and a belief in the divine authority of this hellish curse has wrought its sad and damning work. It has poisoned the very foundation of life, and the wonder is that we have so high a state of civilization as we have. I affirm, without fear of successful contradiction, that no improvement can possibly be made in the race except through favorable ante-natal conditions. The relation of the sexes in the Christian marriage is but the fulfillment of the curse, intensified in its horrors to woman by other divine inspirations.

"Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church; and he is the savior of the body. Therefore, as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing."—Ephesians, Chap. 5.

"Let the women learn in silence, with all subjection. But suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression. Notwithstanding, she shall be saved in child bearing if they continue in faith and charity, and holiness and sobriety."—1 Timothy, Chap. 2.

How magnanimous! "Notwithstanding, she shall be saved in child bearing." This is adding insult to injury. A more degrading and damning relation of the sexes can not be devised, and this is Christian marriage. It tends to the degradation of both man and woman. It ties man and woman together for life without regard to adaptability. It yokes together the diseased and depraved, the ignorant and selfish, the good, bad and indifferent, in indiscriminate confusion, for their natural lives, and bids them increase and multiply, and perpetuate the diseases and deformities of body, mind and soul. It licenses the man, the lord of creation, to sexually debauch the wife, if he is so disposed, and she has no redress. And this Christian marriage is one of the agencies which is to promote a higher civilization, is it? No wonder that Christians confess that the world is growing worse. It would indeed grow worse, if this Christian marriage could be strictly enforced; but it can not. Christians themselves let the marriage bonds hang very loosely about their person, and many of them imitate their God, and more than one Jesus has come to bless the world.

What is Christian marriage? Is it a permit for two souls to love each other? No; for they are permitted to do this without marriage. Is it a permit to kiss and caress? No; for this is sanctioned outside of marriage. Then, what privileges does marriage confer that are not permissible without it? The privilege of sexual indulgence only, to the man, if he so desire, "for he is the head of the wife," the privilege of debauching the wife; and to the wife—for she is the tail of the husband—the privilege of being debauched; and through these conditions it is here affirmed that a higher civilization is to be promoted.

What would you think of the Stock Breeder, if he should tie the males and females of his herd together indiscriminately, without regard to selection, and compel the female to submit to the demands of the male as often as it was his pleasure, without the least regard to time or season? Would you not say he was a fool, that he would degenerate his stock? Yet this is precisely what Christian marriage does for the human race. Should the Agriculturist, Horticulturist and Stock Breeder pursue the same policy in regard to the products of the earth, and the domestic animals, that Christianity, which assumes the guardianship of the human race, does in respect to the improvement of man, the earth would have long since been a barren waste, a fit habitation for bats and owls.

SUBJECTS WHICH ARE OFFENSIVE TO DELICACY.

The Los Angeles Express, in noticing a lecture on "The Pre-natal Rights of Children," by Jennie Leys, says:

"Miss Leys has had the hardihood to lecture on subjects which offend delicacy, real or assumed, and she has had the wonderful skill to talk for hours upon subjects admitting of prurient associations, without for a moment leading any of her audience to question a personal purity, which is indeed apparent in her very physique."

The San Jose Mercury comments as follows:

"The implication that the discussion of the pre-natal rights of children offends delicacy which is real, seems to us a mistaken idea, entirely incorrect. Does it not evince a desire to make an unmanly compromise with a weak, sickly sentiment which Madame Grundy affects so much? This appears to us as one of the motley group of bugbears with which society has long seemed pleased to scare itself—a creature of diseased imagination, deformed and naked, which has no right to live."

"The subject of pre-natal life is clothed with a divinity which challenges the holiest thoughts, which deserves the sincerest reverence of the soul. To study it, to fathom, as far as may be, its sacred depths, to learn its mysteries, is our duty, commanded by the united voices of Nature and her Maker, God. Let us have done with the sinful proscription of this theme so vital to the welfare of the race. Let us stay our puny hands from longer throwing mud at the sun."

THE MYSTIC RAP A MIRACLE.—It is a miracle in the Bible sense of this term; and, supermundane, in a sense that most of the so-called miracles of Jesus could not be said to be. The mystic Rap is not conditioned, like the miracles of Jesus, on human volition, or faith. And, what shall be thought of those Spiritualists, who are stupid enough to attempt to turn the influence of this Rap in the support of ancient mediumism, which began its career by the mediumship of a snake, (Gen. 3: 2) and an ass (Num. 22: 28.)? And after including, "Moses and the Prophets," and "Jesus and his apostles," in that form of mediumship, between God and humanity, its career was closed, finally, with a mediumship of a set of monsters, including a calf, which had "eyes behind," where their tails should have been.—La Roy Sunderland.

Isn't it possible that murderers, even, have rights that society ought to respect? There is something out of joint in their natures, else they wouldn't be what they are. That "something" may have resulted from inherited or other conditions for which they are in nowise responsible. We treat humanely the intellectually and physically diseased—why not the diseased moral natures as well? Why not give them a chance to improve, under such reformatory influences as the State has the power to throw around them? Is it fair for us to send our criminals into the next world before they are wanted there, thus shirking a responsibility that properly belongs to us?—San Jose Mercury.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, APR. 3, 1875.

We call attention to a Story of California Life, the first chapter of which is given on page 545. The writer is a California lady of acknowledged literary ability, whose productions find place in the best Eastern magazines.

Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn closed a very successful engagement at the Hall of the Spiritualists' Union on Sunday last. Mrs. L. E. Drake is to speak before the same society in April, and Jennie Leys will follow.

The Popular Science Monthly for April contains an interesting article on Photography by Dr. Hermann Vogel, "The first traces of Man in Europe," by Prof. Mueller; "Science from the Pulpit" by Prof. Trowbridge, etc. D. Appleton & Co. 549 Broadway, Publishers. For sale at all the bookstores.

The Society for Self Culture had another very interesting discussion last Sunday. The speakers were J. H. Butler, J. H. Smythe, J. L. York, Mr. Lundi, Mrs. Smith, late of Denver, and James Battersby. We shall give extracts from the addresses hereafter.

Moody and Sankey are creating more excitement in London than the clown Hammond has yet succeeded in getting up in San Francisco. Like Hammond, these two evangelists are ignorant, coarse men. One exhorts and the other sings, but neither is a man of much mental caliber. Their success is all owing to the support of the clergy, who combine to bring about the desired effect. The campaign is deliberately planned and carefully carried out.

The medical profession publish, in the United States, over one hundred journals. If one fourth of this medical literature could be popularized, and given to the people, instead of being confined to the profession, more good would be accomplished. Information in relation to sanitary reform, etc. published in daily journals, would be more beneficial to the people at large than all the Medical Journals of the country. We hope to see the time when police records and detailed accounts of crime will give way in our daily journals for articles on scientific, educational and industrial subjects.

THE ANNIVERSARY.

On the 31st of March, 1848, at Hydesville, New York, the Mystic Rap gave the first intelligent answers to questions; an event which, startling as it was at the time, had far more significance than any one then accorded to it. It was the beginning of a movement which has swept over the face of the civilized world, awaking thought, freeing from the bondage of creeds, giving assurance of eternal life, teaching mankind that all belong to one great brotherhood, enjoining charity to all, justice to all, and the duties of a life befitting immortal souls. It is proper that a movement so grand as this be celebrated by all who appreciate its beneficial results. The Spiritualists of California united in its observance, and a report of the proceedings will be published next week. As the forms are sent to press on Wednesday, we can this week give only

MEDIUMS' LICENSE.

We barely noticed last week the fact that the Supervisors of San Francisco had "passed to print" an ordinance imposing upon mediums and spirit artists a tax of fifty dollars per quarter for a city license. The gross injustice of the proposition aroused a few persons to make an effort to prevent the passage of the ordinance in the form proposed. A petition to the Board was prepared, numerously signed, and C. J. Collins personally appeared before the Committee on Ordinances and urged the striking out of that clause. After listening to Mr. Collins' views and the consideration of the petition, the Committee did itself the honor to so amend the ordinance that it will not apply to mediums, or spirit artists, but only to astrologers. Our readers here have an illustration of the value of concerted action. Individually the poor mediums could have accomplished nothing; but, sustained by public sentiment, expressed in urgent terms, they succeeded. Organization in this case effected in short order what, without such concentration of power, could not have been obtained. If Spiritualists and Free Thinkers are ever to become a power, they must organize.

CONFUSION TO SCIENTISTS AND SPIRITUALISTS.

This is the battle cry of the revivalists, taken from one of their own organs—The Pacific Methodist, in an article headed "The Revival." The following is an extract:

Christians have been for years waiting for the culmination of infidel theories. Philosophy and science have run riotously and wantonly amid the mazes of theology. Renan and Strauss, one with supple and glittering rapier, the other with heavy axe and mace, have assaulted the divinity of the Son of God. Huxley and Tyndal and Darwin, with specious reasoning, have attempted to overthrow the validity of the Scriptures, and the Devil himself has, with superior skill, marshalled his forces to overthrow the moral consciousness which our blessed religion has bestowed upon us. For forty years an army of necromancers, sorcerers and seers have fed upon the vitals of truth. Their shameless doctrines, backed by seeming supernatural testimony, has so overcome the credulous that they claim converts by the million. Sorrow and pity have filled the hearts of Christian people.

But the writer goes on to say, "at last the Lord has raised up a standard against the enemy." "Renan and Strauss have met their superiors—Spiritualism has had its pretensions exposed, and the Spirit of God has come upon the Churches." The Union revival work he represents as "Universal and Spontaneous," and says "the tide of blessing is rolling right along, and carrying confusion to the horde of skeptical scientists and spiritualists." The writer feels especially grateful, as might be expected, to Elder Hammond, who, as the Lord's Lieutenant, has been so efficient in rallying the discouraged and flying forces of "Prince Immanuel," and leading them on to a new and more vigorous charge against Science, Spiritualism and Common Sense, on the Pacific Coast. As a leader of "the forlorn hope" he is thought to be "a success." It may be so, but if so, how very forlorn their hope must have been! And how very unnecessary, if Spiritualism as well Skeptical science has been so thoroughly checkmated and defeated that they advocate the imposition of a license tax of $50 per quarter on spirit mediums! And, by the way, why not make a consistent thing of it, if a license tax is to be laid on the mediums, and lay one at the same time on the "Scientists," who, according to the Pacific Methodist, have been associated with the Spiritualists in their assaults upon "the divinity of the Son of God" and the Bible infallibility?

But the end is not yet. In fact, the conflict is but begun. Our Methodist friends are not yet half through with their battle, and their exultation is premature. Skeptics are not thrown into "confusion" by all their revival bluster. They know it is a desperate remedy, adapted to meet a desperate emergency; and that it will be little gain to them or to anybody in the end, if it is not a positive disadvantage.

John I. Dexter, the London correspondent of the Boston Congregationalist, a highly Evangelical paper, in alluding to the revival now going on there under Moody and Sankey, speaks of revivals generally thus:

On the whole I am very skeptical as to the good of revivals so called. They are rather confirmations of the uninformed masses in ignorance and unwilling blasphemy, and they customarily end with such hideous disclosures of the personal relations of the leaders as should subject any movement bearing such fruits to the execration of human kind. Ulster, the Scotch lowlands, and wild Wales suffer more seriously in morals and in sanity from this than from any other single factor except strong drink; and, indeed so essentially are excessive emotion and indulgence in liquor's co-operative agents, that much of the mischief attributed to depraved appetite is due in equal, perhaps greater, measure to nervous excitement.

This is in accordance with our own observation, and we are glad to see that some Evangelical persons are beginning to perceive the facts which have for years been so plain to Scientists and Spiritualists, pointing to the conclusion that though religious excitements, known as revivals, may be of some benefit to individuals, on the whole they are a curse rather than a blessing to the community.

Our war cry still is—"Confusion to Superstition and Fanatism! death to ignorance and wrong!" Let the battle go on!

THE BANNER OF LIGHT.—This is, pecuniarily, the most successful Spiritual journal in the world. It was built up by the untiring labor and sacrifices of that noble man, William White; and, once established, it has been easy to keep it at the head of Spiritual publications. It is in some respects a credit to the cause; though not as liberal in its views nor as generous in its treatment of co-workers as could be desired. By co-workers we do not mean mediums and speakers, for its conductors have always been conscious that the mediums and the paper could be mutually helpful. It is the interest of the paper to be the friend of its friends. But workers for the cause who might come into competition with the Banner, however slight, have never been cordially welcomed as co-laborers. One of the best Spiritual papers in the United States, The Spiritual Scientist, is printed at the very door of the Banner office, yet its existence is not acknowledged in its columns. Other papers, doing good work, each in its own way, for the cause the Banner makes money out of, struggle along without a helping word from this firmly established journal. Perhaps this is good policy, in a pecuniary point of view, but it is not becoming in a journal which professes to have such great love for the cause of truth.

CO-WORKERS.—The Religio Philosophical Journal has a very large circulation—probably much larger than that of the Banner—and it is pecuniarily beyond the need of kind words from the "only living parent of Spiritual journals;" but there is another paper in Chicago, The Spiritualist at Work, published by E. V. Wilson, which is struggling for a firm foothold in the field of reform. It is doing a much needed work, and deserves to be sustained. It fills well the place marked out for it by its editor, a place other journals can not occupy, and it publishes valuable Spiritual experiences and tests of a kind to be found in no other paper. It is as useful in its way as the Scientist or the Religio in their respective fields of labor. Hull's Crucible, Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, The Truth Seeker, The Golden Age, The Index, The Toledo Sun, the Boston Investigator and Common Sense are all working for reform in the mode which each sees best for itself. There should be enough of charity and love of liberty in the spiritual ranks to welcome all aids, from whatever source.

COMMON SENSE—ITS FUTURE.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—In passing through your city on my way home from my last field of labor, being tired and worn from my incessant work, and withal home sick, I pushed on home where I have since been quite sick.

I have regretted that I did not call at your new place, and see you, and more so as I have received intimations that you contemplate making COMMON SENSE a Monthly.

I hope the information is incorrect, as, in my judgment, the move would be equivalent to the death of the enterprise. That I have no stock in the concern, is not from want of desire to advance the interests of your excellent paper, but from a lack of metallic substance; but like Peter at the Gate Beautiful, such as I have I give freely, in word and act, in presenting the claims of COMMON SENSE to our people.

I can not bear the thought of any change which looks like a backward movement, but rather let us renew our efforts at the coming convention to secure the interest of Liberals in its welfare. My whole soul is in the work of making Spiritualism in statement broad enough to stand on the basis of Free Thought and Common Sense. To this end your paper, "Our Organ as Free Thinkers," is preeminently adapted to advance the high and broad interests of human Freedom.

To me Spiritualism is Freedom of thought and inquiry throughout the broad domain of nature, making all human knowledge relate to our completings here, and pointing upward to a progressive spirit life. We will use the old adage by reversing its statement: Keep your powder dry, and trust in God afterwards.

It does not seem probable that the friends of Free Thought, in the face of such mighty efforts on the part of Christians, will let COMMON SENSE go down for the want of support. I hope in your next issue you will make that Call for the Convention a little louder, and send a special invitation to all the Liberal Societies to join us in Convention.

San Jose, March 24th.

J. L. YORK.

COMMENTS.

COMMON SENSE has passed through many dark periods during the year, and we have several times been tempted to suspend publication; but it has always been evident that the money invested would in time return, if we could only manage to keep up the paper until the turning of the tide. Every enterprise of this kind loses money at first. It is expected, and provided for, just as the farmer provides seed for the coming harvest. A few months ago we were greatly discouraged. People towards whom we had looked for cordial support were apathetic, and comparatively few seemed to be aware of the importance of sustaining an organ of Free Thought on this coast. At that time, feeling sure that in the future such a paper would be sustained, but not sure of our pecuniary ability to keep it alive until the period of self-support, we consulted with a few friends as to the advisability of publishing it monthly for a year or so, until the chasm could be bridged. This is what gave rise to the report referred to by Bro. York. It was merely an expedient proposed to prevent failure. The Trustees of the Company were almost unanimously opposed to the project, and upon further consideration it was abandoned.

That these pecuniary embarrassments detract very much from the value of the paper must be evident to every one; and that such a state of things is not creditable to the Free Thinkers of California is no less evident. Of the thousands of Spiritualists and Infidels on this coast less than fifty are stockholders in COMMON SENSE; yet all we require for success is to dispose of a portion of this stock.

If the Free Thinkers of California desire to have an organ, they should combine for its support. In one year it can be made self-sustaining, and placed beyond all danger of failure. The stock of the company is offered at one dollar per share (par value $5), and we can safely promise that its value will be doubled within twelve months if enough is disposed of to place the establishment on a good financial footing. As soon as this is done we shall put additional agents in the field to increase our subscription list, and we have no doubt that the circulation of the paper can soon be doubled. Then it will be published at a profit, instead of a loss, as the expenses for type-setting, editorial labor, rents, etc., are no more for a large than for a small edition. Our advertising patronage will also increase with the increase of circulation, and in a short time the stock will pay fair dividends on the money invested.

We now have a Job office costing over $6,000, which is doing a good paying business, but it is not right to burden that branch of the establishment to keep up a paper which should be self-supporting. There are Liberals enough on this coast and they possess wealth enough to afford support to a first-class journal of live ideas. Free Thinkers, do you want such a paper? Spiritualists, do you? If so, come forward and do something to help it. We do not ask gifts, but simply the investment of capital in a useful and promising enterprise. The time has come when the believers in spiritualism should assert themselves, and organize for action. The enemies of religious freedom, under the name of Christianity, are a compact, working body, and they are now using every effort to gain an ascendancy that will give them the control of the Government. By and by you will awake from your lethargy to find yourselves at the mercy of this power which is as remorseless as the grave, and as bigoted and tyrannical as it has ever been during any period of its bloody history. Will you not do something now—something practical, something worthy of men and women claiming to be the most intelligent and most liberal of all our people? The duty of the hour is organization; and to effect this you must have a medium of communication, an organ for the expression of opinion, an advocate of the principles you profess to hold so dear. Here is COMMON SENSE ready to serve you, waiting to be made more useful to the cause than it can possibly be without your help; yet you remain indifferent, a disorganized rabble, despised by your opponents, and even lacking the self-respect which a cause so noble should inspire.

Loyalty to one's convictions, however shown, is a good thing; loyalty to ideal truth is a better thing. This sometimes compels us to destroy our old convictions as Cortez burned his ships behind him, that he might have no refuge, no way of getting back; that he might push on with all his hope before him into a country all untried.—John W. Chadwick.

WOMAN IN THE FIELD OF WORK.

MY DEAR MRS. SLOCUM: I had long ago designed writing to tell you how much I appreciate your work as Assistant Editor of COMMON SENSE. Each number comes to us freighted with earnest thoughts and serious deliberations upon various subjects of such vital importance to humanity. Here in Santa Cruz, where in the long ago you and I have passed pleasant hours together, there seems to be the same spirit of awakening among women for remunerative labor which is found elsewhere. Young girls are not all contented to sit idly, with folded hands, waiting for the lover to claim them as a wife; nor are they willing to pass their time in mother's kitchen, doing drudgery which a Chinese domestic can as capably perform. No, they want to find congenial employment, and they will find it, too. A mother told me a few days ago of her daughter's aspirations to learn type-setting, or some sort of work, in a publishing office. A young friend had obtained a situation in Mr. Bancroft's, at a good salary, after a short time given to acquiring a knowledge of the business. I thought at once of you, and resolved to write to ascertain what is the prospect for our young girls in your Woman's Publishing office.

It is such a foretaste of the good time coming to see wives interesting themselves in their husbands' business pursuits. More than one of our leading merchants here have gladly permitted their wives to appear behind their counters to wait upon customers, and most serviceable clerks they are, too, often imparting valuable information to inexperienced shoppers in regard to choice of material and quantity required, etc. The present editor of the Santa Cruz Enterprise receives valuable assistance from his wife, and the gracefulness with which he acknowledges her usefulness is quite refreshing in one who is evidently not altogether in favor of the strong minded women.

By the way, who is your nameless correspondent in the last issue (March 13) who indulges in personalities not altogether pleasing to the parties concerned? I feel interested, since the article has been attributed to my pen, though I rarely write anything without affixing my mark. I hope my friends do not attribute it to a desire to appear in print, but rather to show a willingness to acknowledge myself as the author of the thoughts expressed. Hoping to hear from you either through the columns of COMMON SENSE, in regard to my friend's daughter, or by friendly letter, I remain sincerely yours,

Santa Cruz, March 25th.

NELL VAN.

DEAR FRIEND:—The imperative demands of a business full of details is my excuse for neglecting to reply promptly to your kind and considerate letter. At present, I regret to tell you, we have no Beginners' Department in the office of the Woman's Publishing Company. Our work is such that it seems necessary, at present, to employ none but experienced compositors. Just as soon, however, as possible, it is my intention to make provision for apprentices, and to promote them from one branch of the business to another as circumstances may warrant, until they obtain a thorough knowledge of the business. I know of no good reason why a woman cannot make just as good a job printer as any man; but so far I have not found them equal to the men even in plain book work. In fact, the most serious difficulty I have yet encountered as Superintendent of the Publishing Company's affairs, is that growing out of the incompetency of female operatives. It appears to be the policy—a very bad one I think—in some offices, not conducted by women, to employ girls only so long as they are willing to work for little or no wages, and allow them to go as soon as they ascertain their own value. Girls are also employed who have no natural and little acquired fitness for the trade—some of them destitute even of the rudiments of an ordinary school education. Such a system of apprenticeship is injurious to the girls, and detrimental to the business. It results in crowding the printing offices with applicants for work who are not capable of doing credit to themselves nor to the office which employs them. My plan is to pay women the same wages that men receive, and to employ none permanently who are incompetent. It is an undeniable fact that female type-setters are not generally as efficient as males. This, in my opinion, is not owing to their organization, but to education;—it is the effect naturally resulting from the idea of dependence which is instilled into woman by the very atmosphere in which she moves from her childhood. She is taught to look forward to marriage as the end to be attained. This is the ultimate of all her efforts. I have nothing to say against true marriage. The family is the fountain of all the virtues—the basis on which rests the peace and good order of Society. I believe in it; but I believe also that the family relation is most perfect where all of its members are most independent—held together by the bonds of affection and mutual interest. Marriage is, doubtless, the duty of women, with some exceptions, but it should not be made, as it generally is, the one aim of a woman's existence, for this destroys her independence, and consequently her usefulness. It teaches her to look forward to means of support other than her own exertions, and in so far it impairs her self reliance and prevents the attainment of a high degree of skill in her profession. Her business is a mere make-shift, and she seeks less to perfect herself in her art than to make it the stepping stone to a different life. There is no adequate remedy for this state of things under our present system, which regulates (or rather fails to regulate) the relations of the sexes; but in that good time coming, when woman will be on an equality with man politically, then will she be his equal in the field of work as well as in the home, and will have higher incentives to effort than now, and greater encouragement to perfect herself in any chosen art. I trust however that we shall not have to wait until that happy day before I shall be able to give your young friend an opportunity to ascertain what she can do as a type-setter.

Yours in hope, AMANDA M. SLOCUM.

CHRISTIANITY.—Were Christianity true, it would be an everlasting disgrace to its devotees, after a trial of nearly two thousand years, that, at the present day, not one in a hundred of the Race has a particle of real faith in its dogmas. And, as the human family increase, the proportion who become real Christians, grow less and less, from year to year. Indeed, it was a failure in the beginning. For Jesus the "author and finisher of faith," himself, if he actually expired upon the cross, died without faith, and in utter despair, (MATT. 27:46.) And, if he did not die upon the cross, then he was never raised from the dead," and in that case, Paul says Christianity is a failure. (1 Cor. 15:14.)—La Roy Sunderland.

LETTER FROM EUREKA.

The good work done here by our excellent speakers, J. L. York, C. Fannie Allyn and Belle Chamberlain, is still fruitful of good results. No church in the city can compete with our audiences. The interest not being of the hot-house kind, that forces youthful scions under the sun glasses of theologic fear into premature covenanting, will live long.

The indisposition since coming here which grew upon me until obliged to yield and take to my bed, is giving way to a fresher vigor, and returning health makes activity a necessity, so I am at work as usual.

I see our friend and co-laborer, Dean Clarke, has at last struck out for a mass convention, to which I heartily give assent, except it be in the date of its proposed calling. It would be an utter impossibility to get the matter so generally advertised as to insure a grand, successful rally of the people in less time than a month or more later than his suggestion calls for. The high pressure days of California are over. People are getting over the hurry that spurred them on in former days.

Eureka, March 21st.

Thine, ADDIE L. BALLOU.

LETTER FROM DUTCH FLAT.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—My husband and myself started East, but having business in this place we are stopping here. The people are very friendly and pious. I met Mrs. Belle Chamberlain here. She has given two lectures since we came. The people are much excited over her. She and myself held a seance in the skating rink last evening, and it was a grand success. We had 150 persons in the audience. Mrs. C. answered written questions, and gave tests with myself. Mrs. C. will give only one more lecture at present, but expects to return after her visit to your city, and with the help of the angel-world, we hope to do a great work here. We send our best wishes to you and all the mediums. Your friend and sister.

Dutch Flat, March 24th.

MRS. F. M. JEFFRIES.

There was thirty years of good honest labor in this man Vasquez, which, if properly utilized, would have been worth to the State at least $250 a year. To that extent he could have made amends for the wrongs he inflicted upon society. His earnings might have been made to contribute to the support of the families he deprived of their natural protectors—a disposition of him which seems to us eminently just. Why waste a man with so much use in him, especially when the object sought is of such questionable utility?—San Jose Mercury.

SPIRITUALISM AND CHRISTIANITY.—Christianity would have been self-annihilated ere this day, if it had ever had a moiety of the internal discords and self-inflicted injuries to contend with that have borne hard on Spiritualism. While Christianity has nothing but tradition and the dead past upon which to lean, Spiritualism has the living miracle of to-day, which renders this movement a live one, and it deserves well of humanity for what it has already done in freeing the human mind from the tyranny of Sectarianism.—La Roy Sunderland.

A FREE PRESS.—A long and varied experience, as a publisher and editor, has convinced me that a perfectly free and independent newspaper is one of the rarest things seen even in this progressive age. And here is the reason:—The mass, the great mass, of the people are under the spell of faith in tradition; and the editor who strikes out from the old path, for progress, must leave the multitude behind, and labor at his own cost or die.—La Roy Sunderland.

The wife of Gerrit Smith, recently deceased, left, without will, property valued at $2,000,000. It is inherited by two daughters, who were rich enough before. The fact that Gerrit Smith and his wife left so much property undisposed of is not to their credit. It is true Mr. Smith gave away millions during his life time, but he had no moral right to the millions retained.

WOMEN AND THE LAW.

A correspondent of the Woman's Journal, who has evidently had a sad experience, writes as follows:

For every other class of persons, from one end of the country to the other, if they earn anything, the law makes provision to secure it to them. But the poor, long-suffering, jaded, worn-out, discouraged, distracted, sick, faded wife and mother must drag out weary years of suffering and abuse. Her person is owned and under the absolute control of a corrupt, licentious, drunken brute who can, to attain his own selfish ends, transform himself into an angel of light long enough to delude and entrap a young, innocent, unsuspecting, confiding girl into a life-long union. So, too, he can appropriate the fruit of her labor to himself without giving her any equivalent in return. He can debauch and outrage her person; he can force her to give birth to unwelcome children, the exact pattern of the father, to curse the world. The fruit of such marriages fill our alms houses with paupers, our penitentiaries with criminals, our lunatic asylums with maniacs, and other public institutions with idiots. Such marriages spread wickedness, misery, ruin, and death, everywhere throughout the world. And all this is brought about because men, in all ages, countries and climes, have refused to do justice to women. The laws of all the States in this Union protect men in just such transactions as I have named. They leave her, the wife and mother, an unprotected victim without any redress, because he owns her in law just as he does his dog. What is the use of owning anything if you cannot use it as you please, and not be obliged to give an account? When she dies there is no more notice, in law, taken of her death than there is of the horse or dog. After her death her husband may take her earnings and dispose of them, may give them to any one he pleases, may turn her children out of the home she died to earn, may lavish all the luxuries of wealth and ease on a stranger who never lifted a finger to earn it, and never will; while the first wife lies in a neglected grave, with no stone to mark the only resting place she ever knew, because the second wife needed the money the stone would cost to buy her a gold watch and chain.

MEANNESS.—Our experience in the publishing business has confirmed the opinion long entertained that a man's religion really makes little difference in his character. There are good and bad in all sects; and even among Spiritualists, who, it is claimed, should live in accordance with their highest ideas of true life, there are some who are ineffably mean. A number of this sort became subscribers to COMMON SENSE, and after taking it months, some nearly a year, ordered it stopped without offering to pay for it. Some of these persons are most loud in their professions of faith in the redeeming grace of our holy religion. Bah! Such people haven't souls worth saving.

THE PRESS AND SPIRITUALISM.—The first periodical news paper ever issued on the same basis as that now occupied by COMMON SENSE, was THE SPIRIT WORLD, by the writer, in Boston, March 1, 1850. It was continued two years, at a cost of two thousand dollars, and only given up, for the want of support. And, here is a problem for Spiritualists. How is it to be accounted for, that out of more than twenty-five news papers, started in this country for the defence of Spiritualism, all are dead, with two or three exceptions, and these are now struggling for the breath of life? And, I fully believe, Spiritualists, as a class, are "head and shoulders" above all other isms that have gone before. I am forced to the conclusion, that the number is comparatively small, who have explicit faith in the invisibles, only as it is a matter of personal concern. Otherwise, COMMON SENSE would, ere this, have been put upon a permanent basis. The broad, and generous liberality, with which the columns of this paper have been opened, gives a legitimate and wide claim upon the patronage of all classes.—La Roy Sunderland.

SOME SIGNIFICANT FACTS.

A correspondent of the Woman's Journal, writing from New York, gives an account of the first re-union of the graduates of the Normal College, of that city, an institution which grew out of the old Twelfth Street School. She says: "The high rank this school has attained is wholly owing to the life-long labors of one woman, Miss Lydia M. Wadleigh. Admirably fitted by nature for the position of teacher, herself a ripe scholar, her faithful devotion to her task gradually raised the establishment of which she was principal to a position higher than any of its sister institutions, and to her the young women of the city owe the creation of the Normal College, with Miss Wadleigh as principal. I only wish the prejudices of the day had not prevented her from being given the presidency for which she was admirably qualified." The writer adds:

This re-union, to which I was invited, was the first of a proposed series of gatherings of the graduates of the old Twelfth Street School, which are to be held once in five years. About two hundred of the former scholars assembled in answer to the summons. A very fine looking body of women, numbering among them ladies of wealth and social position, writers, teachers and physicians. The statistics of the School were read by the Secretary, Mrs. Vital, and disclosed some rather singular facts. From 1859 to 1870 there were 302 graduates, and at the end of fifteen years only 126 are married. In one class, that of 1865, out of twenty-three graduates only five secured husbands. What a commentary on the theory that girls need no other education than that which fits them for the duties of maternity! Less than one half married out of such a number of unusually intelligent and, I should say, judging from those whom I saw, unusually attractive women. Is it not quite time that society acknowledge the fact, that girls as well as boys should be brought up to self-reliance and self-support? The exercises consisted of singing and addresses. Miss Chisholm, one of the most distinguished teachers at the Normal College, read a very amusing essay, and Dr. Mary Putnam Jacoby, who was one of the earlier graduates, made an admirable speech, dwelling upon the importance of cultivating the individuality of every woman, declaring herself, I was glad to hear, favorable to the ballot, not as an end but as a means towards promoting this independence of thought and helping to a higher education.

Nothing is more common than to confound religion and theology, but they are quite distinct and entirely different. Theological systems grow, mature and die, while the religious feeling and religious faith which nurtures them and uses them remains the same. Each age has its peculiar theology, each nation its particular modification of the theology of the age, while religion is one, universal and eternal. When we come to understand this we lose all fear for religion or religious truth amid the wrecking of the theological systems of any age or nation. Theologically, all Christians are in a state of transition. The old theology is breaking up, is disintegrating, and the new is yet imperfect and has yet much growth to make before it can take the place of the old. And, naturally, those who confound religion and theology are filled with honest fears lest all our faith and hope and the very foundations of all religious life be destroyed. Of course these fears are groundless. The theology of a past age being in no way adapted to present needs, must pass away and a new growth takes its place. Let it go. We should neither hasten its departure nor mourn over its decay, nor vainly attempt to revive a lifeless body. And the old theology is essentially a lifeless body.—Rev. D. N. Utter.

Society's relation to its criminals should be the same as the relation of parent to child. The wise parent seeks to reform the vicious child—does not incarcerate it or kill it off, ordinarily. Society has been despoiled by the criminal and should demand reparation. The wife and children of the murderer, if he has them, and those whose protector his crime has removed, deserve, so far as it may be possible for him to give it, material support at his hands. Economically as well as morally considered, it is wrong for society to incarcerate or kill off its criminals. It should utilize them.—Rev. David Cronin.

WHITELAW REID ON WOMAN'S WORK.

It has been my good fortune for six or eight years, in this city, to be able to give employment to a number of women; and to pay for their work precisely what it seemed to be worth, without reference to the sex of the worker. That, after all, seems to be the true basis for any successful efforts you may make to help working-women. First of all—justice! After that, there will be far less need for charity; and what does prove to be wanted may generally take that better form of merely helping the needy to a way to help themselves. I know that this question of wages is not without its embarrassments, and that frequently where women claim even pay with men in the same work, they are claiming what they do not earn, and what employers can not give without loss. But this does not affect the general principle. When their work is clearly and in all respects equally valuable, it is entitled to equal reward. When you refuse that, you are undermining the very foundation for any honest effort by women to earn their own living. If they are to start fairly to support themselves, you must not begin by breaking down their self-respect, and outraging their sense of right. You do both, if you pay them less for the same work equally well done, for the sole reason that they are women and not men. To-day, through the whole range of woman's employments, but especially in the industries wherein they come in competition with men, there is a constant complaint that working-women rarely become much more than apprentices, that they do not learn their trades, that they are not generally good, trustworthy, efficient operatives, that they are not so attentive or industrious or persistent as working-men. How can they work with the spirit and zeal men show, if they are to be met on pay day by an unjust and intrinsically mean discrimination? How can they nerve themselves to the thorough mastery of the handicraft or art, when thoroughness brings no reward? I am urging no sentimental plea. It is not a question of chivalry, but of justice. I do not ask for fair pay for women because they are women but because they earn it. Wherever they do not earn, by all means refuse to give it. I only ask that, when they do earn as much as their brother-laborers, they shall be paid as much, and that they shall have from the outset the stimulus of knowing that equal work will always bring equal pay.—Whitelaw Reid at Woman's Industrial Meeting.

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT.

At a convention of ministers, lately held in Kansas, the following resolution was considered:

"Resolved, That in this movement we come under the banner of One whose name is the synonym of all that is wise and good, generous and kind, merciful and gracious; a name under which the highest human progress has been made; a name above every name, his enemies themselves being judges, and that in the Lord Jesus Christ we recognize the Governor of nations, to whom all power belongs."

Nearly all the members of the convention favored this resolution, but there was one sensible man who opposed it, the Rev. Mr. Green, of Fort Scott. He said:

"What we want is not amendments in the Constitution of the United States, but amendments in the hearts of the people. He thought one Christian man in Congress, who could not be corrupted, and whom Credit Mobilierites and Pacific Mail schemers would not dare to approach, would do more toward reforming the country and advancing the cause of Christianity, than forty thousand recognitions of God in the Constitution. At a time like this (said the speaker), when misery and want stare us in the face on every hand—when hundreds of fellow-citizens in our own State are perishing for want of the necessities of life, it seems to me that for Christian people to waste time and money in the agitation of such a cause as this, in the name of Christianity, is a supreme farce."

Notwithstanding this vigorous speech, the resolution was adopted. The grasshopper plague has been bad enough in Kansas, but the trouble these officious priests are assisting to bring about is much worse.

The Christian Register thinks that if society has any rights whatever it is entitled to demand the reticence of married persons concerning their ordinary incompatibilities and discords.

BURNS AND BEECHER.

There is a poem going the rounds of the press written by a Scotch woman, Mrs. Janet Webb, on the occasion of the Rev. H. W. Beecher being appointed to deliver an oration in New York, at the celebration of the Burns centennial, January 25, 1859, from which the following stanzas are extracted :

" His few, sma' faults ye needna tell ;
Folk say ye're nae oar guid yersel,
But dail may care ;
Gin ye're but half as guid as Bah,
We'll ask nae mair .
A century hence, wha can tell
What may befa' your cannie sel' ?
Some holy preacher
May tak' the cudgels up for aye
Oa'd Harry Beecher .

Had the faults of Henry Ward Beecher been marked by the open, bold and manly conduct of Burns, everybody would have been glad to extend the mantle of charity over him to its utmost extent. Listen to Burns when arraigned before the Sessions for a fault similar to that which placed the illustrious preacher on the "ragged edge," and subsequently on trial before the world's tribunal :

" King David o' poetic brief,
Wrought 'mang the lasses such mischief
As filled his after life wi' grief
An' bloody rants ;
An' yet he's ranked among the chieft
O lang syne saunts.
And maybe, Tam, for a' my cants,
My wicked rhymes, an' drunken rants,
I'll gie auld cloven Clootie's haunts
An' unco slip yet,
An' snugly sit among the saunts
At Davie's hip yet .
This leads me on to tell for sport,
How I did wi' the Session sort—
Auld Clinkum at the Juner port
Cry'd three times, 'Robin !
Come hither lad, an' answer for't,
Y're blamed for jobbin' .
Wi' pinch I put a Sunday's face on,
An' snooved awa before the Session—
I made an open, fair confession,
I scorned to lie ;
An' syne Meas John, beyond expression,
Fell foul o' me ."

But even over Beecher, and all connected with this foul expose, let us cast a mantle of charity, lest we be ranked with the "unco guid" of whom Burns says :

" O ye wha are sae guid yersel'.
Sae pious and sae holy,
Ye've naught to do but mark and tell
Your neebours' faults and folly .
Ye see your state in theirs compared,
And shudder at the niffer ;
But cast a moment's fair regard
What makes the might differ ?
Discount what scant occasion gave,
That purity ye pride in,
And (what's a' mair than a' the lave),
Your better art o' hiding .
Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman ;
Though they may gang a kennin' wrang ;
To step aside is human ;
One point must still be greatly dark,
The moving why they do it ;
And just as lamely can ye mark,
How far perhaps they rue it ."

—SATAN JR.

THE MONEYLESS MAN.

BY HENRY STANTON, MAYSVILLE, KY.

Is there no place on the face of earth
Where charity dwelleth, where virtue has birth ?
Where bosoms in kindness and mercy will heave,
And the poor and wretched shall ask and receive ?
Is there no place on earth where a knock from the poor
Will bring a kind angel to open the door ?
Ah! search the wide world wherever you can,
There is no open door for the moneyless man.

Go look in the hall where the chandelier light
Drives off with its splendor the darkness of night;
Where the rich hanging velvet, in shadowy fold,
Sweeps gracefully down, with its trimming of gold,
And mirrors of silver take up and renew
In long lighted vistas the 'wilderer view;
Go there in your patches, and find if you can
A welcoming smile for a moneyless man.

Go look in your church of the cloud-reaching spire,
Which gives back to the sun his same look of fire,
Where the arches and columns are gorgeous within,
And the walls seem as pure as a soul without sin;
Go down the long aisle—see the rich and the great,
In the pomp and the pride of their worldly estate.
Walk down, in your patches, and find, if you can,
Who opens a pew for a moneyless man.

Go to your Judges, in dark, flowing gown,
With the scales wherein law weigheth quietly down;
Where he frowns on the weak and smiles on the strong,
And punishes right while he justifies wrong;
Where jurors their lips on the Bible have laid,
To render a verdict they've already made;
Go there in the court room, and find if you can,
Any law for the case of a moneyless man.

Go look in the banks, where Mammon has told
His hundreds and thousands of silver and gold;
Where, safe from the hands of the starving and poor,
Ideas pile upon pile of the glittering ore;
Walk up to the counter—ah, there you may stay,
Till your limbs have grown old and your hair turns gray,
And you'll find at the bank not one of the clan
With money to lend to a moneyless man.

Then go to your hovel—no raven has fed
The wife who has suffered so long for her bread;
Kneel down by her pallet and kiss the death frost
From the lips of the angel your poverty lost—
Then turn in your agony upward to God,
And bless while it smites you, the chastening rod;
And you'll find at the end of your life's little span,
There's a welcome above for the moneyless man.

Signs of the Times.

Mrs. Harriet Fulton, of Macon, Georgia, was lately appointed librarian of that city, at a salary of $1400 per annum.

A Philadelphia judge recently refused to grant naturalization papers to a man solely because of the applicant's infidelity. What will these religious fanatics do next?

Beecher, on the witness stand, flatly contradicts the testimony of his former bosom friend, Moulton, the man who consoled him when he was on the "ragged edge."

Rev. J. R. Stillwell, late pastor of the Methodist Tabernacle Church, Logansport, Indiana, has "stepped down and out." His offence was committed during a revival.

Miss Mattie Strickland, daughter of Hon. Randolph Strickland, ex-member of Congress from Michigan, is delivering lectures in Iowa upon the Suffrage question.

The St. Louis Law Review says: "we are a Christian nation only in the sense that a majority of our people are nominally Christians." We are of all religions, and many who are called Christians are not so in fact.

The Chicago Advance wants a square fight with infidelity right away, and rejoices that "the developments are such as show that the choice to be made is not between evangelical Christianity and some mild dilution of a rationalistic or liberalistic character, but between the pure Gospel and bald infidelity."

The reports given by the daily papers of the proceedings of the Anniversary Celebration, last week, were better than usual, but still indicative of the fact that the press has little respect for people who so much pride themselves on their individuality that they cannot organize as a compact body.

Rev. Mr. Kallook, referring to the opposition of infidels, on Sunday last, said: "Unless we evangelize them, they will destroy us. Christians must unite. Protestants, instead of repelling the aid of Catholics, should enter the lists with them, and fight infidelity with desperation." He closed by asking believers to imitate those who cast their all in the treasury of the Lord.

Labor, which creates everything and does everything, and is the protector and preserver of all, is for itself unprotected and weak. It feeds others, it starves itself. It clothes others in purple and fine linen, while itself stands shivering in rags, asking alms at the doors of those whom it has made rich. Thus it must be to the end of time, unless it can learn of capital one lesson—and that is, that power lies in combinations.

Thomas Jefferson's grand-daughter is trying to find employment for herself and boy in Washington. The daughters of ex-Secretary of the Treasury Robert J. Walker, and those of Chief-Justice Taney, are doing copywriting as a means of livelihood, and there are the grand-children of ex-Presidents, generals, and hundreds of other distinguished men, pleading for labor at even the smallest remuneration, so that they may be able to live.

The Norfolk Gazette says the church property in Massachusetts exempt from taxation amounts to $32,417,650.

The Liberal League of San Jose, on Sunday last, passed a vote of thanks to the San Francisco Board of Education for its action concerning religious exercises in the public schools.

Rev. Mr. Warren, Baptist pastor at Burnt Hill, Saratoga county, N. Y., being proved the husband of three living and undivorced wives, has been compelled to resign his pastorate.

Timber is being buried in the Consolidated Virginia mine at the rate of 6,000,000 feet per annum, and in all the other mines in like proportion. The Comstock lode may well be said to be the tomb of the forests of the Sierras.

Workingmen, when united, have all power; divided, they are the servants of the money power, and the toilers of corporate wealth which is grabbing up all there is of the commonwealth and the country, and legislating constantly for unequal privileges.

Miss Lavinia Goodell, who has acquired a good practise at the bar in Janesville, Wis., says that had it not been for the support women have given her she should not have begun to pay expenses. Women were her first clients, and have been her best paying ones, and her most ardent and enthusiastic supporters thus far. She has just been appointed Notary Public for the state.

The Boston Commercial Bulletin gives the following as a fact. "Some time ago a Boston merchant subscribed five hundred dollars to a theological enterprise and paid two hundred dollars of the amount at the time. Recently, he forwarded the remaining three hundred. By return mail he received a letter of acknowledgment, and a request for nineteen dollars and some odd cents interest on the three hundred dollars from the date of the original subscription."

The orthodox people of England have published quotations from John Stuart Mill to prove that he was orthodox. He was too great a man for them to lose, and the book is made up of extracts from his essays detached from all their qualifying statements, the suppression of truth being plainly a suggestion of falsehood. No word is quoted to show that Mill regarded Jesus as grossly misrepresented in the religion bearing his name, or that he regarded the hope of immortality, however comfortable, as without proof.

A barber of Atlanta, Ga., publishes the following card: "My son, William Webster, called on Mr. Shelbert on yesterday for a shave, under the civil-rights bill, and he got refused. Thank God for it! I am still true to my country. I keep a barber-shop for white men—have shaved no negroes, and even under the civil-rights bill no negro can have his face scraped or his wool oiled in my shop. I am a colored man, but still I am a white man in principle, and I want my colored friends to know that, in their places, I am their friend, and that out of their places I am not their friend. I keep a white man's barber-shop, and, so help me God, will accommodate none but white men."

SAVED BY A DREAM.

BY MRS. H. W. BAKER.

CHAPTER II.—BILLY, THE BOSS OF THE NIGHT SHIFT.

Having now described my own and Bradleigh's position with regard to each other, I must introduce you to the true hero of this story, Billy, the boss of the night shift, and the girl whom he loved, and for whom he died; and who sailed to Europe two years ago, the happiest bride in all the west; and who, as I write, is triumphant over the new joy Heaven has sent her in her first born darling son. For so the world wears on. Life forever growing into death: death forever springing into life.

For a few days after I set up my boarding house, all the talk I heard at table was about "Billy," some highly recommended individual, who excelled everybody else as a practical man, and who had performed more deeds of heroism under ground than Ned Buntline could possibly crowd into one novel. In fact he only needed half the good qualities he was reputed to have, to make a very great man indeed. He was to superintend the night work. Day after day passed and he did not come, but still the talk went on—(it seemed that all the miners knew him, or had heard of him), until at last he grew into gigantic proportions in my imagination, and I became a little uneasy for fear this immense being would some day come and breathe against my little establishment, and whisk it off into space. He did come at last, and I beheld him through the open window as he sat on the porch, for the space of a half hour, and never dreamed he was any giant. He was probably twenty-two years old; scarcely five feet high, including his boot heels, which were certainly three inches long. He had a beautifully shaped head, and wavy, silken, pale brown hair, like a baby. His features were regular and handsome; his nose a little large, but then he could never have been the man Billy was, but for that nose. He had an eye as bold as a lion, as frank and bright as the sunshine. Glancing around the table that first meal, he mentally gauged every man present with absolute mathematical accuracy; and every man knew it, and knew, too, that Billy was his master. It is the common impulse of humanity to doff the cap to mental and moral superiority; and no one could look upon Billy without an instantaneous thrill of pleasure arising from the conviction that he was every inch a man. Between our feelings for him, and those we entertained for Bradleigh, was this difference: we rendered to Billy spontaneously that which Bradleigh would have enforced by the strength of his will, but which his qualities could never command. Billy was quite ignorant of books; could read and write with difficulty. He was born in a coal mine in England, and of all the men I ever knew he murdered His Majesty's English most shockingly. Positively it was hard to understand what he said until we became familiar with his style. He used oaths abundantly, not dreaming they could shock anybody, and would have set that person down as an ignoramus who claimed to be shocked by them.

Bradleigh was one of those men who never appreciate what they have until they lose it. He therefore treated Billy with his usual bull-headed obstinacy, and it was plain to see that there would be a split in camp before a great while, when there appeared upon the scene a small pacificator, represented figuratively as an exceedingly young man, scantily clad in a pair of wings much too small for his weight, with a bow and arrows of doubtful ability, who put it into Billy's heart to bear all manner of insult rather than leave the place. Billy had fallen in love with my little beauty—my charming, innocent, splendid Clem. She was "my one ewe lamb," "sole daughter of my house and heart." From her I had learned the supreme bliss of womanhood. She had been a perpetual joy to me for sixteen years. All my hopes of a daughter were realized in her. I could fill pages with raptures about my girl; but the land is full of women and men who know all I could possibly say, and more too.

"We are thick-sighted mortals." I regarded it as a good joke that Clem had won that warm, impetuous heart. I did not dream of trouble, nor did it enter into my thoughts that Billy might suffer from Clem's repulsion, when it came, as it surely would come. Indeed I did not consider Billy in the matter at all, except to determine that he must not annoy the girl. I forgot that he was somebody's darling, too, and needed consideration as much as my darling.

One day Clem said to him, "Don't swear so, Billy; somehow it makes me feel hard toward you when you swear;" and Billy swore no more, except now and then by accident, when he would go back carefully over the sentence and leave the oath out. He sang songs all about mining and miners, and their underground work; and his voice was so rich and musical Clem listened to him with rapt attention. She hears the Italian and French operas now, and would not appreciate Billy's singing even if she could hear it, which she never will until the first volume of life is closed, and the second one opened; and who knows but she may listen to him then with a warmer interest than she ever did before. There are some souls that shoot upward like rockets when they have slipped the crusted shell of ignorance, and doubt, and perplexity by which they are so bound down in this world. They belong, by right of celestial powers, not recognized here, to that ethereal sphere where the purest spirits dwell. I think that Billy was such, and pray that he may prove a beacon to my girl, to draw her wandering footsteps upward.

One Sunday he asked her to go out riding with him. I considered it an impertinence, and so did she; and doubtless the poor boy felt it as such before he got through with it. He was in his room a long time afterwards, and came down with a great heat in his face, his silken, baby hair all moist and shining, and his eyes flushed and turned away from us. He told some of the boys he had the headache, and indeed I do not doubt it, and the heartache, too. Then for several weeks he was shy and timid in Clem's presence, and seemed to be undergoing some terrible crisis of feeling. I think he resolved to conquer his love; but of what avail are such resolutions? Love is the mightiest potentate on earth, and the fewer crumbs of comfort he receives the stronger he grows. Clem, out of the depths of her tender little heart, pitied him, and would have been glad to comfort him. For my part I looked upon him as a spoiled child crying for the moon, and was more angry than sympathetic.

Billy had resolved to leave more than a dozen times, but could not. Like the moth, he must still flutter near the flame that was consuming him; when, one evening, actuated I suppose by some strange perversity, or really clinging to some shred of hope, which rarely quite deserts these poor longing hearts of ours, he sought an opportunity and told her all about it. She was down in the meadow lot, under the great willows that hung above the spring, and above that nameless grave that nobody seems to know anything about—except that it is a grave with a little picket fence around it; and there Billy found her, and trembling with apprehension, yet emboldened by despair, he told his love. When Clem came home the trace of tears was on her face, and a tremulousness in her pretty hands that indicated a deeper emotion than ordinary. In the evening when we were alone in our room, I asked her about it.

"O Mamma," she said, "there never was anything so pitiful. He knelt to me as I stood by the grave, and clasped my dress with his hands, looking up at me with a face that might have been frozen, it was so cold and stiff and dead. I said, 'O Billy, don't look like that, you scare me.' Then he made an effort that was almost convulsive, and spoke my name. Then I said, 'Billy, I know you love me, and suffer every hour because of me; try and not do it, won't you?' And again he spoke just one word, 'Clem.' And I said, 'Billy, what can I do to make you less unhappy?' And I began to cry. Then he got up on his feet, and seemed frightened, and half crazy, because I was crying; and he prayed me not to cry any more. He said he knew he was not fit for anything, unless it was to die for me, and he did not think he would ever be needed in that capacity. 'You see, Clem,' he said, 'I was such a fool that I did not know the difference between us at first, and after that it was too late. Why, Clem, you have changed everything in life for me. Before I saw you I had my hopes and plans like any other fellow, but now they are all worthless. You are my world, Clem, my universe, my God. I can't tell why everybody on earth don't fall down at your feet and worship you. Why, do you know, I used to think I was as good as the best of 'em. I didn't know anybody but miners, and they all looked up to me, somehow. I suppose it was because I wasn't afraid of anything, and got the reputation for being brave and smart; and all the bosses I ever worked for went by my judgment, except Bradleigh, and he hasn't sense enough to know a man of practical ideas when he sees him. If you'll just consider the matter, Clem, you'll see it wasn't any wonder that I didn't know the difference between us at first, and you won't think hard of me for loving you so.' And then, mamma, he put his arms up over his head and leaned his forehead against the sharp pickets of the grave; and somehow he reminded me of a baby that had cried itself nearly to death to be taken up by its cruel mother, and then had crawled away in despair, and laid its little cheek and sobbing lips upon the floor in a kind of desperate repose. And O, I can't tell you how sorry I was, nor how much I cried. 'It ain't the difference between us, Billy,' I said; 'it is worse than that; it is because I don't love you. There are lots of girls that will love you, Billy, and some day you will be just as happy as can be, and have the sweetest wife in the world.' And then, mamma, he raised his face and looked at me, and I almost screamed, for the cruel pickets had torn his white forehead, and the blood was coming. I took my handkerchief and wiped it off, and he smiled—yes, he did—a bright, happy smile, and said, 'Why, Clem, if you care so much for a trifle like that, what would you feel if you saw me dead, in attempting to render you some service, just such as a faithful dog would render its master?' And so he talked to me, mamma. If I had been a queen, and he my slave, it would hardly have been different. He asked me if I had ever loved anybody, or if I comprehended the way he felt toward me; and I told him yes, that I was in love with a boy once, and that he loved another girl; and mamma, it was so strange to see his wonder, and his pity; and he could not understand at all how the boy could love another girl better than me. He said he had a poor opinion of him and his taste; and he asked me how I had lived through it. You know how expressive his eyes are; well, I never saw eyes so full of pity. I told him I did not care anything about it now; in fact, that I was glad of it. And then he said, 'O Clem, Clem, your time hasn't come yet,' and he walked away to the spring and sat down on a log, and I came home. But all the way to the house I felt as if I were coming back from a funeral, and as if I had left Billy's dead body there in a grave under the willows, close by that other grave."

[Conclusion next week.]

PULPIT SCIENCE.

Nothing leads thinking young men of scientific tendencies to neglect church-going more than wrong-headed and illogical deductions from science by their pastors. They hear the doctrines of Darwin condemned by men who have not carefully read the many treatises for and against evolution, and who have not sound conceptions of the true grounds of the learned authors. The writer once heard a divine vigorously controvert the doctrines of Darwin, and exhaust his resources of invective upon the unfortunate believers in the evolution theories of the present, much to the edification of the regular church-goers, who, for the most part, had never read the books which were criticised, but had a general idea that Darwinism, socialism, and communism, were equally pernicious to the welfare of society. The occupant of the pulpit, upon seeing that he swept his audience with him, elevated himself to his full height and exclaimed, "If they believe that man descended from an ape, let them take a monkey from the Zoological Gardens, and, by a process of natural selection and cultivation, make a man of him. Surely this not unreasonable to ask?"—PROF. TROWBRIDGE, in Popular Science Monthly for April.

The subject of Mrs. Drake's lecture on Sunday evening last was "Spiritualism versus Christianity." The discourse was mainly historical. After referring to the wars that were waged in the effort to establish the Christian religion, the atrocious crimes perpetrated in its name; the debasing effect of Catholicism on the common people, while affording homes for herds of monks and priests in idleness, she came down to our own time, and asserted that Protestantism is as much to be feared as Catholicism. It has murdered men and women in our own country; has persecuted Quakers, burned witches, and has endeavored to fasten bonds on the opinions of the people. Everywhere where it has had power it has used it in curtailing human liberty. She then inquired as to the good accomplished by Spiritualism. It has demonstrated immortality, giving knowledge in place of faith. It has taken away the terrors of death, and has brought solace to many a bereaved heart. Mrs. Drake is to speak again in the same hall, 211 Market street, Sunday evening, April 11th.

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT.

At a convention of ministers, lately held in Kansas, the following resolution was considered:

"Resolved, That in this movement we come under the banner of One whose name is the synonym of all that is wise and good, generous and kind, merciful and gracious; a name under which the highest human progress has been made; a name above every name, his enemies themselves being judges, and that in the Lord Jesus Christ we recognize the Governor of nations, to whom all power belongs."

Nearly all the members of the convention favored this resolution, but there was one sensible man who opposed it, the Rev. Mr. Green, of Fort Scott. He said:

"What we want is not amendments in the Constitution of the United States, but amendments in the hearts of the people. He thought one Christian man in Congress, who could not be corrupted, and whom Credit Mobilierites and Pacific Mail schemers would not dare to approach, would do more toward reforming the country and advancing the cause of Christianity, than forty thousand recognitions of God in the Constitution. At a time like this (said the speaker), when misery and want stare us in the face on every hand—when hundreds of fellow-citizens in our own State are perishing for want of the necessities of life, it seems to me that for Christian people to waste time and money in the agitation of such a cause as this, in the name of Christianity, is a supreme farce."

Notwithstanding this vigorous speech, the resolution was adopted. The grasshopper plague has been bad enough in Kansas, but the trouble these officious priests are assisting to bring about is much worse.

SUNDAY SOCIABILITY FOR WORKING PEOPLE.

BY A. GAYLORD SPALDING.

Social intercourse is a mighty educator. Its importance and extent of influence can scarcely be measured. But in all families, schools, granges, lodges and clubs, as well as business and pleasure groups, association exerts a power far greater than books or preaching, to develop, refine and perfect both children and persons of all ages. Hence the advantage of village and city life over the country in this respect.

My present purpose is to apply this idea to the needs of workmen and country people—the Granges and Industrial Lodges—and demand that Sunday shall be used more freely for calls and visits among neighbors, for general sociability, and for moral and intellectual improvement. During the six working days of the week the people have little spare time; therefore, Sunday is their only chance. Shall the stiff rules of sectarian discipline bear like a night pall, to keep them sober-faced and secluded? Reason answers, in thunder tone—No! And the mental and moral interests of society require a change. We pattern too much after old Puritan blue-law Sundayism. Common sense will help us a good deal (that is, if we have any.) I invite you then, my dear heroic working friends, to venture over the dull line of rusty habit, in this most essential matter; and don't be afraid to step out of the deep, dreary ruts of time-worn custom. Rebel against old Mother Grundy.

Our regular Sunday church meetings afford little opportunity for unrestrained sociability, beyond the mere coming together, and a slight salutation. No interchange of thought is convenient or expected; for all must be very orderly and decorous, and pay the most respectful attention and deference to the minister, who is hired to do the thinking. The exercises, moreover, are largely made up of pietistic observances and formula, which serve only as mere pleasant fancy trimmings and pastime; while the intellectual part is everywhere monopolized by a class of non-producing professional paid leaders. It is a crushing system of brain monopoly, which leaves the masses of common people—farmers, mechanics and laborers—entirely out in the cold and barren waste of ignorance and moral stupor.

Thus the atmosphere of the "day of rest" is rendered so very dry, dead, stupid, and sleepy, that it chokes the breath and dwarfs the mind; and instead of being a profitable time to the general community, it is simply a rich harvest season to the salaried priesthood, at the workingman's expense.

This, my good brothers and sisters, is your Sunday—so awfully holy you must step with a cautious tread, as though you were walking on hens' eggs! But I assure you it is a damaging superstition, and a chain on the working class that holds them in servile bondage to the religious and political professional aristocracy. Let it be broken in every link. Cut the leading strings of aristocracy, that toiling humanity may be set free.

Sunday is made the key of days in the week, in clerical hands, that governs all time, and works for their particular pocket interest. But let us be fooled no longer. Don't it thunder and lighten on Sunday—the holy Sabbath? Don't the winds blow, and the hurricanes, and tornadoes, and floods play around, and the sun shine, and the rain and snow fall, and the volcanoes erupt and vomit, and the lions roar, and the anacondas coil and squeeze, and the lambs skip about, and the birds sing, and the pigs squeal, and the hens lay and cackle, and the roosters crow, and the horses run away, and kick and smash things up—all on Sunday? To be sure they do, and the Most High God Almighty utters not one word of rebuke, nor even frowns on such wicked actions.

But the well fed, well clothed, sleek and amiable leaders can afford to allow old customs to remain undisturbed, for thereby they hold on to their regular easy living. The working class, however, are waking up to the idea of THINKING FOR THEMSELVES. That we must learn to do. It is a question for the Grangers, Sovereigns and workers. Sunday must be made the Patrons' Day, instead of a minister's or priest's day, and a benefit to the plain producers, and not the aristocracy. It is a New Departure, that should be bravely urged on the people everywhere.

THE HUMAN WILL.

BY LA BOY SUNDERLAND.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN THE READER AND THE AUTHOR OF PATHETISM.

Reader.—Having heard of your experience in revival and mesmeric phenomena, I would like, if you please, to ascertain more fully, if possible, what the theory or science of Pathetism is in respect to the human will. I notice that in Webster's dictionary (large quarto) it is said that Pathetism is another term for Mesmerism.

Author.—These terms are by no means synonymous as to the philosophy, while they may include the same phenomena. And I am opposed to the use of any man's name when designating what is common to human nature.

R.—Truly. And it has long seemed to me that a good deal of misconception has prevailed in respect to the human will; and I notice that mediums, when speaking of "revival" phenomena, represent them as resulting from the preacher's mere "will."

A.—Yes. And the preacher says these phenomena are produced by "the will of God," as if the INFINITE could be supposed to have a will; that is, a mere choice in respect to anything! The will is not an executive force, outside of the body in which this force is exercised. The will of the operator at one end of the telegraph produces no communication at the other end, without the electrical apparatus.

R.—I see that is so. Ideas are evolved in each mind by signs; they are not communicated as distinct ideas, out of one mind into another.

A.—Were this so all in an audience would get the self-same idea from each speaker, which is never the case, we know.

R.—And how in respect to the miracles of Jesus, said to have been wrought by his "will."

A.—Those miracles of healing were induced by faith, which is a power sufficient in each case, supposing they may have occurred as represented.

R.—And what is meant by the Christian term of "saving faith?"

A.—It is the self-created "evidence of things unseen"—Heb. 11:1—the power that the mind, when "warmed up," assumes over its own nervous system; and results, as Pathetism explains, in self-induction of revival phenomena.

R.—And this is the reason why all phenomena, such as occur in revivals and mesmerism, are said to be artificial, to distinguish them from another class, of which spontaneous somnambulism is the type.

A.—Jesus himself declares that without "faith" he was powerless and could do nothing. Math. 13:58. He was manifestly ignorant of psychology. Hence, he told Peter that the ideas he had uttered were not evolved from Peter's own brain. Math. 16:17.

R.—And is it your opinion that all the "revivals" of Jesus involved precisely the very same conditions upon which mesmeric influence occur?

A.—Without a doubt. For twenty years of my life I was engaged in getting up Methodist revivals; and since 1836 I have had, I may say, an unbounded experience in mesmeric phenomena; and I am sure that the psychological conditions and laws are the same in both classes of phenomena. No matter what may be supposed the remote or suggestive cause, whether "God," the "devil," "Jesus," or a "powerful mesmeriser," the immediate cause is the temperament, the faith of the one in whom the miracle is said to have been wrought.

"SCIENCE HAS MURDERED GOD."

So says Mr. Fisher, in the Overland Monthly. What dense prejudice it must be that fears to follow where truth leads. That science has murdered the great "What is it" of sectarianism, that triune absurdity and nondescript impossibility, the Christian God, is indeed true; but it has murdered him only to reveal the true God. Materialism is the hobby of ignorant minds; but that it should be the hobgoblin of one so gifted by nature, and so refined by education as Mr. Fisher, is puzzling indeed. Tyndall has waded through materialism, and out of materialism has brought the living God. By the atomic theory alone can we substantiate the existence of the human soul, and beyond that, of God. Now see! Every thought involves some commotion in the particles of the brain, by which a shower of atoms is thrown off in an invisible vapor. These atoms group themselves together in a certain form, as they leave the brain, and become the newly fledged thought. This thought need not be uttered or translated by the tongue in order to fix its existence; it is of itself a perfect thing, orbiting about the one that gave it birth, forming, in connection with other thoughts, that fine magnetic aura that surrounds him, and to which some delicately organized persons are so sensitive that they know what manner of man he is as soon as they enter his presence.

In the grouping of atoms we pass through the coarser to the finer, until we come to that fluid I have described as pure thought or pure soul, and behind which analysis cannot go. Every atom in the universe has special properties, of which we know little, except the attribute of motion—the power of arranging themselves in groups, according to their affinities. In the chemical scale we find each division, or group, positively electric to that group below it, and negatively electric to that above it. For instance: Water, which is one great atomic group, dissolves wood, iron, salt, etc.; air dissolves water; electricity dissolves air, and magnetism electricity. Now, assuming that thought is magnetism, or possibly some finer fluid for which we have no name, but nevertheless a fluid generated by the brain and thrown off in clouds, do we not all know that it is positively electric to all known substance; that it passes through, permeates or dissolves them all? Still thought is not God, though in the organized combination of its detached parts as the brain has thrown off, it may be, and probably is, the soul of every man and woman; still it is not God, but only one of his creations. It is an organization of atoms, born of coarser atoms, the aggregation of affinities we know nothing of; for behind all this, behind even the rarest atomic fluid we can conceive, lies the law of their government. And that law, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, is God, the pure essence, the universal life principle, whom to know would be to be coeval and coexistent with, from the beginning. And the only approach we can make to him must be through the earnest study of the sciences. No doubt we shall have ages upon ages allowed us for this study. Only see what advancement we have already made! A few short years ago the sixty primary substances known to science became organized in the tiny soul germ of a man. He was born into the world a little animal, with all the selfish instincts in the ascendancy. Soon he learned his own rights and the rights of others, and the idea of justice, and the craving for truth took possession of him. See him now! Myriads of wonderful thoughts born of his investigations of science have taken their appropriate shape, and orb about him; hopes and dreams, and tender, beautiful longings; generous wishes—the air castles of his bright reveries—all these have flown from his brain to build his soul life, each one an imperishable atom in that immortal structure. If we were spirits, and could see this, it would bear little resemblance to the man we see with our natural eyes. And yet at death the man will feel himself at home, and recognize all these forgotten thoughts as his own, and it as his very self. In cases of persons who have been resuscitated when almost drowned, they tell us that at the last gasp they caught glimpses of every act and thought of their lives. The explanation is clear: They had for one moment stepped beyond the portals of mortality into the outskirts of that life we call the soul life; and though they obtained but one glance, they recognized their surroundings, and felt that they had come home to themselves.

No man can find God who has not first found his own soul. I mean the physical soul; not that vague, disembodied non-entity many imagine a soul to be; nor that resurrected body which the Christian God has the power to raise indestructibly, but the true atomic soul made manifest by scientific research, and next to which, over all and through all is God, the universal law.

"SAVING FAITH."—This is such an intensification of credulity as creates "the evidence of the unseen (Heb. 11:1), or the unknown and unknowable, and upon which the mind implicitly relies. This faith is a trust that culminates in action, mental and nervous. It is a power in certain temperaments which induces the trance, and converts the sinner in revivals; and in certain cases it is sufficient to interfere with the vital forces, so as to cause the instant death of its victim, as in the case of the prisoner who was killed by being made to believe he was actually bleeding to death. And also in the two cases referred to in Acts 5:5. If that account be true, Ananias and his wife were killed by their faith as certainly as that any one is saved by it.—La Roy Sunderland.

WOMAN'S DRESS.—Take a man and pin three or four large table cloths about him, fastened back with elastic, and looped up with ribbons; drag all his own hair to the middle of his head and tie it tight, and hair-pin on about five pounds of other hair and a big bow of ribbon. Keep the front locks on pins all night, and let them tickle his eyes all day; pinch his waist into a corset, and give him gloves a size too small, and shoes ditto, and a hat that will not stay on without a torturing elastic, and a frill to tickle his chin, and a little lace veil to blind his eyes whenever he goes out to walk, and he will know what woman's dress is.—Mary Kyle Davis.

A California inventor, Mr. Brooks, has devised a mode of distilling at a temperature so low that the fusil oil is not vaporized, but remains in the wort, to be thrown away, while the ether is evolved before the alcohol begins to vaporize, and that is also eliminated.

FREE THINKERS' COMMITTEE.

The members of the "Committee of Forty," chosen at the late Convention, to devise a plan for the permanent organization of the Freethinkers of California, are respectfully invited to attend a preliminary meeting of the Committee to be held at Charter Oak Hall, Thursday evening, April 8th, at 7 o'clock.

JAS. BATTERSBY, President.

SOCIABLE AND DANCE in honor of J. L. York, at Charter Oak Hall, Thursday evening, April 8th.

REV. MR. REXFORD, on Sunday evening last, gave an instructive discourse on evangelical preaching, which we regret has not been noticed by the daily press. We have only space to say that it was thoughtful, sensible, and withal charitable. He gave Mr. Hammond and others credit for honesty when they preach the danger of depending on morality as means of salvation. Hammond puts pickpockets, infidels and thieves in the same class, without apparent consciousness that they do not belong together. He thinks the moral man in more danger and more dangerous to others as an example than the vile wretch who makes no claim to any of the virtues. Christ never laid down Mr. Hammond's plan of salvation. He taught morality, justice, mercy, charity, in short all the virtues of humanity. He said nothing about the saving power of his blood, nothing on which the "Scheme of Salvation" could be based. The evangelical plan is a sort of insurance business, a plan to secure us against fire in the next world. Real Christianity is that which aims to make us live better lives here. We have duties we owe to ourselves and to our fellow men. God does not need our service, but man does, and the most acceptable way to serve God is to help man. This brief notice gives but a meagre idea of the discourse.

HOUSEKEEPERS' ACCOUNTS.—Ladies who wish to keep account of household expenses with the least possible trouble should procure "Doxey's Housekeeping Book," published by Bancroft. It contains about 100 pages of blanks, to assist in keeping run of expenses. The cost of articles purchased during the day are to be entered each night in the columns provided—opposite the name of the articles, which are printed on the margin. The book contains a laundry account which is worth the price of the volume.

FREE THOUGHT REVIVAL.

A series of meetings have been held in Dashaway Hall during the past week, engineered by J. L. York, and they have proved a great success. One of the most rousing speeches ever made by Mr. York in this city, was given on Sunday afternoon, before a crowded audience. It was thoughtful, logical and full of spirit. On Monday evening excellent addresses were made by Mrs. Kendrick and Dean Clarke, the former in favor of concert of action, and the latter an argument on the Plan of Salvation, showing its absurdities. Poems were read by Mrs. Butler, Mrs. Logan and Dr. Swain, and the entertainment closed with one of Prof. Chaney's characteristic speeches, instructive, lively and full of fun.

On Tuesday evening there was another overflowing house. Dr. Joseph Swain gave the opening speech, a philosophical essay on man, his origin, his relations to his fellow men, the fictions that grew out of the ignorance and inexperience of men in the childhood of the world. Many of these fictions have come down to our own time, and we are now struggling to rid ourselves of them, it being evident that they have the effect of retarding human progress. The address was attentively listened to. B. F. French then gave in a very entertaining manner some chapters from his religious experience. He was followed by Mrs. Hanks and Prof. Chaney, with a few closing words from Mr. York. The meeting was a success.

A WORD ABOUT CIRCLES.—On Wednesday evening last, as a fitting finale to our somewhat unsatisfactory celebration of the advent of modern Spiritualism, a mediums' seance was held. A dozen or more mediums were induced, very unwillingly, to go on the platform. Some were strangers, and very few were friends. The circle had none of the elements of harmony, and it was formed in defiance of the laws which govern spirit manifestations. Any one of the mediums, going alone, or surrounded by congenial friends, might have given the audience something; but as it was, it was a failure, and it is to be hoped that it will be the last attempt of the kind that will be made in public. What our mediums want most of all is careful study of the laws of control, and then a disposition to obey the law. If each of them, with a few chosen friends, would hold a circle one evening a week, not for money, not for the gratification of idle curiosity, not even for the more laudable purpose of holding intercourse with departed friends, but solely for investigation into the phenomena, reading meantime the best writings on mediumship, magnetism, clairvoyance, etc., they would learn more in three months than the most of them do in three years of the ordinary, hap-lazard methods adopted in most of our circles.

SPIRITUALISM AND CHRISTIANITY.—Christianity would have been self-annihilated ere this day, if it had ever had a moiety of the internal discords and self-inflicted injuries to contend with that have borne hard on Spiritualism. While Christianity has nothing but tradition and the dead past upon which to lean, Spiritualism has the living miracle of to-day, which renders this movement a live one, and it deserves well of humanity for what it has already done in freeing the human mind from the tyranny of Sectarianism.—La Roy Sunderland.

SPIRIT OF THE CELEBRATION.

We give on page 565 of this issue the official report of the Spiritualists' and Freethinkers' Conventions, held in this city last week. The time devoted to preparation was by far too short; consequently there was not the clear understanding between committees and speakers there should have been. Good music was provided, the hall was handsomely decorated, the weather was delightful, and there was nothing to prevent a good celebration but want of time for the arrangements.

The first speaker was J. L. York, called unexpectedly to fill the place assigned as a position of honor to C. Fannie Allyn. Brother York spoke of Spiritualism as the child of Science. To him it is one of the mysteries of nature to be investigated, in the hope that the more we know of it the higher it will lead us in a knowledge of natural law. Spiritualism is just what we make of it; to some a scientific study, to others a mere curiosity, to others a religion, and to a few it is a means of making money. He counseled harmony—a sinking of all personal feeling and a union for the good of the cause.

C. Fannie Allyn said Spiritualism covers more ground than the mere fact that spirits communicate with us. If it embraced no more than this, it would have remained in the Protestant church, where it was welcomed on its first arrival. Church members soon learned that the ideas received from spirit source did not harmonize with those taught in the churches, and they cast it out, and declared it to be of the devil. It became unpopular with the creeds, not because it purported to be of spiritual origin, but because it was iconoclastic. If it had sustained the creed of the church it would have been a power in the church; but it was broader than the church, and therefore could not be admitted. It was only when it was discovered that Spiritualism tore down their idols that the church repudiated it, and it became a distinct power itself. If it had said Yes, it would have been in the churches to-day; but it said No, and it was cast out.

The afternoon session was opened by Dr. Wm. R. Joscelyn, who gave an inspirational address which we unfortunately did not hear. Dr. Dean Clarke followed in a glowing speech, laudatory of Spiritualism and its results. He seemed to think there are many even among Spiritualists who do not comprehend its full meaning. He sees in modern Spiritualism, he said, the lever that is not only to overturn absurd beliefs, but is to replace old dogmas by common sense ideas. Spiritualism is intimately connected with the progress of mankind, and has already accomplished much toward the elevation of woman, which is the first step toward the regeneration of man. He welcomed the movement inaugurated by the Evangelical Alliance as an aid in the great work of reform which is finally to free the people from the shackles of church despotism. Let them put God in the Constitution, and commit acts of aggression on liberty of speech and of opinion, and the result would be to arouse the people. Jeff Davis was just as necessary an agent for the freeing of this country from African slavery as was Abraham Lincoln; and Brother Hammond, though he does not know it, is an instrument for the accomplishment of ultimate good. A brief inspirational address was made by Mrs E. H. F. McKinley, appropriate to the occasion, in which she mentioned the names of Dr. Payne, Rufus Elmer and others who used to meet with us, and who are still present, though we see them not.

Mrs. Dr. Joscelyn read a short poem, "Search for the Truth," and Mrs. Cummings gave a spirit message, encouraging all to continued effort for good.

Walter Hyde followed with a poem, recited in good style, and containing many excellent sentiments.

Dr. J. Swain, being called for, said Spiritualism fills the most important place any religion could fill, yet it does not answer for all mankind. All religions are ephemeral; each is fitted for those who embrace it; and each does its appointed work; the religion of every age and of every people is in harmony with the age and the people; it is the best the people are capable of appreciating. Spiritualism marks the highest development of the human species; it was never before possible to have a religion so free and so tolerant of other religions as Spiritualism is. The phenomena of Spiritualism is not new, but its reception in these days is indicative of the advancement of the race in charitableness and intelligence. Spiritualism is not a finality. It is merely a help to something better. Religion is a necessity, and the higher in the scale of humanity one is, the higher is his religion. Brother Hammond is a great big baby, and because he is a baby he comes into rapport with babies, and draws that class after him. Mr. Swain closed with a few remarks concerning the God in the Constitution party. Their movements, he said, will force Liberals to combine in self-defence. When the people begin to feel the bonds they will rebel. Suffering is a divine messenger to the human race.

J. H. Butler made a few remarks, in which he claimed Spiritualism as a finality, and spoke of the want of harmony, advising co-operation among Spiritualists. He said the reason Sunday evening meetings are not better attended is that about thirty mediums in various parts of the city give seances on that evening, attracting hundreds that would otherwise attend.

Pat J. Healy said the reason why Spiritualists do not fill the halls is that they are on an average about as intelligent as those who lecture to them; and they consequently prefer to enjoy themselves in circles. He continued to say that there is a great religious struggle going on, not only in this country, but in Europe; there is danger ahead, and it behooves us to unite. There is no finality, he said, in Spiritualism, or in any other ism. Every man makes his own God, and every man must be his own priest.

Mr. Watson and Mr. Hardcastle made brief speeches, and after music the Convention adjourned.

In the evening Mr. Irwin gave a fine poem, and W. H. Chaney followed in an address in which he reviewed the progress of Spiritualism during the 27 years of its existence, showing that it has paved the way for Free Thought.

Mrs. L. E. Drake said that she, like Mr. Chaney, had been converted to Spiritualism from atheism. She spoke of the effect Spiritualism has had on the doctrines of the church. It has killed the devil, wiped out hell, and made the Redeemer of no use, for we feel that we can save ourselves. There is no use either for a personal God. We see all that is necessary in Nature. She is the loving mother of us all, and if we obey her laws we shall do well, and be well, here and hereafter.

The speeches were followed by a seance, which was not satisfactory, although several good tests were given.

In this report we have necessarily omitted a great deal, and in that we have given, have selected only the more thoughtful portions. Our readers, when informed of this, will be able to judge for themselves whether or not the celebration was a "grand success." In our opinion it was not. There was too much rhapsodical glorification, and too few practical ideas. We trust no one will take offence at this plain truth. We say it with regret, and hope that Spiritualists, instead of being angry with us for telling the truth, will endeavor to improve on such performances in the future. The music of the day was the one redeeming feature.

THE SECOND DAY.

It was designed to devote the second day mainly to the consideration of Free Thought ideas, naturally akin to Spiritualism, and to discuss practical measures of reform. Mr. J. L. York was to be the first speaker, but the people were late in filling the hall, and by request, the Secretary presented a series of resolutions which had been prepared for the formation of a permanent organization. [See official report, page 565.] While the audience were gathering, W. N. Slocum, editor of COMMON SENSE, made some observations which are published in full, because they seemed to be misunderstood by some friends, and we think it best in such cases to let our readers know just what was said. The remarks were in writing, as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT:—Thanks to our good brother York, who struck the key note for us yesterday, we had more practical, common sense talk, and less high sounding, meaningless phrases than one usually hears on such occasions. Yet we could not get along without saying something concerning the glories of spiritualism—what a grand thing it is, etc.—and in the outpouring of fine phrases we caught such words as "angel world," "summer land," "higher planes," "progressive tendencies," etc. Now all this is very well; if any one can draw comfort from it, I will be the last to object; but it does seem to me that it is time for us to lay aside pretty talk, and try to do something practical. I ask you, What have Spiritualists accomplished during the quarter of a century of their existence as believers in the new philosophy? Haven't we all that time been tearing down the broken pillars of our old Faith, without erecting new ones in their stead? Haven't we denounced creeds, derided the churches, torn to pieces old theology, and builded nothing in their place? What have we to show for our 27 years of effort? We have established the Children's Lyceum, and that's all we have done, thanks to Andrew Jackson Davis, and his noble wife.

Not a Spiritual society, in all this broad land, so far as I know, own one foot of real estate; nor have any of them a hall in which to hold their jubilee on this 27th anniversary.

We talk of the wonderful spread of Spiritualism—of its millions of adherents—of its extensive literature, and boast that "it has brought life and immortality to light." True, it has spread, and is still spreading—for the hearts of mankind welcome it as the only hope of a future life. It came to us when faith was dead; when the revelations of science had knocked the foundation from under the writings we held sacred; when life began to seem to us like a troubled dream, that there is nothing in it worth the having. We perceived the absurdities of old beliefs, and the shortcomings of new speculations. Without satisfaction in the present, or hope in the future, we could only strive to be resigned to the inevitable. A moral incubus rested upon the people, and the most exalted minds of our country and the world were asking, "What is all this worth?"

Then the raps came, and they brought conviction of a life beyond; they proved that we have something to live for; they gave new life, inspired to higher action, and taught us that life has a purpose, and can be put to noble uses. They fell on the ear like music, and for the moment awakened us to new life. But like music long continued, we were at last lulled to repose. Secure now in a knowledge that is more than faith, we are content to let the world wag as it will; and, though we live in the midst of misery—prison houses and hospitals on every hand, poverty pleading for our aid, the poor and degraded waiting to be lifted up, our best speakers and wisest teachers struggling for the barest necessities of life—we have nothing to give but pretty words, and nothing to do but to boast of our progress.

In the experience of individuals there are certain points, pivots, as it were, on which they seem to turn towards a higher or a lower life. I feel that the cause of Spiritualism has reached its pivotal point, and that it must either rise, or sink beyond redemption. It has been spoken of as identical with humanitarianism; if it were there would be no fear of its future—for the cause of humanity can never fail. But if it is to continue to be a mere ism—if in the next 27 years it proves to be nothing more than a negation—it might as well go out, for it will not be a fire to warm and cheer, but a will-o'-the-wisp to flatter and deceive.

Now is the time for us to take a "new departure." We have been children, playing with baubles, long enough. Spiritualism teaches that every act and thought of our lives go to assist in the moulding of our character, and the consequent status of our future condition; but how few of us act as if we realized this great truth! It teaches further that every branch of human reform is a part of true Spiritualism, and should be welcomed as aids in our great work. The phenomena is no more real Spiritualism than the Bible is religion; it is merely a means to an end, and whoever stops with the phenomena is no true Spiritualist. He only is worthy the name who extends a welcoming hand to all work of reform—to all practical means for the uplifting of humanity and the improvement of the human race. Teach us how to live, and you teach true Spiritualism. Let us learn our duty to our fellow man—and do our duty—for this is the essence of Spiritualism.

Let us place duty so far above mere belief, that we can act with good men who are infidel to the phenomena of Spiritualism. If they seek the right and the true—that is enough—we should co-operate with them. We are in danger of becoming as narrow and as uncharitable as any of the churches. Pity it is that with their uncharitableness we could not get also some of their earnestness—some of their self-sacrificing spirit—and put our hands in our pockets to aid the cause we profess to love. We must cease giving in aid of church institutions, and act together in aid of the cause of humanity.

The churches get more than half their donations from unbelievers, and then the Christians ask us to point to any charitable institution that Infidels or Spiritualists ever established. We are continually playing into their hands, and are despised for our folly.

What we want to do is to organize—to rise above petty differences, which amount to nothing, and work together for one common end. We can combine without adopting any creed—we should be willing to allow the utmost freedom of individual opinion—acting together only in practical measures of reform, and for self-protection, and as a means to command public respect.

What daily newspaper in this city will give a decent report of this Convention? Not one; and why? Because you are separate parties in society, each of itself of no account. Suppose you were an organized body, owning your own halls, acting together for mutual protection, and making your power felt as a compact mass, do you think you would longer be treated with contempt?

Now I am proposing nothing that is impracticable—you can combine, if you will cultivate more of the spirit of charity, and allow each one to work for good in his own way, in harmony only on general principles, and for common purposes.

Dr. Wm. B. Joscelyn said he had a resolution which he wished to offer in amendment, but he did not do so.

Prof. W. H. Chaney said he approved of the resolutions, but did not like the spirit of the speech. He said he had yesterday been compelled to defend himself against the charge that he was not a Spiritualist, and to-day he must stand up in defence of Spiritualism, attacked in the house of its friends, by abuse and flings,—etc, etc.

During the delivery of Mr. Chaney's speech, Mr. Slocum denied that his remarks contained any fling at Spiritualism.

A. C. Stowe sustained the resolutions. He said they provided for the organization of a society to be composed of all earnest reformers, who might have charity enough to allow individual souls to live their own lives in their own way. He also approved of the remarks of Mr. Slocum; thought they were just, and that they contained thoughts it would be well for Spiritualists to consider.

On motion of Mr. Chaney the resolutions were temporarily laid on the table; yet the various speakers continued to refer to them, generally in approval. Mr. York spoke earnestly in favor of concert of action. Dr. Joscelyn told what Spiritualism has accomplished, and spoke in favor of the union of all the liberal forces.

Mr. Healy, in answer to calls, said Free Thought existed long before modern Spiritualism was born, and he mentioned the names of some of its apostles from Pythagoras to Tom Paine. The best thing Spiritualism has yet accomplished is to assist in the elevation of woman. For that it is deserving of praise, but it is not in all things beyond rebuke; and Mr. Slocum, he thought was right, and his strictures should have been received kindly. It does not do for you, said Mr. Healy, to put on this self-glorifying cap; it does not fit you. Let us come down to practical business, and give up these dreary spiritual platitudes which mean nothing and never did. Let us inquire what are the relations of man to man? what is our duty to our fellow man? what can we do to benefit ourselves and others?

Brother Battersby said the best way to get up a revival of common sense is to kick away the props of Christianity. He declared himself an iconoclast; let the future build for itself; we have all we can do to clear away the rubbish for the foundation.

The afternoon session opened with a speech in favor of Christian Spiritualism by B. A. Lavender, followed by some timely and sensible remarks from Mrs. Anna F. Smith, late of Denver. She said she had expected to hear some plan for a union of reformers on a common basis. The city is full of hoodlums, criminals and people struggling for life; there is poverty, ignorance and wretchedness, and no adequate means of relief. Christianity is no remedy for these evils. As a reformer Christianity is a failure. Reform must come from the efforts of the people themselves. We should cease to trouble ourselves about this or that one's respectability, and instead of curiously inquiring how people live, devise a way to help them live aright.

Mrs. Chaney made a little speech in favor of organization, and condemnatory of reporters. She wanted a daily liberal paper established.

On motion of Prof. Chaney, the resolutions were taken from the table, and Dr. Joscelyn wished to have Spiritualists and Liberalists included. Mr. Stowe objected, as the term Freethinkers includes all classes.

Mr. Knight took the same ground, and said if there are any Spiritualists who do not claim to be Freethinkers, they are not wanted in the proposed organization.

W. N. Slocum (in reference to various remarks not reported) said:

As something has been said as to the origin of that resolution, it may be proper to say that I first suggested to Brothers York and Battersby the appointment of a Committee to report to this Convention a plan of organization. The resolution I read as follows:

Resolved, That the President appoint a committee of Five whose duty it shall be to devise and report to this meeting a plan for a permanent State organization of the Free Thinkers of California.

Both Mr. York and Mr. Battersby approved of the idea, but thought there would be no time to perfect such a plan, and at their suggestion I drew a new resolution—the one that was presented to you this morning. The names put in that resolution were suggested by various persons, the only desire being to secure the best working Committee obtainable.

Brief remarks were made by Mr. Healy and others, when, under the operation of the previous question, a vote was reached, and Dr. Joscelyn's amendment was rejected. Ten additional members were then added to the Committee, and the resolutions were adopted.

C. Fannie Allyn made a glowing speech in favor of practical reform work. She said "If Spiritualism confines itself to the phenomena it is not broad enough nor long enough for me." She referred to meetings held in Boston, where Spiritualists and infidels occupied the same platform—old Horace Seaver of the Investigator being welcomed by Spiritualists as a co-worker.

Mrs. Eliza Taylor, an elderly Quaker lady, unable to speak so as to be heard, sent to the Secretary her contribution, as follows:

If I am right, O teach my heart
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, thy grace impart
To find the better way.

This pure, this holy, and this divine spirit which we call God, pervades all nature, and ultimates in man and woman, teaching them that they should live pure and upright lives; and if listened to and obeyed will enable them to become bright and shining lights amidst the darkness that prevails in regard to spiritual things. Men and women everywhere should assist each other in rearing up beautiful examples of piety among the children of earth.

Brief speeches were made by Mrs. Fuller, Dr. Hardcastle, and others; when Dean Clarke made an appeal to the Liberalists to sustain the liberal press. He said that before coming to California he had heard of the freedom of the people from religious prejudices, but he had found it the most priest-ridden State in the Union. Concerning papers worthy of support he referred particularly to COMMON SENSE and Dawn, the latter a woman's paper, published by a woman and for women. The editress, Dora Darnmore, he said, is working in her field, as others are in theirs, and deserves support.

After a few congratulatory words from the President, Jas. Battersby, the meeting adjourned.

In the evening, Charter Oak Hall was well filled. Jas. Battersby gave a very interesting and instructive address, the introductory portion of which was as follows:

A hope within me of being made useful in my day and generation stirs me to action to put into articulate speech the thoughts which manifest themselves in "words that burn," and bear witness with what truth and force I may for Purity—peace and good will to men. If in the desultory observations I make there may appear a disposition to scornfully trample under foot the leading theories and principles which are the chief and proudest boast of a sham religion and civilization, I trust my audience will have the discerning spirit to take a broad and comprehensive view of the entire question, and not impute to me a narrow, selfish, and personal aggression in the grave and really momentous strife in which we are now engaged, between Reason and Superstition—science and dogmas. So far as it concerns us, the business of discussing motives and estimating character will be left to the partisan and the bigot, whilst ours is a higher, a nobler, and I may say an easier task, that of rescuing men from the vagaries of blind faith, and imparting in its stead the light of reason and knowledge—a knowledge, my friends, which will raise the mind above the instinctive and emotional spheres to a plane where the complete suppression of base desires and brutal passions of humanity will be the result, and in their place the enthronement of equal justice, universal brotherhood, and self forgetting love. A fine illustration of this truth is in the fact that the prayers of a thousand fanatics and priests, such as are now in the full tide of religious enthusiasm in our city, could never bring the holy ghost down upon such men as Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Buckner and others; but their inspirational folly and their magnetic waves would break harmless at their feet.

To seek the truth without regard to sect or parties is considered by many as a bold step, but, for my own part, the conviction has long rested on my mind that organizations having a fixed set of principles, whether in religion, politics, or on social questions—we may add perhaps, science—are a hindrance to progress. The fact is, it seems to be their nature to stand still in their views, and never permit any to look beyond their creed.

Some wise man of olden time has said that "deified error is the most pernicious of all things;" all error is bad enough; but that which is deified, and embalmed, as it were, in organizations and conclaves, is an evil I desire to be delivered from evermore. Truth is free! never fears investigation, but ever courts it; and like the faithful watchman on the walls of Idumea, it ever cries "the morning cometh, and also the night; if ye will inquire, return, come." It is a remarkable fact that most improvements and discoveries have been made by individuals—few, if any, by churches, colleges, or other organizations. In science and inventions we have Galileo, Copernicus, Bacon, Franklin, Newton, Watts, Fulton, Caxton, Morse, and many others in proof of this position. But we are charged with "heresy," infidelity, with departing from the beaten and old paths; with being innovators of time-honored systems, etc. Well, we are thankful the charges are merited; to them we lift up our head and heart and plead guilty. But this heresy, bear in mind, has no relation to truth, and those who brand us with it bear false witness against their neighbor. Those who limit their charge to the nick-named "God's word," to creeds and theological systems which have no authority over conscience, and which, from the very depth of my being I despise, pay us a compliment when they intend a censure; aye, and when they would revive the infernal tortures of the dark ages, subject us to them, or, worse still, hand us over for our temerity to an angry God and his accomplice, the devil! Truth, my friends, is so unutterably important, that the man who has determined to test her claims for himself, by the only standard—himself—thereby gives evidence not only of his individuality and independence, but also that he is profoundly in earnest. If we were bent upon the overthrow in one common ruin of all that is venerable for age because beautiful in truth, then we should indeed richly deserve all the bitter things which have been said concerning us; but loyalty to the truth is the cause of unjust suspicions; and experience and study have convinced us that many of our former sentiments were false and untenable; their orthodoxy may be unquestioned, unimpeachable, but when that is all that can be said in favor of a doctrine, it is time to sacrifice on the altar of truth, notwithstanding the honored names that have given it their suffrage, and the length of time it has dwelt in conferences, synods, churches, and other holy places. O, my friends, if I had not unlearned as well as learned something all these years, mine would be a blank retrospect indeed! Why, there are men who make it their boast that they never change an opinion in religion, and of the fact I have no doubt; but whether it is something to glory in is another question. This is the kind of mind which cannot comprehend the action of increased light on minds of a different order; and when these would be our censors, and insinuate all sorts of naughty things about us, the only question with me is whether malignity or falsehood is the strongest element in their nature. Men of this type, a brilliant specimen of which is just now raising Cain, so to speak, in our midst, are the dead weights to progress and enlightenment; a true, rational unlightenment of the soul! They are the merest echoes of everything false that has been stereotyped in creed, catechism or the pulpit. O man, use your protestant, nay, your God-given right to change your views on any subject when you find reason so to do. Such men we speak of will not cease to measure others by themselves, for they are incapable of imagining any higher standard; and as Minerva sprang full grown and completely armed from the brain of Jupiter, so these wise men expect and believe that perfection is instantaneously attained as soon as the church and pulpit are entered. These infallibles denounce the Pope's infallibility on the principle, I suppose, that they do not like a rival; but when we touch the accumulated priestly rubbish of ages that has covered up the simple truth in nature's grand and glorious Book with darkness, and filled every corner of the temple with dust and cobwebs, and filled every corner of the temple with men, teachers of new doctrines, not fit to live, but ripe for the sulphurous flames of an endless hell!

But now let us look at this matter without prejudice. You ought not to condemn us unheard, for that would be unworthy of free Americans; even your own Bible and your own God invite to discussion, and says "Come, now, let us reason together." We have done this, and the objections presenting themselves form a very pyramid of arguments against your scheme of salvation to humanity.

Mr. Battersby then entered upon a consideration of the "Plan of Salvation" and gave also a review of the facts concerning the revision of the Christian Bible, which has been for some years in progress in England. The address was listened to with attention and greeted with applause.

Dr. Dean Clarke then read a poem, entitled "The Praying Evangelist," in which Brother Hammond was handled somewhat severely. The following is a specimen:

'Tis a shame to the people, a disgrace to the age,
That a humbug like this one should be "all the rage."
When preachers with brains put a fraud at their head
'Tis a sure indication all the fools are not dead.

Mr. Knight made the closing address, and the proceedings closed with a dance in which young and old participated.

There is a frightful interval between the seed and the timber.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS.

FIRST DAY.

The meeting convened in Dashaway Hall at 11 o'clock, L. B. Hopkins was elected President; Mrs E. H. McKinley, J. D. Pearson, Vice Presidents, and W. N. Slocum Secretary. After the reading of a poem by J. H. Butler, speeches were made by J. L. York and Mrs. Fannie Allyn. Mrs. McKinley read a letter from Miss Augusta Whiting, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., March 29, 1875.

To the San Francisco Spiritualists, and all with them assembled to celebrate the anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism, greeting and Godspeed!

May your councils be pervaded by that harmony which is not the torpor of stagnation, but the outgrowth of unity in diversity, which is nature's divine and perfect law of use and beauty.

The Sacramento Lyceum commemorates the day as not only a general time of gladness, but especially as the anniversary of its own organization. It will be my privilege to assist in the exercises upon the occasion, and so say my farewell to the Sacramento friends who have so warmly and earnestly appreciated and seconded my labors with them during the past month. This will be my farewell, not only to this city, but to the California public, for a season. Business matters requiring my presence in Michigan, I am reluctantly obliged to surrender partially formed engagements for the next two months here, and go thither immediately. But the same wise powers which brought me to California last November, and whose foresight I see so fully justified in the good thereby wrought out for myself and other souls—aye, for the cause of truth and progress—still guide my way. They will never fail nor falter, but in their own good time will bring me again to the lovely shores which I leave with an added regret, because I feel my work is an unfinished one, and the circumstances which draw me away are temporal and external in their character. I rejoice to know that I leave so many able and earnest workers among you. Angels bless their work to themselves, and to the souls for whom they minister!

The coming summer will find me in New England. In the fall, if the way open, I may return to the Pacific slope. But, present or absent, the ties of sympathy and friendship which bind me to so many of the Liberals of your State cannot be severed. They are as immortal as the deathless spirit.

So, wherever I may be, this subtle bond of peace will keep open the telegraphic circuit, bearing ever over the spiritual wires messages of remembrance and of blessing.

Yours, very truly, B. AUGUSTA WHITING.

An original poem appropriate to the occasion was read by Dr. Joscelyn. Recess.

In the afternoon, after music, Dr. Wm. R. Joscelyn opened with an inspirational address, followed by Dr. Dean Clarke, Mrs. McKinley, Mrs. Cummings, Dr. Swain, J. H. Butler, Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Healy and Mr. Watson, and poems were read by Mrs. Dr. Joscelyn and Walter Hyde. Song by Mrs. Morgans, "I Stand on Memory's Golden Shore."

In the evening a poem was recited by Mr. Irwin, followed by addresses by W. H. Chaney and Mrs. L. E. Drake. A mediums seance followed, in which Mrs. Kerns, Mrs. Cummings, Mrs. McKinley, Mr. and Mrs. Joscelyn, Mrs. Robinson, Mr. Jackson and others participated. Adjourned.

SECOND DAY.

James Battersby was elected President, O. M. Dawson, Anna F. Smith and Lena Clarke Vice Presidents, and W. N. Slocum Secretary. The programme provided that the second day's business should be devoted to Free Thought, and it was deemed best to present first a series of resolutions which had been prepared by a Committee for the consideration of the Convention: They were read by the Secretary and on motion of W. H. Chaney, were temporarily laid on the table: Brief speeches were made by W. H. Chaney, Pat. Healy and Mr. Dygert. Recess until 2 P. M.

In the afternoon, after remarks by B. A. Lavender, on motion of W. H. Chaney, the resolutions, laid on the table in the morning, were considered, amended by the addition of ten names, and adopted. As finally passed they read as follows:

Resolved, That a Committee of Forty be authorized to devise a plan for a State organization of the Free Thinkers of California, with power to appoint the temporary officers of such organization, who shall hold office until their successors are elected by the First State Convention to be called by such officers.

Resolved, That said Committee shall be composed of the following named persons: James Battersby, H. L. Knight, Mrs. Augusta Perkins, Mrs. A. W. M. Bartlett, Mrs. Anna F. Smith, A. C. Stowe, Almarin B. Paul, Albert Kendrick, Pat. J. Healy, W. H. Chaney, Capt. C. B. Smith, Mrs. O. M. Dawson, Joseph Swain, Mrs. E. H. McKinley, Lena Clarke, Mrs. A. M. Lewis, Madame Antonia and Dr. Wm. R. Joscelyn, of San Francisco; J. W. Mackie and Marshall Curtis of Alameda, Col. C. P. Hatch and Eleanor Lindsay of Sonoma; J. L. York and J. J. Owen, of Santa Clara; Josiah Johnson and Ferdinand Woodward of Sacramento; J. W. Freeman and H. A. Manchester of San Joaquin; Josephine Walcott and G. W. Stanley of Santa Barbara; D. W. C. Franklin and Thomas A. Garey, of Los Angeles; P. R. Wright of San Bernardino; J. W. Sweasey of Humboldt; A. F. Blood of Butte; Mrs. G. B. Kirby of Santa Cruz; Mrs. Helen W. Baker, of Lake; H. S. Pope of Ventura; Mrs. L. Hutchison of Inyo; and P. H. Trask of San Diego.

Resolved, That said Committee shall meet at the call of the President, James Battersby, and that fifteen members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

[The resolutions as first proposed provided for thirty members, only eight of whom reside in San Francisco. The amendments make the Committee consist of forty members, of whom eighteen are residents of San Francisco.]

No other amendments were offered, excepting one by Dr. Joscelyn to insert the word "Freethinkers," in the first resolution. The proposition was lost. During the discussion remarks were made by Dr. Joscelyn, W. H. Chaney, Mrs. Anna F. Smith, Flora W. Chaney, A. C. Stowe, H. L. Knight, Pat. Healy, Mr. Bush and others, and the meeting adjourned until 7½ o'clock.

In the evening, after an address by the President, James Battersby, an original poem by Dean Clarke, and remarks by H. L. Knight, the Convention passed a vote of thanks to the vocalists, musicians and others who had contributed to the enjoyment of the occasion, and adjourned.

W. N. SLOCUM, Secretary.

The editor of the Christian Observer says infidelity is not half as rife in this country now as it was fifty years ago! Where has this man lived that he has found evidence to sustain such a statement? The only advance made by the church in this country, out of proportion to the increase of population, has been by the Catholics. Rev. Mr. Kallcock, better informed, said in his sermon in Platt's Hall, last Sunday, in reference to "the wave of infidelity that is sweeping over the country," "never was there such a call made upon the Christian world for work as there is to-day." The questions skeptics are asking must be answered by the Church, and, to defend ourselves, we must use every weapon that is available, no matter what its handle is made of."

YERBA BUENA.—Good herb is the very appropriate name of a medicinal plant which grows wild in California, and from which is manufactured Dr. Warren's Yerba Buena Bitters, one of the best remedies for dyspepsia, costiveness, etc., ever used. It is as pleasant to the taste as it is beneficial in its effects. It is sold from a wagon on Market street, near Dupont, every evening. Williams & Clark, proprietors.

THE WRITTEN WORD.

BY WILLIAM BRUNTON.

Christ wrote no word to bind the race
From futher life and higher grace;
He only wrote on fleeting sand,
With down-bent head and careless hand,
And what he wrote we do not know,
It faded like the fading snow!
His life was all the grace he left,
His life of which we stand bereft,
His life of love and noble deed,
That came to meet our want and need;
His words might change with changing time,
But life and love remain sublime.
O, shame on Church with creeds and words,
O, shame, we say, they're not the Lord's,
He knew them not,—so shame on you,
That ye their burdens still renew;
We want his life, his noble deeds,
And not the farce of forced creeds!
So learn this lesson good and wise,
That Christian life alone we prize;
Then live with love, and all your life,
Will be with Christian virtue rife,
And thus your faith will grow and spread,
And live and thrive when you are dead!

MY GRAVE.

BY WILLIAM BRUNTON.

What boots it where my body lies at last,
In burial sod or on the sad sea shore,
Or ocean deep where waves their music pour,
Or out in desert wilds it should be cast,
A firmer faith my heart in love holds fast,
Than that my body will be needed more,
A faith that comes from life's deep inward lore,
And says, once dead, 'tis past and ever past!
Ah, no! I see my soul made free from death,
My soul with life immortal I can see,
With no more need of this my mortal breath,
Where mortal body cannot, cannot be;
So let it rest here, there, as chance may fall,
It came from Earth, and she at last claims all.

HELP THE MAN THAT SEEKS THE RIGHT.

Help the man that seeks the right,
Do your best to keep him true,
Be to him a guiding light,
He may be the same to you.
Do not scan each fault he bears,
See the true with shining light;
See the grace he graceful wears,
Help the man that seeks the right.
Help your brother as he needs,
In the hour he strives and falls;
Never think of church and creeds,
And our pious funeral palls;
Never think of praise or blame,
But assist with all your might,
This is winning golden fame—
Help the man that seeks the right.

'Tis not ours to judge each act,
And eondepan with ready speech,
Glorying in some fatal fact
Where we can his name impeach.
But 'tis ours to aid him on—
On to many a shining height;
Ours to bid his fears begone!
Help the man that seeks the right.
All and each are one in kind,
Varying but in small degree;
Each at times is weak and blind,
Angels pity you and me.
So to others lend a hand
In our life's uneven flight;
List to this God's great command—
Help the man that seeks the right.

OPEN QUESTIONS.—It is a great mistake to consider any question respecting man's condition after death, or the personal identity of invisible intelligencies as settled. This is a foregone conclusion in Christianity, and had the mystic rap of the nineteenth century only commenced in the pulpit, it would have been hailed as a miraculous confirmation of Christian dogmatism. Let Spiritualists, therefore, be slow in building theories on mystical phenomena, lest they become like Christians, who are spellbound by "faith" in the Bible. To be crystalized in settled opinions respecting the unknown, is to become prescriptive and sectarian, as all believers in mediumistic "revelations" are prone to become.—La Roy Sunderland.

LIFE'S BEST HERO.

BY I. A. HEALD.

["A man who can give up dreaming, and go to his daily realities—who can smooth down his heart, its love or its woe, and take to the hard work of his hands—who defies fate, and, if he must die, dies fighting to the last—that man is life's best hero."]

In life's great battle for success, Who are our noblest men? Those only whom mankind call great, And praise with tongue and pen—	Who, true to progress—human rights, Is foremost in the field, Defies the fates—ne'er sheds a tear— Can do, but never yield.
Who never suffer for a cause, But meet success by chance, As on calm seas and peaceful fields In sunshine they advance?	And who, regardless of renown, Can die most truly brave, Expecting that his fate will be To fill a nameless grave.
I count him nobler, greater, far, Who labors to the end, A martyr to the cause he deems His duty to defend.	Life's grand, best hero then is he, Who, where his lot is cast, Not only nobly wins the field, But holds it to the last!

HETERODOXY.

BY FLORENCE FEROL.

Pray thee put the sermon by, vex my soul no more with creeds;
They are only stones and husks to my hungry spirit needs;
I am tired of striving sects, with their various bigotry,
Ah! for me death holds no terror but the fear of losing thee.

In a heaven apart from thee, could my exiled soul rejoice?
Could I join the angels' song missing thence thy tender voice?
What to me were gates of pearl, if they parted thee and me?
What the streets so fair and golden, if I walked them seeking thee?

What to me would be the joys of that bright and wondrous land,
If among them I should miss evermore thy loving hand?
What to me the pastures green where thy feet could never be?
What the path beside still waters, if thou walkest not with me?

Ah! wherever after death my still faithful soul my dwell,
Saints may call it bliss or woe, they may name it heaven or hell,
By thee only, oh beloved! will my pain or joy be wrought,
I shall find my heaven beside thee, and my hell where thou art not.

Signs of the Times.

Less study and more fun is what Robert Collyer recommends for American schools.

A new invention is claimed whereby glass can be made into a building material for house fronts, floors or pavements, cheaper and more durable than marble.

The Evangelists rejoice greatly over the appointment of Horace Maynard as Minister to Turkey, hoping he will do missionary work there.

The Spiritual Scientist is doing a good work by inciting Spiritualists to greater care in the investigation of phenomena purporting to be spiritual.

The Spiritual Scientist says: "Honest and intelligent criticism is the great want of Spiritualism to-day; it is a most valuable auxiliary to the cause of Truth."

Does not the spectacle of the gibbet deaden that finer sense of the sacredness of human life, in the public mind, wanting which many unbalanced minds are prompted to commit the very deeds which society thus seeks to prevent?

Two years ago the British House of Commons by a vote of 222 to 155 defeated a bill to enable unmarried women to vote at elections for members of Parliament. Last week a similar bill was defeated by 152 to 187—a decided gain within two years.

Mediums for materialization are multiplying fast. There are now over a score of them in the United States alone, and many more in Europe, who are publicly known. A large number of others are experimenting in private. The proof has accumulated until the fact is no longer deniable.

A Boston minister, on Sunday morning last, received a present of $14,000 from a number of his parishioners, to pay off a mortgage on his house. If the mortgage was $14,000 what must the house be worth? And is this man a consistent follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, who had nowhereon to lay his head?

Thomas Jefferson's grand-daughter is trying to find employment for herself and boy in Washington. The daughters of ex-secretary of the Treasury Robert J. Walker and those of Chief-Justice Taney are doing copying as a means of livelihood, and there are the grandchildren of ex-Presidents, generals, and hundreds of other distinguished men, pleading for labor at even the smallest remuneration, so that they may be able to live.

Five bags of mail matter, principally papers, have been detained at the San Francisco Postoffice for insufficient postage, and will be forwarded to the Dead Letter Office at Washington. Instead of dispatching the papers to Oakland, San Jose, or Sacramento, where the deficient postage could be collected, they are sent across the continent, where it cannot be collected, and the owners are robbed of their property. In other words, instead of being the servant of the people, our Government acts as if the people were its servants, and that they may continue to be plundered with impunity.

The teachers of Baltimore have subscribed $1500 to build a monument in memory of Edgar Allan Poe.

The ignorant negro voters of America will undoubtedly be a great aid to the God in the Constitution party, when that question is put to the test.

The property left by Edwin Forrest to form a home for actors will amount to one million of dollars, at the time fixed for its use—twenty-one years after his death.

The success of the experiment at Vineland, N. J., shows what can be done even under unfavorable circumstances, in places where the good of the whole number is made paramount to the good of the individual.

The desire of James Lick to superintend the distribution of his property, now that he is in better health, is perfectly natural, just to himself and to others, and he is sustained by public sentiment. The only question is, what is the law?

The systematic defamation of our public men is one of the worst features of American politics. The Evening Bulletin still continues to lead in this line in California. Its publishers, of course, are exceedingly pure men themselves.

Mrs. Mary L. and Miss M. Fletcher, of Burlington have established a public library, to be known as the "Fletcher Free Library," and the city has purchased the building formerly used as a court house and renovated it at a cost of $15,000 for its use.

The Golden Age says the God of our School system is Cram. The object is to see how many useless words can be stuffed into a child's mind. It destroys clear thinking, and turns into painful labor what might be made a perpetual joy. Going to school should be as interesting as going to a circus, and it might be made so under a rational system.

Fredrick L. Hosmer says the infallibility of the Bible is a comparatively modern doctrine. It belongs to the Reformation, and was adopted by early Protestantism when the latter dropped the infallibility of the church, as represented by her councils. Even the old Talmudists never applied it to more than the Pentateuch. The early Christian fathers were far more free in this respect than the stricter sects of to-day.

The Banner of Light gives a well authenticated account to prove not only the temporary materialization of spirits, but the dematerialization, at the same time, of the medium. The medium disappeared under test conditions of a strict kind, and after the seance was found exactly as left, fastened in the chair. The statements are beyond belief, except by those who witnessed the experiments, and some of the witnesses doubt the evidence of their own senses.

Geo. Francis Train predicts trouble ahead, and backs out of the crimmage in advance. He says: "Following repudiation and bankruptcy comes paralysis in trade, apoplexy in commerce, death to industry. Then starving workmen start the war cry, 'bread or blood!' The Beecher gang will be requested to exit. Then vigilance committee, riot, revolution, civil war,—bloody streets and burnt cities. Meanwhile I have evolved out of this. My mission is peace; my power is to save, not destroy."

CHAPTER III.

The newspapers of the day contained an account of the accident at the "Little Injun." It was quite a trifling affair, comparatively; only one life lost; a man named Billy, surname unknown, and no clue to it. That was all it amounted to in the San Francisco dailies. How distinctly I remember the occasion. Every event of that terrible time is branded on my brain as with red hot irons. It was the afternoon of a beautiful day in the loveliest month of our lovely mountain region. Clem came tripping down stairs, light as a feather, dressed in a clean calico, all ruffled and puffed to distraction, and a blue ribbon flying from somewhere out of the pale gold of her clustering hair.

"I'm going to the mine, mamma," she said; "won't you come too?"

But I was tired and would not. At the garden gate she turned and ran back laughingly and kissed me. Then away she flew, her fragrant hair streaming, and her pretty dress fluttering in the afternoon breeze. I sat on the porch for more than an hour, reading, when I was startled into looking up by the slamming of the garden gate. There stood Willis, one of the miners, every feature of his face and every hair of his head bristling with horror. He was as white as a dead man, and had the appearance and motions of a dead man who had been suddenly galvanized into some kind of spasmodic activity. His voice was rasping and mechanical as his face, and his jaws opened and shut with a snap.

"A cave in the mine!" I repeated after him, not comprehending. "Is any one hurt? Is any one shut in?"

And then his voice broke the air like the hoarse bark of a dog, and turned my blood to sleet with one word, "Clem."

I heard some one scream. To this day I cannot realize that it was I; but God forbid that I should ever utter or hear such another scream as that. How did I ever live through the days that followed, in which they were taking her out? There is no power in language to describe what I felt. Insane? No, that would have been a mercy. Every moment of that time was an age. When I look back upon it now I cannot but think that I passed through years of such hell as never entered into the imagination of a Milton or a Dante. And Billy was in there, too; but though I heard it again and again it made no impression on me—took no sort of hold on my mind until my darling was released almost, at her last gasp, and Billy's dead body was brought out and laid beside her. Even then I scarcely saw him. I only saw Clem—only cared for my own darling. God help us poor mothers, and lift us a step higher in moral grandeur, so that we may recognize all the sons and daughters of mankind as our own, and love them with that perfect love that means redemption.

In a few days my pet was all right again, except that a shadow lay upon her beauty, and softened its character to a tone of such loveliness as I never beheld in any other human being. Her pure soul shone through her eyes, and the divinity of a nobler life than she had yet known made itself manifest in every line of her exquisite face, and in every curve of her graceful, drooping body.

Did it compensate poor Billy's watching soul, I wonder, to see the costly funeral we gave him? Hundreds of people with tearful eyes stood by as we placed his body in the grave, close to that other grave under the willow—for the record of those terrible days in the tunnel had come to be known—and the reason why there was but one funeral instead of two. Clem had told us all about it in her simple, childlike way, her voice broken by sobs, and her eyes dim and heavy with tears. I will not repeat it all—how Billy had seen her from his chamber window go up to the mine that fearful afternoon. (It will be remembered that he slept during the day, and worked at night.) He followed and spoke to her as she stood upon the threshold of a certain drift that he considered unsafe.

"I wouldn't go in there," he said; the timbers are just chucked in like jackstraws. The men are all out of it to-day in some other drift. I don't believe the place is safe.

"Mr. Bradleigh told me, she said, that they had found very rich ore in here, and I want to see how it looks. I won't stay in one minute.

Then Billy lit a candle and led the way, thinking to protect her no doubt. When they were more than a hundred feet in, it seemed as if the whole world shut down on them with a roar like thunder; and my poor girl fell to the ground in an awful horror. I must not dwell on this part of her narrative; I can feel sharp incisive pains, and a strange dizziness in my brain just to think of it. She caught hold of Billy's hands, and he held her hands or knelt by her for a long, long time. It was intensely dark and the air was bad. With true miner instinct, Billy put out the light. But all the time the place was getting closer and closer. Twenty-four hours—thirty-six, perhaps—had passed—she could not tell—when Billy began to complain of being sleepy. There was a little octagonal clock in the end of the tunnel, but it had stopped an age before this. Clem, who all the time was unnaturally wide awake, begged him not to go to sleep; she would be so lonesome, she said. But he was determined. He would only go a little distance from her and lie down. She need not be afraid when he was so near, but above all things he wanted her to let him alone, until he got his sleep out.

"No matter how lonesome you are Clem, you must make up your mind to wait until I wake—and be sure and let me alone. Remember that the time will probably seem much longer to you than it really is, because you will be lonesome. But above all things let me alone; don't speak to me, and don't put your hand on me. I tell you I must sleep. I shall die if I don't; but do you keep awake until I wake up, and then you shall have your turn. Now then can you do that much for me?"

"I will try Billy, she said.

"Try! Good God you must do it. Can you pray, Clem?"

"Then Mamma, said Clem afterwards, I remembered the Lord's prayer, and I said it slowly, and Billy repeated every word after me. And after that I was longing to add a few words, but hardly dare say them, for fear it would discourage Billy, and break me down entirely. But I resolved they should not; and so I said, "God bless my poor mother and comfort her for my loss."

"You are not lost, Clem, said Billy, springing to his feet. You will see your mother yet. Then after a pause he said, "I don't know how long we have been in here, but I have never offered to touch you, and I will never offer to touch you again after we are out, for I know the difference between us—you with your mother and everybody else to love you, and I with nobody; but I beg you to kiss me Clem, just once before I go to sleep."

"I did kiss him, mamma. His lips were like satin, but they were tremulous and chill. Oh, if I had only known! Then he went off and laid down, and I heard a gurgling sound, and after that there was perfect silence, a silence that was awful, mamma. I could not endure it, so I commenced groping about to find the clock. I did find it without disturbing Billy, and I felt for the place and wound it up; and bless its little heart, it started into business with the first turn of the key. I wound it so tight that the tick seemed to dance along with a musical double shuffle, as if it was glad to find itself alive again. And I know I was glad too. O mamma I can never think of it, after this, as a thing without life. It spoke to me then so hopefully and cheerfully. It said 'take—heart, take—heart' as plain as words could make it. Then I began to hold a conversation with it. I said 'Will Billy wake soon?' And it said 'Wake—soon,—wake soon.' And I said 'Will we ever go out of here?' And it said 'Go—out; go—out;' and my heart leaped in my throat for very joy. And, foolish as it seems, it inspired me with a hope and courage that I know prolonged my life."

It was some time after this that she felt every breath she drew to be a struggle. She changed her position many times, until at last with an awful gasp she fell backward. She had a dim consciousness of touching Billy, and a dull anxiety lest she should wake him; and after that she knew no more until she opened her eyes upon the flaring night torches, and the agonized face of her mother bent above her; a face from which the bloom of youth had flown forever; a face all haggard and ashen and wrinkled; and a head—but three days before crowned with richest chestnut, now white as with the snow of seventy winters. But the real tragedy of this awful event was this: the gurgling sound Clem heard when Billy laid down, was the blood oozing from a vein in his neck which he had opened with his knife, in order to economize the little remaining air for her.

Clem is in Paris with her young husband, and her baby is on her bosom. I wonder if her dreams are ever haunted by the vision of that poor young face in its marble repose, or those small, translucent, girlish hands that saved her life so fearfully.

CHAPTER IV.

"There are things in Heaven and Earth Horatio
Not dreamed of in your philosophy."

About one week after the tragic events of the last chapter, the period indicated as the limit to the bonding of the mine expired. The mine was condemned and refused. What could it mean? We were electrified with astonishment. Bradleigh most of all. He had never dreamed of their refusing it, and it was a death blow to his hopes. I thought he would go crazy for awhile. To be sure he said little; but those passionate, intense people are best judged by the silent operation of the secret forces within them, when you have once found the key. You need not expect words from them. But the few words that burned their way through Bradleigh's tongue went hot as fire to my own brain and heart, and filled me with such pity as I never felt for any other human being. So far as I was concerned the rejection of the mine amounted to nothing. There was enough pay rock on the dump to put up reducing works, and it was but a drop in the bucket compared to that in sight within the tunnels. But Bradleigh was in despair. It had been his last chance. He was now literally adrift again without a single hope of succor. Three days later he came to me with the appearance of being overwhelmed with grief, and told me that his wife was dead. He had just heard it. He went to the city and returned in ten days. He told me that he was now at the end of his row, and would gladly accept any situation I would be kind enough to give him. It seemed as if he willfully reversed our positions; I had become a person of importance in his eyes, and he was nothing. His arrogance was all gone, and in its place a pitiful humility and a fawning flattering manner that made me both ashamed and sorry. He no longer had to dodge the steady light of my eyes, as formerly; I found that my own eyes had learned the trick of dodging from very shame of him. But a month before, I had seemed to him no more than the dirt beneath his feet. I doubt whether he had seen that my hair was then blended chestnut and gold, and my face as fair and youthful as a girl's. But now, when I had grown suddenly old, and the snow of premature age rested on my head, he pretended great admiration for my looks, still greater for my mind. He had ignored Clem completely; but had at last awakened to the consciousness that he loved her as his own daughter; and his cringing servility filled me with mingled sorrow and contempt. Through what awful straits a man must pass, I thought, to come to this—he with his big brain and his superb personal beauty? Occasionally some word would fall from him that would give me an insight into the life he had led since he had failed in business. Putting various things together I made out that there were times when those who had been the friends of his prosperity would dodge him on the street, or look askance in meeting him, lest he should want to borrow money to pay for a meal's victuals. He patronized boarding houses for the most part, living with his family in one place just as long as they would keep him without pay, and then going to another place. He had not only made the rounds of San Francisco in this way, but of Oakland, Sacramento, Stockton and San Jose, and finally back in San Francisco.

I know there are many persons who will condemn him utterly on my representation. But I could not do it, I was so sorry for him. His need was so great, my heart bled for him. I would say to myself that the hard circumstances of his life had formed him; he had energy, business tact, and ability, but in his own words, "his luck like a bad run of cards was dead against him." I felt that he was not altogether responsible for the traits of character that inspired both my pity and disgust; and somehow he wore on me, and the thought of him grew on me—not pleasantly—but miserably, as some horrible excrescence will grow upon the body. He oppressed me day and night like an accusing conscience. I could do something for him I knew. I could make him superintendent of the mine, but his overbearing disposition rendered him unfit for the situation. I could take him in as a partner, but I had no confidence in his integrity. Still this did not alienate my deeply rooted compassion. I did not think he would injure me willfully, though if I stood in the way of his schemes he would cast me aside if he could. Clem said he would wade through blood to accomplish his designs. I could not think this, though I knew him to be a desperate man. That he loved his children with all the fierceness of his unheated nature I was quite sure. He rarely spoke of them, and yet I understood perfectly that they were the motive power of all his actions. One day he stood with his back to the fire when Clem came in, and in her innocent, baby way, patted my head and kissed me, then passed on to the next room. Bradleigh watched her with a spasm of agony in his face. "I've got some beautiful children in the city," he said, and then with a sharp, incisive, awful voice he broke into a torrent of profanity—ending with—"Great God Almighty, what can I do? What will become of my children?" And he dropped all white and limp into a chair and raised one trembling nervous hand to his eyes. I could have gone down on my knees to soothe him; but no kindness from any human being could do that; all he wanted was money—money. He was drawing my very soul out in compassion. I was tempted to ruin myself financially in order to rescue him. But for thoughts of my child I would have given him everything. He wanted my property so much more than I wanted it, that the strength of his desire seemed by some uncontrollable law of nature like the properties of the magnet, to be gradually drawing it all to him. Was it monomania or snake charming? Clem's tender little heart ached for him, although with her fine tact she understood him thoroughly. She was firmer than I, and would say, "It won't do mamma, it won't do. If he gets any sort of claim on our property he will turn us out of doors, and snap his fingers in our faces. We can't do anything for him mamma. There are thousands more worthy of our sympathy and assistance. Make him leave the house, and then we will forget him, and be happy again." But I did not have the heart to drive him away; and before a great while he made me an offer of marriage—an offer that might have deceived me by the violence of his protestations of love, but for the dodging, shirking look of his strange, restless eyes. Now all the time I was longing, yearning for those poor motherless children of his, and was almost willing to sacrifice myself to the man, for the sake of giving them a home and a friend. "Don't do it mamma," was Clem's continual protest, not made to me alone, but in his presence as well. A month of indecision passed, when the crisis came. The nights were now very cold, in our high mountain latitude; and one evening Bradleigh proposed some egg-nog before going to bed. We acceded to the proposition, and he and Clem busied themselves with beating eggs and carrying forward other preparations, until it was all done, and stood in three large glasses upon the table by the fire. Bradleigh then passed me my glass, and took up his own, which he began to drink. Clem took the remaining glass and raised it to her lips, when it suddenly fell from her hands with as much force as if some one had struck it a hard blow. We stood looking at the shattered pieces, and then I glanced at Bradleigh. He was white as a dead man, and his hand was shaking violently. I sat my glass on the table.

"Do you think it is poisoned?" he asked forcing a laugh. "Take mine Mrs. Goldstein, I wouldn't poison myself you know." Then he drank mine, and after that, seeing that neither of us were disposed to touch the other, he drank it too. In a few minutes I had recovered from the strange shock, occasioned by the dashing down of Clem's glass, and felt ashamed of the momentary superstition connected with it; for it had made an impression of unnaturalness upon me, as if some influence foreign to that of our every day life had suddenly interposed to keep Clem from drinking it.

The next morning Clem told me that she had had a dream that was no dream at all but an actual verity. She thought she received a letter from Billy, warning us against Bradleigh. She had dreamed it again and again all through the night, and it had taken a strong hold upon her mind. She said she seemed to see him sitting at her writing desk writing it, and as he finished each word she knew without looking what it was.

"Why Clem, I said, that little affair of last night must have turned your head. You ought to look in your desk; perhaps you will find the note itself with Billy's signature. If he signs his surname, you know, we can add it to the other on the tombstone.

I doubt whether she heard half my words; for at the first suggestion the superstitious thing was flying up stairs, and I slowly trailing after her, laughing all the way.

"Mamma, mamma for God's sake come here," she cried breathlessly as I entered her room. She held a note written in a scrawling hand, all the h's misplaced, and half the words misspelled. It said:

Dear Clem, there is a murderer in the house. Ask your mother if she remembers the dream she had about Bradleigh. That dream is being worked out now. Bradleigh tried to put you out of his way last night. Your glass had arsenic in it. He got a bottle of it while he was in the city, and if you'll get another key to the lower bureau drawer, you'll find his new black coat in there, and the poison in the breast pocket of it. His wife is not dead. It is only a plot to marry your mother and then get rid of her. I am just as 'live as ever I was Clem, and can see things that you can't see. (Signed) Billy—the boss of the night shift.

Did Clem write it in a fit of somnambulism, do you suppose? She must have been clairvoyant also if she did, for every word of it was verified. We found the poison; we found that his wife was living. Of course he left the house, and never returned. We sold the mine that Summer at a large figure, and went East, where my pet met her destiny. After her marriage and departure, I came back to my own beloved state; but I am horribly lonesome without her. However she is coming back to her mother very soon. And now listen. I saw Bradleigh on a narrow street in San Francisco, only a month ago. His appearance proved him to be in a state of utter destitution. I went with him to his miserable home; saw his wife—a woman who might have been cut out of wood, so hard and unfeeling she looked; saw some of his children, they were so beautiful and intellectual looking, I felt that under more prosperous circumstances they could not fail to be a perpetual joy to poor Bradleigh's heart. As it was, his look, whenever it fell upon them, was so full of trouble I can never forget it. It seems so pitiful that our greatest joys, should, under the pressure of an adverse fate, become the fruitful source of our deepest and most poignant sorrows. He told me that if he had two thousand dollars he could buy into a little business he knew of, and so make them a living. Not for all the world would I have turned away from that house without relieving him. For I had learned from him the lesson that circumstances unyielding as fate mould men into what they are. And this lesson had battered down in my mind that pharisaical rampart "I am better than thou;" and had enlarged my ideas until they had come to grasp the great principle of universal brotherhood, with its attendant train of splendid hopes and possibilities for the race.

MEDIUMS.

Mediums are not only subject to spiritual influences, but to mundane ones as well—and as all psychological control is simply a question of the positiveness of will-power on the part of the controller over the controlled, the introduction of a third person, with an antagonistic will, would derange the negative condition of the medium, and in all probability spoil, for the time, the best of mediumship. Ofttimes frail in body and in health, always sensitive in mind and soul, misunderstood of nearly all, shrinking and delicate, the life of the medium is by no means an enviable one. An unkind word or look will often crush them like bruised rose-buds, and though it may be sport to the hand that does it, it is death to those who experience it. It is far easier for an investigator to cry "fraud" or "humbug" than it is for the accused to refute the charges. Shrinkingly sensitive, the accusation paralyzes the accused; the mediumship is thus radically disturbed, and so is closed the very avenue through which the refutation alone could come. How can we expect mediums will thrive if we surround them with suspicion, harshly treat them, or unjustly condemn them upon the strength of, it may be, but one sitting? How easy it is to blot out a life's record with a few scratches of the pen! Would that editors and writers were more cautious in using the possibility! Our own papers, at least, should be the first to set the example. Rather let us build up our cause upon its truths, than be forever hunting down and hounding out those who are not so immaculate as ourselves.—J. J. Morse.

The general average of mankind are not only moderate in intellect, but also moderate in inclinations; they have no tastes or wishes strong enough to incline them to do anything unusual, and they consequently do not understand those who have, and class all such with the wild and intemperate whom they are accustomed to look down upon.—John Stuart Mill.

THE FRIENDS OF PROGRESS.

The following are extracts from an address by A. C. Stowe, on accepting the Presidency of Liberty Circle No. One, I. O. F. P.

The genius of this Order, Friends, is not to promulgate a theory, an ism, nor to crystalize a single idea. It is to unitise as well as elaborate into roundness, fullness and wholeness all the grand factors of reform and progress.

It is to gather up the fragments of truth, and the varied hued threads of experience and weave them into beautiful garments for individual sovereigns to wear. It is to collect the scattered forces of reform, and unite them in a solid phalanx of defence against all incroachments upon our inalienable inheritance of freedom, and educate and mould them into potent agencies for the practical improvement and uplifting of humanity; to secure to the toiler a just recompense for his exhausted muscle and brain; to preach, in kind and benevolent deeds to the hungry and starving ones, the gospel of bread; to break the bonds of the enslaved, and comfort and heal the suffering and broken hearted, and love and bless them into health and happiness; to mould and educate public sentiment into a juster and more humane and rational treatment of the mentally and morally diseased; but above all, to secure at all hazards to the unborn generations good and favorable antenatal conditions, that they may be conceived and gestated in the warm and genial element of love, and born grand and noble and beautiful beings,—so well generated that they shall need no regeneration.

This, Friends, is in part the grand object, and glorious mission of our Order. It is young yet, but in its infancy, nevertheless, it gives signs of great promise. It is acquiring and developing strength and power, and gaining experience for the great work before it. Its first work is to unitise the divided and antagonistic forces of reform, and I am happy to say to you, though young and inexperienced as it is, and though there is much in this direction still to do, yet it has accomplished much. It has been the prevailing and wide spread opinion among reformers, who are disintegrated blocks of the old crumbling institutions, each seemingly revolving in opposite or widely divergent lines of individuality, that no associative movement could unite and harmonize or marshal these apparently divergent individualities into one general line of march; but Our Order has demonstrated that the confusion and antagonism is not real, only apparent from our stand point of view as the retrograde motion of bodies moving in one general direction but with different degrees of velocity.

If we have learned that Individuality is not inconsistent with association, when association is based upon Individual sovereignty, we have accomplished much, and this we have learned, and we shall still learn that a true association will greatly aid and assist individualization.

We all feel, and feeling take courage and rejoice that the discordant and conflicting elements within the Order are being harmonized without the least sacrifice of individuality, or its sovereignty. We all feel I know by the happy faces that greet each other every week, that the circle is our home. These happy faces, the kindly greeting, the charity, friendship and toleration manifested, and above all the earnest and determined purpose to make this Order a practical and potent agent of reform, is but a prophecy of its glorious future.

With regard to the practical work of the Order, Mr. Stowe said:

I deem it important that the special committee who have the matter of devising some plan of co-operation in hand, should as early as practicable report, that the matter may be thoroughly considered and perfected by the Circle. I would also suggest the appointment of a committee of two members whose duties shall be to look after the labor interests of the members, to see that all who desire and need employment shall have it. I strongly recommend that members employ each other and deal with each other in preference to others, yet I would by no means have you forget the needy outside of our Order.

The remainder of the address was mainly in reference to matters of interest only to members of the Order.

CAPITAL, LABOR AND CURRENCY.

The Fortnightly Review for March contains an article on Karl Marx and German Socialism, by John Macdonell. It often happens that adverse criticism sets forth in clearer light, ideas that are attempted to be refuted, and this is one of those cases. One of the points made by Marx is that capital is not, as political economists have asserted, "the child of frugality, but the progeny of serfdom and slavery." There can be no doubt, that there was not a time when capital did not exist, and must have been produced by labor; but labor has more reason to curse than to bless their offspring, that preys upon its parent. The writer, Mr. M., thinks these assertions of Marx are of an astonishing character, and asserts "that at all stages capital is as essential to production as labor." Evidently the writer not only ignores the above fact, but also overlooks another, no less important, which utterly subverts his position, if it is true, as statisticians have asserted, that 99 per cent. of all the business of the world is done on credit. But this sweeping assertion need not be proved; if we can establish the fact that any industry can be prosecuted on credit, the point is gained. There is a large party in the United States who contend that we need no other money or currency than the credit of the nation, and they are rapidly gaining in numbers. They have arrived at this conviction from the fact that in the Eastern States they have had no other currency than the credit of the nation for more than a decade. If we can use the credit of the nation to prosecute our industries, what do we want of capital? It was on this very question that the financial struggle took place in the last Congress. Capitalists see plainly that if industry can produce without the aid of their accumulated wealth they will no longer have the right to levy a tax upon the labor of every industrious citizen of this republic.

In your next issue I will endeavor to elucidate some more of the positions taken by Karl Marx, controverting the theories of the Adam Clark school of political economists. We are doubtless on the eve of the abolition of that slavery that our money system has entailed upon the producers of the country.

WORKMAN.

PRESENTMENT.—Yesterday, in the forenoon, Marshal Mattison, while attending to his duties on the street, as usual, felt an irresistible impulse urging him to go home. Now, remember, his wife and children were all absent. He resisted the hidden impulse for several minutes; the feeling to go home grew stronger, so he started. As he neared his house the impulse had such complete possession of him that he broke into a run. On opening the door he was almost stifled by a dense rush of escaping smoke. The house was in flames. Although the evening previous his wife carefully extinguished the fire, it seems the fire board retained a spark which gradually spread over the board and ignited the surrounding furniture. Had Mr. Mattison been but a few minutes later nothing could have saved the house.—San Bernardino Argus. Digitized by Google

COMMON SENSE is furnished to subscribers for Three Dollars per annum, in advance. To save trouble to subscribers in various localities, friends will receive and forward subscriptions, as follows: C. W. Hoyt, Sacramento; Mrs. G. E. Kirby, Santa Cruz; E. W. Pontius, Seattle; W. J. Sweasy, Eureka; J. M. Orr, Santa Barbara; Dr. E. Stevenson, Virginia City, Nevada; Dr. O. B. Bayne, Ferndale; E. M. Allen, Chico; J. L. Hatch, Santa Clara; Dr. D. W. C. Franklin, Los Angeles; E. B. Pope, San Buenaventura; F. H. Trask, San Diego.

In places where there is no agent, subscribers may remit in gold coin, currency, or by postal order. Address,

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, BUSINESS MANAGER,
Box 2168, San Francisco, Cal.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, APR. 17, 1875.

RENEW YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Three numbers more will complete Vol. 1 of COMMON SENSE. As it is much trouble to take names out of our mailing list, and replace them again, subscribers who intend to renew their subscriptions will please do so without delay. They will then be sure to receive all the numbers. Otherwise they may miss some, and it will be impossible for us to replace them, as we print only the number required from week to week. The prospects of the paper were never better than at present.

THE SOCIETY FOR SELF CULTURE, after two weeks generous self-sacrifice for the benefit of the Dashaway Hall meetings, will again resume its discussion Sunday afternoon, April 18, the subject being, "Resolved, That Christianity is promotive of the highest civilization." The veteran President, James Battersby, will preside. After the discussion new officers are to be chosen. We have not heard of any proposed change, and probably none will be made if the present incumbents are willing to continue to serve.

FREETHOUGHT REVIVAL.—The series of meetings that have been held here recently under the direction of J. L. York, Mr. Battersby and others, closed on Sunday afternoon last. They were largely attended, and in the main profitable, although much crude thought was given by various speakers who claimed the right to be heard. Mr. York is an excellent organizer. With much gapiety, he possesses also the faculty of harmonizing discordant elements, and bringing about good feeling among people who have decided opinions of their own.

A friend of COMMON SENSE, who is the inventor of a steam boiler of novel construction wants to find a man with $500. capital to assist in bringing the invention before the public, the man of money to have one half the patent. The inventor says it is a much needed improvement, and is specially adapted to machinery in small space, and where little power is required. The heat could be obtained from coal, wood, oil or gas.

A meeting to be held in Dashaway Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 18, under the auspices of the International Workingmen, will be addressed by J. L. Hatch of Santa Clara, and others.

IS IT TRUE?

Many infidels are deterred from opposing Christianity because they consider it a conservator of morality, and that were it not for its restraining influences, society would be in a worse state than it is to-day. If this were true, we might well pause in our criticisms; but it is not true. On the contrary, the Christian belief is actually an incentive to evil. It encourages wrong-doing by holding out constantly the hope of forgiveness. Suppose our criminal code were based on a similar foundation, and malefactors had the assurance of pardon on repentance and promise of amendment! The idea is too absurd even for supposition. The effect of such a proviso would be to nullify all human law; and this is just what the Christian "plan" professes to do with divine law. But it is a false assumption, and all its intelligent preachers know it. Such dolts as Hammond are not perhaps dishonest. "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar, * * yet will not his foolishness depart from him." But men like Drs. Patterson, Stone and others know that they are playing a farce which fools pay them for.

Infidels are the true upholders of morality. They hold out no bribe for the wrong-doer. They do not say, "the greater the sinner the greater the rejoicing in heaven over his conversion." They do not offer a premium on depravity, and have within their ranks no wretch so vile that he boasts of his wickedness. They are generally a moral and law-abiding people, and well they may be, as they know that every infringement of law is followed by a penalty. Their "plan," instead of being an easy one for the sinner, is easy only to the virtuous. To the wrong-doer it is truly terrible, having all the rigor of unchangeable law. It is justice without mercy. The Christian religion, on the contrary, not only holds out the hope of forgiveness for all manner of sin, but its "holy" volume contains justification for all the crimes in the calendar. It is a shield for the wicked, a menace to the morally good who cannot accept its dogmas, and a defiance of natural law. It is therefore an impediment to human progress.

So long as only twenty per cent. of the people hold eighty per cent. of the property produced, poverty will exist. The average earnings of a man are about $535.00 a year; of a woman about $237.00 a year; and of a child $131.00. while the average cost of living is between 600.00 and $700.00. How then can a workingman acquire a competency? Half the money in savings banks belongs to other than the laborers. The average of a laborers deposit is only about 55.00 per year. The system of education is defective as it produces men whose heads only are educated. Their hands know nothing. People must be educated so that they may become their own employers, co-operating and making the most of their own labor.—H. K. Oliver.

When people begin to slander and abuse, it is an evidence of the commotion of their own immoral filth. Heaven pity that Pharisaical class of bigots, whose conceit alone raises them above the common level of humanity.

REXFORD VERSUS REXFORD.

Rev. Mr. Rexford, of the Universalist Church, has attracted some attention since his arrival here, by various bold utterances, of which the following concerning Hammond's talks to children is a specimen :

"What monstrous hallucination has come over the minds and hearts of these men that such barbarous fictions should be doled out to children of this or any other city? Is this is our Christianity? If it be so, then out with it; and knowing it to be such let us all become atheists, infidels—anything rather than Christians—for I am sure no greater calamity could befall any mortal than to believe in such a religion or such a God."

So radical have been some of Mr. Rexford's sermons that the Freethinkers had good reason to believe that, if invited to speak before them, he would be at least as liberal in their hall as in his own. He came, and for some reason best known to himself, he took ground exactly contrary to that he had been preaching, referring to Hammond and his crew as engaged in a good work, and characterizing the Freethinkers as destroyers, as breakers-up of homes, as Freelothers, and as grossly immoral. A greater libel on Liberalists was never uttered. It was not only a vile abuse of privilege, but it was grossly dishonest, the man knowing his utterances to be false. Had Mr. Hammond been invited, the audience would have expected such a tirade, and would have given Hammond the credit of honesty, knowing his ignorance, but there is no excuse for Mr. Rexford. He had the opportunity presented to him of telling the truth, and making many friends among the active thinking portion of our people; but he deliberately chose to repel this class, and look elsewhere for his moral and pecuniary support. Some may be charitable enough to hope that he had no selfish motive; but the facts of the case do not make it possible to put any other construction upon his course.

Some of his criticisms were just, and would have done good, had he not repelled all kindly feeling by attributing to his hearers sentiments they do not entertain and actions they abhor. That they sat quietly under such unjust strictures is evidence sufficient that they are not the lawless, hotheaded set of irresponsible persons he was pleased to characterize them.

Mr. Rexford's assertion that the Church is the conservator of morality, the preserver of social order and the active power in the work of civilization, although not true, was expected by his hearers, and was listened to quietly, with but a single word of dissent; though a few who had heard him in his own hall, thought he might even here have made a distinction between true Christianity and the fraud which claims its name. It was only on the preceding Sabbath that the editor of this paper heard Mr. Rexford prove that there is no similarity whatever between the teachings of Christ and the plan of salvation taught by Evangelical Christians. All of Christ's exhortations were in favor of good works, kindness, brotherly love, charity, in short, service to humanity. Mr. Rexford continued :

"Christ said not one word about the redeeming power of his blood, and nothing whatever to justify the claim that a profession of faith in him gives redemption from sin."
* * * "Not only does Christ not lay down such a plan of salvation, but he constantly urges the morality Brother Hammond ignores."
* * * "Real Christianity aims to make people live right in this world first of all."

After speaking of the character of God, as held by Evangelists of the Hammond school, Mr. Rexford said :

"I know no such God. God does not need our service, Christ does not need it; but man does; and serving man is serving God in the most acceptable manner."

He characterized the evangelical conception of Christianity as a "most monstrous misapprehension," and said that such a religion is worse than no religion at all. Yet he comes before the radicals, and tells them that if compelled to choose between the evangelical christians on the one hand, or the rabble, as he called Freethinkers, on the other, he would not hesitate to join the evangelists.

Freethinkers, although the man who tells you this is unworthy of our respect, yet you may learn a lesson from his words, for they prove to you that when the lines are drawn, as they soon will be between bastard christianity and Freethought, many whom we believed to be with us will be found in the ranks of the enemy.

A WORD ABOUT WOMAN

Mrs. L. E. Drake, on Sunday evening last, lectured to a full house in the hall of the Spiritualists' Union, 911 Market street, her subject being "The Status of Woman in Society." She assumed that man is not wholly to blame for woman's deplorable condition. They are the most unjust and uncharitable to their own sex. They are the most willing slaves to the behests of fashion, and the most fearful cowards of Mother Grundy; but, worse than all, they are the most subject to the dominance of the clergy. In her opinion—one held also by Mrs. Kendrick—a large majority of the women, if granted the right of suffrage, would vote to put God in the Constitution, and to favor other demands the priests might make to establish religious tests in this country. She deems it unsafe to grant the right of suffrage to woman, until she has risen in the scale of intellectual being; yet she confidently looks forward to the time when there will be no distinction of sex in civil affairs.

Judge A. M. Crane briefly explained the laws of California with regard to women, showing that they are much more liberal than in other States of the Union.

J. L. Hatch, of Santa Clara, also presented a petition to the Supervisors against the taking of any backward action in the matter of allowing religious instruction in the public schools. The petition was signed by a large number. Mrs. Drake will speak at the same place every Sunday evening during this month. The friends of Free thought should give her a hearing. Her subject on Sunday afternoon is, "Idols, past and present." In the evening she will review Rev. Mr. Rexford's lecture before the Freethinkers.

MATERIALIZATION.

Rev. Mr. Simonds, in the September number of The Living Way, gives an article on "Christianity and Spiritism," in which he says of the Katie King manifestations, reported by Mr. Crooke:

Materializations of the spiritual world are as old as creation, and are repeated every day, but in quite a different way from the manner here affirmed. There are laws by which they may occur in endless variety. But where they do occur the spiritual entirely disappears in the natural, which remains and is subject to natural laws. If Katie King appeared in real natural body, of which the outward senses were certain, then her body should remain natural and abide under natural law ever after, as permanently as the sun, the earth, a tree, or any object of sense whatever. The same law must govern all true materialization.

Where was the body of Katie King after she went back to the spiritual world? It is as impossible to take materiality up to that world as it is to make spirit truly manifest to the outer sense in this. Did Mr Crooke keep her body and show it, as he should, every time she materialized and then went away, he should have forty bodies, more or less, of Katie by this time.

If a body be a material body, reason and philosophy demand it should be shown, and no artifice about it.

"Gather up the fragments," said Jesus, when he had materialized loaves and fishes in the wilderness to feed the seven thousand, besides the women and children, "that none be lost." Material it was created, and material it remained, subject to natural law; no illusion of the senses—no more than the sun, or the earth, or our flesh is an illusion. The sun, earth, stars of heaven, and every plant and animal on the earth, are but materializations of God's thoughts. They abide because God's wisdom and love are permanent. At least, this is in accordance with what I know of this and the spiritual world. I am willing that spiritists should be right, and that I should be wrong. I should be entirely satisfied, if I knew it, to confess it. But I must abide by what I know; and when spiritists appeal to their senses to prove points, and tell me they must abide by what they know, too, I simply have to say, it is not enough that the points are clear to their senses—they should be clear to my senses, and to the senses of all men. Spiritists may form their conditions in the dark; but, when they have materialized, just please let them remember that then all darkness is to be cast aside, the scales and chemist brought in, and the matter analyzed in broad day light.

Our friend Simonds evidently has not closely studied the philosophy of materialization, and is not competent to express such an oracular judgment. It is not claimed that these bodies are made out of nothing. The materials are temporarily borrowed from the medium and other organizations, and are returned again after use. This seems impossible, but we know very little of spiritual chemistry, and are no more prepared to say it cannot be than the Fiji islander is to say a telegraphic message cannot be sent.

The testimony furnished by Prof. Crooke is but a small portion of the evidence now known to substantiate the fact of materialization. The well authenticated phenomena at the home of the Eddy family, the exhibitions at Mr. Mott's house in Memphis, and at Mrs. Andrews' in Moravia, the wonderful materializations in presence of Maud Lord, of Boston, Mrs. Anna Stewart, of Terre Haute, Ind., and Mrs. Compton, of Havana, N. Y., all prove beyond a doubt the fact of materialization. Even the Holmes, of Philadelphia, although they used fraud, when their power failed, are genuine mediums, and some of the materializations in their presence are beyond dispute.

Spirits have repeatedly appeared in the light, have been weighed and reweighed, the weight varying at the pleasure of the spirit; the mediums have been weighed, before, during and after a seance, and the temporary loss of material accurately ascertained. The spirit and medium have repeatedly been seen at the same moment, in some cases the two walking out hand-in-hand before the audience in the light.

The trouble with Brother Simonds is that he wishes to make truth agree with him, instead of lifting himself up to the truth.

J. J. Morse, trance speaker, is to remain in America during the summer, and will probably spend a part of next winter in California. He has engaged to speak in Bangor, Me., in September next, and in Boston in October and November. He may conclude to come to California in January, if encouragement is offered. He has given satisfaction in every place in this country where he has spoken. In Boston, Bangor, and other cities he drew larger audiences than any other speaker on the Spiritual platform. Bro. Morse, with great modesty, attributes all his success to his controlling spirits. Whatever arrangements our Societies in California can make with him should be made at once, otherwise he will accept offers that will prevent his visiting this coast. His address is care of A. J. Davis & Co. 24 East 4th street, New York City.

FREETHOUGHT COMMITTEE.

To Henry L. Knight, Wm. N. Slocum, Mrs. Mary Hanks, Mrs. Augusta Perkins, Mrs. A. W. M. Bartlett, Mrs. Anna F. Smith, A. C. Stowe, Almarin B. Paul, Albert Kendrick, Pat. J. Healy, W. H. Chaney, Capt. C. B. Smith, Mrs. O. M. Dawson, Joseph Swain, Mrs. E. H. McKinley, Lena Clarke, Mrs. A. M. Lewis, Dr. Dean Clarke, and Dr. Wm. R. Joscelyn, of San Francisco; J. W. Mackie and Marshall Curtis of Alameda, Cal. C. P. Hatch and Eleanor Lindsay of Sonoma; J. L. York and J. J. Owen, of Santa Clara; Josiah Johnson and Ferdinand Woodward of Sacramento; J. W. Freeman and H. A. Manchester of San Joaquin; Josephine Walcott and G. W. Stanley of Santa Barbara; D. W. C. Franklin and Thomas A. Garey, of Los Angeles; P. R. Wright of San Bernardino; J. W. Sweasey of Humboldt; A. F. Blood of Butte; Mrs. G. B. Kirby of Santa Cruz; Mrs. Helen W. Baker, of Lake; H. S. Pope of Ventura; Mrs. L. Hutchison of Inyo; and P. H. Trask of San Diego; composing the Committee appointed by the late Convention to devise a plan for a State organization of the Freethinkers of California:

You are hereby notified that a meeting of said Committee will be held in Charter Oak Hall, San Francisco, on Saturday, the 1st day of May, 1875, at 2 o'clock P. M., for the purpose of adopting a plan of organization, and electing temporary officers of such Society.

JAMES BATTERSBY, Chairman.

In the official report of the Free Thought Convention last week, one line was accidentally omitted by the printer. Dr. Joscelyn offered an amendment to insert the words Spiritualists and Liberalists after the word Freethinkers. The words in italic were dropped in setting the type.

LIFE AND DEATH—A LAW OF NATURE.

Death is neither a law of hatred nor a law of vengeance; it is the condition of that which is. God has opposed it to life in order to maintain life.

The flowers of spring must fade, in order that autumn may produce its fruits, generations must pass away, that love may produce its fruits. Life and death act like a single power; the one is charged to clear the place, the other to refill it; their visible end is not to create, not to destroy, but to perpetuate the great spectacle of nature.

Thus, there is nothing more remarkable than the harmony of these two powers, and, if we may so express it, than the equality of their labour. They advance at an equal pace, without overtaking or passing each other; life sows, death reaps, and the reproductions and losses counterpoise each other. The destiny of the world depends upon the preservation of this equilibrium. You could not give death an advantage over life, or life over death, without annihilating creation, for creation is the work of death as well as of life. And, this is so true, that in order to cause life to cease upon the earth, it would be sufficient to establish a single exception to the law of death, we do not say in the human race, but in the most ephemeral being—a plant, a gnat, a fly, a fish. The seeds of a single poppy would cover the earth in six years, and no more than three years would be required for a whitening to encumber the seas with its progeny. Fortunately, death is always on the watch. Foreseeing and preserving, it prevents these frightful multiplications, without ever annihilating the species; it saves the world from the excess of life. In this respect, we will dare to say, that death is but the instrument of life. All its power is reduced to changing the forms of matter which it cannot destroy, and which life again takes from it. Thus, death has only power over the form. The essence of all things escapes it. A similar fact presents to our souls something more than hope! It is, then, from not knowing death that we surround it with apprehension. It is a crime for a man to kill a man, because he takes away that which he cannot restore; but in the hands of God, it opens out a passage to the human race; it calls generations upon the earth. Were the work of death to be suspended, this immense stream would cease to flow. When the perceptible object of death is to multiply existences, can its imperceptible object be to annihilate?

And yet, moralists do not cease to tell us of the terrors of death; some regard it as a scourge, others as a punishment. But if death be a law of vengeance, life is a law of wrath. Wherefore, then, do so many joys and hopes exist in our hearts, so many sublime inspirations in our souls? Wherefore this sun, these harvests, this verdure; the air, perfumes, colours, and the delightful harmonies which indicate more goodness than power? Wherefore is life, in fact, this creation of a double self, one of which, being altogether material, takes possession of heaven; for our life on earth is double, and promises us two worlds. It is true that we arrive in this world without defence and without intelligence, but we also arrive in it beneath the safeguard of maternal tenderness. Then come the sports of early infancy, then the illusions of youth and love, which would suffice to our happiness, since they raise us up to God. We want for nothing in the voyage, and Providence, which foresees all its necessities, has not forgotten its end. It bestows upon us the sentiment of infinity, which it refused to us at our entry into life.

We must dare to say, however singular it may appear, that we apprehend death because we shut our eyes to the benefits of life. If we knew better what God has done for us, we should also know better what he reserves for us. Our double life is a heavenly gift of love and goodness—a magnificent, a gratuitous gift. We were not, and here is a power which was from all eternity, that calls us not only to live and to feel, as all else lives and feels, but also to love him. This power which was, this divinity which created, gave us at first innocence and ignorance, and subsequently opened to us all the paths of imagination and of knowledge. By innocence we attain to the happiness of knowing. These two first conditions of life, which seem to attest our weakness, thus become the source of our sweetest pleasures. Ignorance is the attribute of childhood, it comprises in an unlimited futurity all the joys of love, and a world to contemplate. What a multitude of reasons for loving life! But in proportion as the soul develops itself, as it feels itself free; eternal, infinite, more powerful than all the powers of nature, in proportion as the sentiment of the sublime raises it above worlds and suns, and in proportion as it frees itself from all the pains and pleasures of the flesh, does it imagine a something beyond all that it feels and all that it sees. Oh! then, what numerous reasons are there not for loving death; what numerous reasons for comprehending and hoping in the divine Creator of all things, the Power which was, is and ever shall be; of whom, notwithstanding our weakness, we are permitted to have a glimpse; and to whom, notwithstanding our nothingness, we are allowed to pray.

The life of this world is a happiness, since it is the way which leads us to God. Thus in proportion as life speaks, death loses its terrors, and appears to our souls but as a passage from darkness to light, a gate opening into heaven, at the threshold of which we only leave a corpse; a thing which, says Bossuet, has no longer a name, a handful of ashes. Hence, to die is to be transformed; it is to pass from one life to another, from a world where we seek for truth, to a world where we possess it. Death leads us to God; this is a fact which destroys all its pains.

It is, then, for want of faith that we apprehend death, for want of enlightenment that we crush it; it is the greatest benefit of this life, since it is the end of life. But, do you say, I would not die. Well, be it so. Suppose God to give thee an eternity upon the earth. What a terrible present! Thou wouldst be condemned always to desire, without ever possessing; always to seek, without ever finding; to have constantly a glimpse of, without contemplating; always to love, without ever knowing the God whom thou lovest. Alas! what would life be, if it were restricted to this world, with desires which constantly extend beyond? All that which man seeks, loves, adores, has a glimpse of—where is it? Nowhere here—below. Death then must give us that which life shows us. Death is therefore a good, the greatest good which the soul can conceive; the entrance to an eternity, which would be a punishment upon earth, the accomplishment of the promises which life makes to us.

Man of little faith! thou blasphemest death, and it is by its means that thou mayst possess all the treasures which God permits thee in this life only to have a glimpse of and to desire. To understand death, is to study to live well; to understand life is to be happy in death.

Let us, then, repose fearlessly upon this bed whereon the human race reposes. If wrath do not weigh heavily upon our life, wherefore should it suddenly show itself at our death? The laws of nature are laws of benevolence, which protect us unto the end; and it is perhaps in their last expression that God has placed the great secret of futurity. Observe the dying looks of all creatures directed towards the place where their posterity must be renewed. The butterfly falls near the flower in which it has deposited its eggs; the bird at the foot of the tree which sheltered its nest; the goat dies among its rocks; the bull in the meadows, stretched out upon the rich pasture; but man dies with his head and eyes turned towards heaven, as a symbol of his immortality.

Six hundred millions of people on this globe constantly toil all their lives long, while about 19,000,000 sit quietly and complacently by, gathering the result to themselves. The laboring classes constitute 7-10 of mankind, and in any revolution they have nothing to lose but their chains; as the lowest stratum in society cannot rise without causing the complete disruption of all superincumbent classes we cannot measure the magnitude of the revolution that liberty, justice and equality to these millions involve. To-day they are waking from the lethargy of ages, moving with that healthy discontent that marks every step in progress and for the first time in the history of nations, combining the world over.—Mrs. E. C. Stanton in Earleville Transcript.

Children look little beyond the present moment. If a thing pleases they are apt to seek it; if it displeases they are prone to avoid it. If home is the place where faces are sour and words harsh, and fault-finding is ever in the ascendant, they will spend as many hours as possible elsewhere.

An immense crowd—nearly 12,000 people—went to Woodward's Gardens Sunday to see the great Jackley Vienna Circus Troupe, who appear again Saturday and Sunday, 17th and 18th.

INSPIRATION.

Mrs. L. Hutchison, in a letter recently published, says inspirational speakers ought to be able to tell how they are inspired, and explain the mode by which the invisibles inform them what to say.

Mr. J. J. Morse, an inspirational speaker from England, at present lecturing in the Eastern cities of America, explains quite fully the modus operandi of inspirational speaking. He says:

Theoretically considered, trance-mediumship is the ability of an invisible agent to control the mind or body of its subject, or each together, and by such control to afford an evidence of the existence of the agent inducing it. Practically considered, it is a series of effects produced on muscle, nerve, and mind, by the aid of mesmeric or psychologic power. From the theoretical proposition we are led to believe in the existence of an order of beings, sentient and organic, in nature, who are in possession of powers analogous to our own, and who, from their own condition, are capable of producing similar results to those of the mesmerist, and in the sphere of a similar class of subjects.

In a consideration of the question in its practical aspect, we must admit of the existence of a susceptibility on the part of muscle, nerve, and mind, to the exhibition of certain definite effects; and we must also admit the existence of a power, or "force," capable of, and adapted to, the effectuation of the phenomena witnessed. We can quite easily recognise the existence of such a power in connection with the mesmerist and his experiments, and if it is that trance-mediumship is a similar phenomenon, we must also admit the existence of the "power" or "force" I am speaking of, in that matter as well. And further, I will go so far as to claim a species of identity between the "power," or "force," used in either experiment, my reason for so doing being the identity of results in each case.

That I may be best understood, I will state the results of my own personal experiences in this matter. The first essential I recognize is the closest possible approximation to absolute health, bodily and mentally. The second condition is, that I be surrounded with harmonious persons, and congenial influences. These conditions being present, I seat myself at the desk, and try to absent my mind from my surroundings. The feeling I experience is, usually, a species of electric current passing gently down the arms, on the outward sides, culminating in a shock as it reaches the hand. The current appears to spread, to re-act upwards, and to permeate the brain, more especially the superior or upper portions. The regions of Ideality, Sublimity, Benevolence, Veneration, Causality, Eventuality, Comparison, and also Firmness and Constructiveness, are more or less excited. The current, I have mentioned, induces a pleasant, soothing effect; and a stupor, accompanied by a sensation of falling backwards into nothingness, terminates my consciousness.

An automatic control would enable a spirit to convey its communication verbatim et literaliter, thus enabling it to prove its identity, and establish its individuality. And the medium so controlled would be, in strict meaning, a test-medium. From my observation, and a brief experience, I am brought to the conclusion that in cases of this kind it is the body and the nerves that are controlled, that the medium's mind per se has nothing to do with, and takes no part in, the results produced. Consequently, a definite quality of the "power," or "force," used in these manifestations, can alone produce this class of facts. I am of the opinion that the "definite quality" just referred to, is the muscular and nervous forces of the body acting in conjunction with the perespiri, or "surrounding medium" of the spirit's personality, directed and conjoined to the "surrounding medium," or aural sphere pertaining to the subject. Placed in simple words the foregoing statement implies that by the aid of its will-power the operating spirit joins its external sphere with the external sphere of the medium. That by the aid of such union the spirit is enabled to project its will-power into the nerves and their centres. By the command thus obtained the spirit virtually works the organization of the medium as though it (the spirit) belonged to it, and for the time being puts the rightful owner out of doors, and by the muscular and nervous control thus effected the spirit is enabled temporarily to re-establish a conjunction with a material organism similar to that under which we are enabled to manifest through our own bodies. The value of this class of mediumship is simply incalculable, as affording a deeper insight into the mysteries of the human structure; and of revealing the existence of an extra-mundane intelligence.

"Psychological control" grows out of, or is the unfoldment from the class of control that we have just discussed, and for its satisfactory manifestation should be preceded by the automatic mediumship. Such most certainly was the case in my development. The susceptibility that has been developed during the "outward phase of trance-mediumship, or 'automatic control,'" now enables the operating spirit to control the nerves first, and through them it reaches the mind of the medium, inspires and improves it, and develops a facility and clearness of expression immensely transcending the normal utterances of the subject. But such mediumship is, as a rule, but indifferently fitted for "test" purposes.

"What educational and spiritual benefit has been, or can be conferred by this class of mediumship? In the case of the 'automatic medium,' the educational benefit, personally received, bears no relation to the good done to others. But the spiritual benefit is oftentimes very great indeed. The spirit of the medium is often carried, during trance, into the spirit-world, and there instructed, in such a manner, too, as to completely compensate for the temporary loss of earth-consciousness. The basis of an interior or spiritual development is laid that could not have otherwise been obtained while the medium remained in earth-life. Providing, also, that the development of the medium is under the supervision of intelligent spirits, this phase of mediumship is the seed, the psychological tree, and the inspirational the fruit, rich and ripe, of an orderly and systematic mediumship. In the case of the 'psychological control' the actual educational and spiritual benefits conferred can only be rightly understood and estimated by those who have experienced them. Mental darkness dispersed; the mind illuminated; ignorance dethroned by wisdom; a life of blundering selfishness changed into one of usefulness and harmony; an education of spirit; an opening of the interior chambers of the soul; and an irrigation of the innermost recesses of our nature by the sparkling waters of an ever present inspiration from the good and true in the world Beautiful. Of these things I speak with conviction. My own experience parallels the statement set forth; and I know what a blessed thing mediumship, and the valuable results it brings when directed by wise and beneficent beings on the other side.

Mr. Morse concluded by giving his ideas as to the value of inspirational mediumship to the cause of Spiritualism, which he considers is very great, in fact unequalled by any other phase of mediumship.

"FULL ASSURANCE OF FAITH."—By a long experience I know all that is meant by Christians in the use of this term. But the sense of security, which arises from "faith" in dogmatism, falls far below the confidence which I now repose in what I know to be living, universal, absolute and eternal Law. The Bible describes a God that failed in his work, so much that he is said to have "repented" that he had made man—Gen. 6: 3—"cried in his heart." But Nature's Laws never fail.—LaRoy Sunderland.

"I have a hundred times," says John Stuart Mill, in his autobiography, "heard my father say that all ages and nations have represented their Gods as wicked, in a constantly increasing progression—that mankind have gone on adding trait after trait till they reached the most perfect conception of wickedness which the human mind can devise, and have called this God, and prostrated themselves before it. This ne plus ultra of wickedness he considered to be embodied in what is commonly presented to mankind as the creed of Christianity. 'Think,' he used to say, 'of a being who would make a hell—who would create the human race with the infallible foreknowledge, and with the fore intention that the great majority of them were consigned to horrible and everlasting torments!'"

A FIVE MINUTES SPEECH.

Of the twenty-five little speeches made in the "Inquiry Meeting" at Dashaway Hall, on Sunday, the following, by "Mrs. Dr. Julia Aldrich Joscelyn," is the only one that was not extempore. It was in writing, and is published by request:

We were told by the priest speaker last evening that it is the lowest strata of scientists, religionists and liberalists that are making all this controversy about freedom. Who are the men and women who have battled for human rights? Poets, philosophers, scientists, statesmen, mechanics, etc. Do they belong to the lower strata? No! Victory and truth say ten thousand times, No! It is priestly cant and rule, and unreasoning dogma that have tyrannized and oppressed mankind in every hideous form that tyranny is capable of—burned to death; hung on gibbets; immured in lonely dungeons; thrown into pits where they became impaled on spikes!

The heart sickens to enumerate the horrors that have been practiced upon humanity under priestly rule; and now they are playing their last game over the civilized world to-day, to bring about a reaction for tyranny and oppression of every kind. They would take away your liberties and overturn this Republic, and make it a priestly despotism with their God in the Constitution. Shall it be? Can it be? Will you, men and women of Free Thought, once more submit to the despotism of priestly rule? Down with the glittering absurdities that have been presented to you, and up with the Banner of Science and Nature, and the great cause of humanity.

We were told by the speaker of the "innumerable last legs," and considerable amount of lung breathing power yet existing in this Christianity. Yes, we are aware that this many-headed monster is upon us, and we know if we do not unite and work with a will for its speedy overthrow, our liberties are gone.

PUBLIC SEANCES.

We publish the following in accordance with our rule to give both sides of all questions a fair show, yet we must be allowed to say that the notice referred to was not intended as a "report" of the seance, but merely as comment on it, and every word of it was true, as nine-tenths of those present can testify:

EDITOR COMMON SENSE.—The report of the failure and inharmony of the Seance held at Dashaway Hall on Anniversary Evening is incorrect. The facts are as follows—Mrs. Cummings gave a convincing Test—described a Spirit—gave the name and went into the audience and selected the friend to whom the spirit belonged. Mr. Jackson gave a good test to Mrs. Ada Hoyt Foye—giving the peculiar phraseology of the spirit and name. Mrs. Kerns and Mrs. Aitken gave tests that were recognized. Dr. Joscelyn described four spirits that were recognized, giving their leading traits of character and the diseases with which they passed away,—moreover, two of the gentlemen friends of the spirit came to the Dr. the next evening and expressed great satisfaction with the accuracy of his descriptions. I know of no inharmonies connected with that seance. Such a report is poor encouragement to the mediums who were specially invited by the General Committee of Management, that it might add to the pecuniary success of the Anniversary. Yours for Truth and Justice.

MRS. DR. JULIA ALDRICH JOSCELYN.

MARRIAGE CONTRACT.

Whereas we, the undersigned, mutually hold the opinion that neither Church, State or public opinion has any moral or equitable right to direct, or interfere with, or just claim to be consulted as to the manner in which the people shall pursue their social happiness; and especially not as to how the relations between men and women—such as the spontaneous sympathies, affections and wants of their nature suggest and demand—shall be formed or dissolved; and having exchanged ideas and sentiments as to the respect, sympathy and love that we each entertain for the other, and conscientiously disregarding the arbitrary regulations and practices of what we understand to be an unhappy and unnatural state of society we hereby adopt this as the best and most satisfactory form by which to declare our marital union, as, in our judgments, it presents the clearest expression of our mutual pledges and obligations. Therefore, having obtained the requisite license, we do hereby declare and publish ourselves husband and wife, in the presence of these subscribing witnesses.

Dated at Santa Clara this 4th day of April, 1875.

ALEXANDER J. SPENCER,
EVA WALSH,

Witness: { GEO. A. ELLIOTT,
H. W. ELLIOTT.

In consideration of the above declaration of marital agreement, and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the laws of this State, I declare Dr. Alexander J. Spencer and Miss Eva Walsh husband and wife.

J. L. HATCH, Minister.

SANTA CLARA, April 4th, 1875.

I am frank to confess that immortality has not been proven. That many stubborn objections at times obstruct my search for a foundation for this hope I also admit; but I am not willing to say that my subjective state is the highest possible condition for investigating the subject, and that my knowledge is the final limit of a man's comprehension of his being. If there is a spiritual existence outside of this life I believe it is a natural existence, subject to and controlled by fixed laws as this life is; and hence its truths accessible through a natural process of investigation. But I do not know what conditions may be necessary to bring this world of "untried being" under the scrutinizing eye of science. Can any student of physical science affirm that he has all of the conditions necessary for the fullest discovery in any experiment he may make in the investigation of his subject? Have great discoveries in other fields of research been the fruits of the first efforts of those who explored the "unknown" for new truths? Why should we be so impatient, then toward the tardiness of spiritual discoveries?—H. Clay Neville.

THE COMMON LOT.—We are prone to imagine that our temptations are peculiar; that other hearts are free from secret burdens that oppress our energies, and cast a cloud upon our joy; that life has for others a freer movement and a less embarrassed way. But the more we know of what passes in the minds of others, the more our friends disclose to us their secret consciousness, the more do we learn that no man is peculiar in his moral experience—that beneath the smoothest surface of outward life lie deep cares of the heart,—and that, if we fall under our burdens, we fall beneath the temptations that are common to man, the existence of which others as little suspect in us as we do in them.—J. H. Thom.

Two girls attending a seminary in Illinois set two chickens fighting in their room last Sunday. Bets on the result ran high, and at the conclusion of the contest the winning maiden was "better" by a gold watch, a pair of silk stockings, a French corset, two rolls of false hair, a patent bustle, and a beautiful book mark with "Christ our Guide" worked on it in colored silk.—Boston Investigator.

THE MINER'S GRAVE—THE QUESTION OF THE DAY.

BY I. A. HEALD.

Above the ranch, on the hill which o'erlooks the deep ravine,
Wherein the spruce and live oak wear their everlasting green,
There's a rude and lonely grave, marked by neither wood nor stone,
(A grave seems far more lonely when neglected and alone),
And I learned that from a distant State, in days long since gone by,
A stranger came to search for gold, but laid him down to die
In yonder cabin on the ranch, one pleasant Summer day,
Where soon his late companions met and bore his form away
To yonder hill, where now he sleeps. But little there was said,
They knowing that mere empty words could not bring back the dead;
So they filled his rocky grave with the yellow earth and stone,
Then hurried back in search of wealth, and left him there alone.
Alone? Not quite, for near his grave the California pine
Stands sentinel to guard what was the "human form divine;"
And though the deer and grizzly, man has frightened from the hill,
The fox, the coon, the rattlesnake are yet his neighbors, still;
And I thought of friends and kindred in some far-off happy home,
Who oft have wondered where he is, and why he left to roam
Far from the happy scenes of youth, though shrewdly may have guessed
That he still seeks his fortune in the distant, mighty West;
While perchance his patient mother, whom he left so long before,
Oft weeps because her absent boy returns to her no more.
I'll plant the weeping willow o'er thy man-forsaken grave,
As emblem of thy mother's love—long may its branches wave;
May no rude pick disturb thy bones, whate'er thy race or clan,
Thou stranger whom I never saw, yet still a brother man.
Then beneath the manzanita, where no kindred come to weep,
Rest peacefully forevermore in thy long, dreamless sleep!
The grand old cedar which has braved the storms a thousand years,
Still lives, while man goes down to death 'mid all his hopes and fears,
Ere scarce one battle for success is either lost or won,
He sinks beneath his mother earth as sinks the setting sun.
We know the sun will come again through earth's eternal rounds;
But is the soul immortal which has reached its earthly bounds?
Do spirits of the "loved and lost" return to us no more—
Or shall we meet in future on some far-off heavenly shore?
O ye reverend theologians, who have preached so loud and long,
Ye priests grown fat and lax with that same old threadbare song
Of forms, professions, creeds and faith, repentance, hope and fear,
The people have progressed beyond and left you in the rear;
Know ye not in all your wisdom what the present age demands?
Your platform is too narrow, for the human mind expands;
If you would rear a structure to defy the hand of time,
Commence at the foundation, and your work may stand sublime;
Let knowledge be your corner-stone, take reason for your guide,
First prove to us that they still live, whom we oft say have died;
A sure foundation then once laid on the progressive plan,
'Twill be an easy task to lead a thinking, reasoning man;
For proof he'll have, or still reject your creeds, your faith, advice;
You'll preach to such (as ye do now) at random for a price;
While ye learned men of Science, who oft prove effect from cause—
Ye world-renowned Philosophers who've searched great Nature's laws,
Combine your wisdom, one and all, then answer, if ye can,
The question of the day and hour—Is this the end of man?

DR. R. P. FRELOWS, THE GREAT HEALER.—This distinguished Magnetic Physician has been before the public for many years, during which time he has performed the most astonishing cures ever recorded in the history of healing, ancient or modern. He is now permanently located at Vineland, N. J., where he is devoting himself to healing the sick in every State in the Union by his Magnetized Powders. The cures that are being performed almost daily by the powder, speak volumes in its favor. It can be procured of the Doctor at $1 per box, or $5 for six boxes. Why remain in your diseased condition?

FOR EIGHTEEN YEARS.

BY HELEN W. BAKER.

Within the circle of your arms I lay
Last night, and dreamed bright dreams, but not of you;
My vagrant thoughts had wandered far away
Where lilies bloom, and vines are wet with dew.
For eighteen years I've been your faithful wife;
Your very own by bond and title deed.
Yours in the semblance of my outer life
To the last atom of the marriage creed.
And you—say do you ever think of me
As one apart from these hard outer ties,
Or know the semblance of my loyalty
Is simply one of habit's life long lies?
I sometimes wonder who of all the world
Knows me so little as my husband knows,
Or cares so little for the hopes imperiled
Within my breast—hopes colored like the rose—
Stretching fair tendrils to the unseen light—
Longing for love and tenderness from one
Whose kindred thought with sympathetic might
Shall rive my clouds and greet me like the sun.
And like the sun awake to life and bloom
Those myriad seed whose magical forecast—
I dimly feel, still latent in the womb
Of teeming fancy—in whose storehouse vast
What wondrous things lie dormant 'till the spark
Of kindred thought has brightened them to flame,
To hope, to dream to long, down in the dark—
Is this the treason should blush to name?
Suppose we two were dead, we so concealed
In robes of flesh, though standing face to face—
Say, would we in the naked souls revealed
The faintest semblance of each other trace?
Where would my husband be, and where his wife?
"Sure we are strangers; have we met before?"
Once in the halcyon days of early life
We touched and parted, and will meet no more.

THE WONDERFUL HEALER AND CLAIRVOYANT
MRS. C. M. MORRISON.

This celebrated Medium is the instrument or organism used by the invisibles for the benefit of humanity. The placing of her name before the public is by request of her Controlling Band. They, through her organism, treat all diseases and cure in every instance where the vital organs necessary to continue life are not destroyed. Mrs. Morrison is an

UNCONSCIOUS TRANCE MEDIUM, CLAIRVOYANT AND CLAIRAUDIENT.

From the very beginning, hers is marked as a most remarkable career of success, such as has seldom if ever fallen to the lot of any person. No disease seems too insidious to remove, nor patient too far gone to be restored.

Mrs. Morrison, becoming entranced, the lock of hair is submitted to her control. The diagnosis is given through her lips by the Band, and taken down by her Secretary. The original manuscript is sent to the Correspondent.

When Medicines are ordered, the case is submitted to Mrs. Morrison's Medical Band, who give a prescription suited to the case. Her Medical Band use vegetable remedies, (which they magnetize) combined with a scientific application of the magnetic healing power.

Diagnosing disease by lock of hair, $1.00. (Give age and sex.)

SPIRITUALISM, ITS PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY, SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE, ETC.

VOL. 1.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1875.

No. 49.

Signs of the Times:

The Palace Car company own 800 cars, which are operated on 32,000 miles of road. The average cost of these cars is $17,500.

The Kingdom of Heaven fails to see that Spiritualistic bigotry is any more agreeable than Christian bigotry, which some of us profess to despise.

Judge Walsh, of Brooklyn, has decided that a woman has no right to open her husband's letters. How would he decide if the case were reversed?

The British Medical Journal says Messrs. Moody and Sankey, the American Revivalists, have considerably added to the number of lunatics in Great Britain.

In Michigan, it is said, gas is being obtained in the manufacture of charcoal, one cord of wood making 35,000 cubic feet of good gas at a cost of only 18 cents per thousand feet.

Among recent curious inventions is the application of the camera obscura to a railroad car, imparting to the traveler a moving picture of the country through which he is passing.

Mr. Huxley feels no interest in Spiritualism, because the only case he ever saw was an imposture. Mr. Olcott remarks on this: "Mr. Huxley never saw but one case of 'spiritualism;' that case proved a fraud and no spiritualism; therefore Spiritualism is a fraud."

Judge Hoar is reported to have said recently to a friend: "My friend, you have got to reorganize the old party of liberty, begin at first principles, and fight the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence over again before we can have peace and quiet in this country."

A dark house is always an unhealthy house, always an ill-aired house, always a dirty house. Want of light stops growth, and promotes scrofula, rickets, etc., among the children. People lose their health in a dark house; and if they become ill they cannot get well in it.

A theatrical company were lately returning from Baltimore to New York on the midnight train. At four or five o'clock in the morning, as they came to a halt, the brakeman called out the name of the station, "Elizabeth!" This awoke a ballet girl, who exclaimed: "Where's Beecher?"

A recent drift in the Belcher mine proved that the rocks in the vicinity of the fire which occurred in the mine last October are still red hot, notwithstanding it has been five months since everything combustible was consumed. The Virginia Enterprise says: When we find so small a mass of rocks as can be contained in the bottom of a shaft remaining hot for over five months, after having been heated to whiteness, should we be incredulous on being assured by scientists that the center of the earth, once a molten mass of rock, still remains in a molten state after untold ages? Nearly three years after the great fire in the Yellow Jacket mine, places were found in the lower levels where the rock was still red hot.

All the countries of Europe are to be competitors in the Centennial Exhibition to be held in Philadelphia in '76.

There have been five changes of Ministry in France since May 1873, less than two years.

In 1875 the consumption of tobacco in France amounted in value to only $5,000,000. In 1874 the sales footed up $57,400,000.

Ohio has a larger number of colleges and universities than any other State in the Union, but not as many students as New York.

A woman in Louisville has sued a Lodge of the Knights of Pythias for $50,000 for fatally injuring her husband during the initiation ceremonies.

Some scientist states that ants produce vocal sounds, but their pitch is so high as to be inaudible to man. How does he know?

Scribner's Monthly calls Woman Suffrage "that physiological folly." If physical strength is the criterion, why not accord the suffrage to horses and asses?

A Michigan man raised five lemons on a tree which he keeps in a hot-house. It took four tons of coal, and he sold the lemons for twenty cents. Let us have a protective tariff on lemons!

The Fall River (Mass.) School Committee has adopted a resolution recommending that the senior class in the Girls' High School appear in American calico on the day of graduation, instead of costly dresses, as has been the custom.

Ohio has a law for the compulsory education of children, and the question is now before the Legislatures of Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana. The California law is not very effective. It might as well not be on the statute book.

When Tyndall says he finds in matter the promise and the potency of all forms and qualities of life, the deist asks, Who put them there? ignoring the meaning of the assertion, which is that they were not put there, but that they have always been there, properties of matter itself.

Recently four members of the School Board of Medina, New York, voted in favor of the discontinuance of religious services in the public schools. A meeting of church people was held, and 1226 citizens signed a paper requesting them to resign. Religious fanatics act as a unit, and therein lies their strength.

The Catholics in several eastern cities have proposed to give up their parochial schools to the Public School Board, provided that the city shall lease the school rooms now used by the Catholics, employ the teachers, if competent, and that there shall be no religious instruction during school hours, and all attendance on such instruction out of school hours shall be voluntary. Poughkeepsie has accepted the offer; Buffalo has rejected it, New York City is undecided, and in other places, they are waiting to see how the thing works. There should be no hesitation about such an offer. Every vestige of religious instruction should be banished from the schools, then the Catholics and Protestants can give at home or elsewhere just such theological instruction as they choose. There is nothing to prevent that now.

MY RELIGION.

For Common Sense.

BY J. W. MACKIE.

Religion, according to Webster, "is the recognition of God as an object of worship, love and obedience; right feelings towards God as rightly apprehended; piety." Piety, on the same authority, in its primary meaning, is "filial reverence, affectionate reverence of parents, friends or country." Then I am pious, therefore religious. But if religion consists in the "recognition of God as an object of worship, love and obedience," then I have no religion. The Infinite, the Eternal, is beyond the recognition of any finite being; and though we know that the infinite and eternal must exist, we can recognise only the finite and temporal. Our reason reveals to us that space and duration are indefinite; nor can we by any possible cogitation conceive of a beginning or creation of existence, or its destructibility.

And though we may wonder at and admire the manifold manifestations of organic motion and life, everywhere around us, whether seen or felt by our unaided senses, or by the aid of instruments, near by or away off in the far distant starry depths and heights, yet we can recognize in it all only the finite. To me, it would be presumptive folly to attempt to discover the primal cause of all things, or even to discover whether there be a primal cause. If it be folly to dream of finding out God, it is, if possible, a greater folly to expect a revelation of his will. Were you or I to receive a revelation from Queen Victoria, how would we know that it was from her? If her majesty should graciously condescend to reveal herself to me, how would I know that her Britannic Majesty truly did appear to me? Her own assertion could not reveal the fact, so that I could be certain. Only those who were personally acquainted with her, who had seen her officiating as queen, could be certain of the royal presence.

Who then among men can say they have conversed with the Almighty? Who is he that has traversed illimitable space, and acquainted himself so well with all existing intelligences as to be able to recognise the Highest? To know that the Highest Intelligence speaks to you, you must have made the acquaintance of all other intelligences, and be able to judge of their intelligence—in other words, you must be the Infinite. And if I the finite, can only judge of or recognise the finite, is it not supreme folly to talk of revelations from the Infinite?

So my duties, my responsibilities, my loves, my piety and religion must rest and abide among finite things. If my religion must then be so definite, so limited in its scope, would it not be well to confine it within those boundaries by me the better understood? The centre of this circle is necessarily myself, from which must flow to its utmost irradiation, whether in duties, loves or responsibilities, all the qualities of self. He therefore who is false to himself must be false to the full extent of his influence.

He who understands the best his immediate relationships and their requirements, and does his best to fulfill all that is required of him, is within that circle the most religious, the most pious of men. The greatest is he whose circle is the most extended and all his parts in it conscientiously performed, religiously fulfilled.

To be able to perform my duties to myself, making home harmonious and happy, to deserve well of my country, to be able unflinchingly to look every human being in the face, and say, "I have done my duty," I must give self room to grow. So far as I am able, I must make all of myself possible, physically, mentally, spiritually and, if you please, religiously. Nothing must be cramped, or subverted to uses degrading to self-hood; I must flinch from no truth, pleasant or otherwise; shrink from no duty made clear to my conscience; or meanly escape those sacrifices and acts of self denial necessary to the discipline of the imperfect members of the human family.

Can anything more be added to my religion? "Yes," says some one, "you owe a duty to the life to come." Indeed! My circle of experience only touches the grave; beyond it I have no knowledge, but if, within that circle, I have done my duty well, and made the world a little better by having lived in it, and feel myself nobler, larger, and more of a man as the years flow by, what have I to dread in the supposed life to come—what duty can it require of me that is left undone? I do not know.

It is indeed a trying hour when death robs us of our heart treasures. When the friend of our youth, a loved parent, the wife of our bosom, the little prattling babe that has wound itself round and round our hearts, till our life and everything seems wrapped up in it, have departed, or in whatever shape the ever unwelcome visitor comes, what consolation is there for us, laden with heavy hearts, as we consign the lifeless remains to the grave? You tell me, "They still live." Be it so. But to me they live not. My departed friends have sealed the truth in silence; no whispering voice, no gentle token of their continued life and love has ever come to me. They only live in my affections and memory, and my consolation consists in revering their memory or emulating their virtues. And when Death comes to me at last, as come it will, may I have so lived

"That when the summons comes to join

The innumerable caravan that moves
To the pale realms of shade, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
I go not like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach my grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

There is a class of people who say that they go for pure piety, for peaceful devotion, and don't want their souls harassed with reminders of earth, its sins, and its follies; with drivel about justice and equality; to this end they would build a church. They want a church in which to contemplate God, the angels, and heaven. That is what they will pay their money for. Just as children like to be told fairy tales, and believe in them, they like to be entertained with angelic romances: they hear with delight of the gates of pearl, and the streets of gold, and of the rest that remaineth for all who pay their fee into the heavenly plan.—S. H. Morse.

PATHETISM.

For Common Sense.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN THE AUTHOR AND THE READER, ON THE HUMAN WILL.

Reader. If I understand you correctly, this term, will, when used to signify a mental function, can truly mean nothing more nor less than the power of choice in the use of means. It is the condition of mind in which we are conscious of love, desire, a preference of one before another. But I have heard of results produced in mesmerism, when the patient could not have had any previous knowledge of the operating will; and how are these to be accounted for?

Author. When they occur, which is not very often, I am sure, it is only in cases where the patient has had some previous experience with the operator, and such a Relation established between them that enables the patient, by clairvoyance, to know what the operator's wishes are.

R. Well, that seems to me very probable indeed. I have often tried to produce results on others by mere volition, and this explains the reason why I never succeeded.

A. And so you might "will" till doomsday, if there be no other means used but your will, before the choice is made, you will find your will powerless outside of your own person. No such case was ever known, where, for instance, a person was intranced, who had never previously had any idea of that state, and this trance produced by the mere volition of some other person at a distance.

R. And, did you see that account in COMMON SENSE, Oct 31, 1874, page 297, of feats performed at Jacksonville, Oregon, by Hon. I. Cox, in which he "caused the movement of sticks of wood, nine feet long, upon the platform by the force of his mind or will?"

A. Yes, and I was sorry that such an account should have appeared in the paper without a strong rebuke of the fraud by which the people in Oregon had been gulled by those tricks. And here is the manner in which any common juggler will cause a cane or other light stick to move, when not far from his person: It is done by first attaching a horse hair, or fine, black thread, to the stick. The thread is not seen by which the stick is moved.

R. And I suppose, then, you would not concede the human will can act on a piece of wood, surely not, if it is not a force in any case, outside of the mind by which the choice is made?

A. Christianity has taken the lead in teaching this error. It was the germ of witchcraft. And misinterpreted phenomena in mesmerism, when people were less informed in regard to Psychology than they are now, has contributed to keep it in existence. We are all of us but too ready, like children, to take any, and all things, for granted. The child takes it for granted that father knows everything; and so what father says must be true; and so must all be true that father's neighbor says.

R. And it has occurred to me, that I have had a good deal to unlearn in my day, as much as I could now be said to know.

A. And, it is in regard to things not readily known, that we are so apt to take all things for granted; things respecting which there can be no evidence whatever. Look around and count the churches in your neighborhood.

R. I will do so; and in the mean time, I hope to have another chat with you.

A. And, so we close here.

GOLD PRODUCTIONS.

It has been asserted that the production of Gold and silver is attended with an amount of expense quite equal if not greater than twice its value. This assertion seems to have been verified by the condition of all the bullion producing countries on this continent. Notably is it the case in Mexico, at this day, and was also true of all the South American States while their prominent industry was the production of gold and silver. Many people will remember that prior to the discovery of gold in California this fact was often a subject of comment in our newspapers, that were prone to congratulate us that we had no mines of the precious metals in our country.

What would become of us or of any other country if all our industries were prosecuted under similar circumstances? What would become of California if every bushel of wheat was produced at a cost of two dollars and had to be sold for one? That it is true that all the gold and silver in the world has cost two dollars for one is an admitted fact, ascertained by careful computations. Many people will deny this from interested motives, and more will be unable to credit its truth; but if we go into the adjoining state of Nevada and examine all the unproductive workings on the Comstock lode and its branches, and compute the vast sums that are expended in prospecting for lodes, and calculate the small percentage of dividends compared with the amounts expended on dividend paying mines, we shall readily understand a fact which otherwise seems quite incomprehensible. How can we believe that nations will from century to century continue to prosecute an industry that impoverishes the country and the people?

If these assertions are true, we may well enquire why we have not attempted to adopt a system to regulate the workings of mines that will prevent this wasteful expenditure of money and labor. It could hardly be done in a free country. It was attempted in Mexico, but did not succeed even there, under despotic rule. There are many reasons why we and other nations continue to prosecute this suicidal industry. The most prominent is that these metals are considered absolutely necessary for money, or as a basis of currency. A large and respectable class of people in the United States, and their numbers are rapidly augmenting, deny this intoto.

But while considering this question of bullion production, there is another which I have not time now to discuss, but which should not be lost sight of. If we economize the labor wasted in this manner what is to become of the laborers thrown out of employment? C.B. S.

THE TWO EXTREMES.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—To the Lawyer, Doctor, Minister and Legislator, to the Merchant and Banker, it seems all right that they should leave their luxurious couches long after the sun rises, leisurely perform their morning toilets, and sit down to a table covered with the choicest viands the market affords. To the laboring classes it seems all wrong that they should be compelled to rise from their wretched beds while it is yet dark, cook their own miserable food, and go forth to work for the benefit of those who, by diligent enough to comprehend, plunder them of the profits the aid of ingenious devices, which the masses are not intelligent of their labor and leave many of them in a condition worse than that of the negro slave.

Our boasted christian civilization is to these two classes a very different thing. To one it says, "Suffer patiently; bear the ills you were born to, and you shall receive your reward in heaven." To the other class it says, "God has blessed you with an abundance of this world's goods; you can eat drink and be merry, while your less fortunate brothers and sisters (in the sight of God) are slaving; therefore you should give freely to the Church."

Nature provided her inexhaustible bounties for all; but the selfish and grasping, who are also intelligent, have under our Christian Civilization, monopolized her blessings. The menials who toil that the rich may have ease, are invited to sing psalms in praise of this holy institution, and if they refuse they are denounced as "infidels," "communists," destroyers of the peace of Society, and revilers of all that is good.

WORKMAN.

COMMENTS.

Our "Workman" may be an exception, but most workmen feel the effects of an evil, and chafe under it, without any clear idea how to make things better. If "Workman" could get out of his condition in life, and obtain possession of wealth, possibly he would take his ease, and think it no sin. Perhaps he would even become conservative, and be in favor of keeping things as they are. He would then say, "the hope of obtaining wealth is the greatest incentive to human action. It is the spring that moves the world." That's what all the rich men say. "Take away the reward and you kill all enterprise;" and this argument is good, so long as we favor the retention of our present monetary system. If we cannot strike at the root of the evil, we might as well let it alone for a future revolution to overturn.

There is however a remedy; an adequate and peaceful remedy; but to enforce it will require the united action of the laboring people, and even then it will be a stupendous work. The trouble in our system is the power of wealth to add to itself. Interest is the great bane of this age, as it has been of previous eras. Usury laws are futile. The exactions of money lenders cannot be prevented by the direct action of law, but they may be by Government itself loaning its credit to the people. We print on page 589 an article, "Barbarian Money," which contains some good practical suggestions, although the plan proposed is probably more cumbersome than experience would prove to be necessary. The multiplicity of office holders under this plan would be an objectionable feature. We have too many office holders already. (This country has no use for an army, and very little for a navy, while its army of tax collectors might be greatly reduced under a proper system.) Without taking measures so radical as those Mr. Linton proposes, the Government could afford great relief by abolishing national banks, and issuing its own currency, exchangeable at the will of the holder for bonds. This would regulate the supply of currency, and would have a tendency to reduce rates of interest. Then by a system of graduated taxation the accumulation of great wealth would be prevented, and capital would no longer oppress labor. But the difficulty in the way of accomplishment of such a reform is that men who have money are sent to make our laws, and possessors of wealth are naturally conservative. Even if a poor man is sent to Congress he soon becomes aristocratic, and considers the people his servants instead of the reverse. There has been a great deal of talk on this subject to very little purpose, but the people are now becoming enlightened, and the day is not distant when an adequate remedy will be found and applied.

FREEDOM AMONG FREETHINKERS.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—Some of my friends, who call themselves Freethinkers, tell me that if I believe in deity I "must necessarily believe in a personal God," and thus go back to the ranks of superstition. To this I demur. When the Ultra Atheistic school make plain to me what they mean by the "Creative Force in Nature," the "Power and Potency of Matter," and such other vague and ambiguous expressions, I will undertake to define to them what I mean by the word "God." It seems that a man cannot be considered a Free Thinker unless he yields his convictions to the dogmas of Atheistic Nihilism. It is a good deal yet like the old churchman's definition of orthodoxy. "My doxy is orthodoxy, your doxy is heterodoxy. I think it is time we rid ourselves of this pseudo-scientific infallibility, and live up nearer to that good old precept, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you." How can I be considered free in my thought if I have to yield my assent, unwillingly and against my reason to another man's postulate? Am I any freer than I was before? That is all the Pope wants of me. I rebel, and refuse to stultify myself in accepting any doctrine. No matter how plausible it may look to the whole world, if it does not conform to what my reason dictates, it is not the best for me. I claim that I am a free thinker, and cheerfully recognize any others as such who do their own thinking, no matter what form of belief such thought may lead them to, provided they do not force me to accept the result of their convictions, or refuse to accord me that respect and toleration which they ask for themselves.

I bundle the collective forces of nature together and call them God. I believe in that God. I believe furthermore that that God had a purpose in placing me here, and I believe that purpose is best subserved by living up to my highest convictions; and I believe these convictions are ever changing, so that what may be right for me to-day may be wrong for me to-morrow; and I further believe that when I shuffle off this mortal coil, that God, who placed me here, is abundantly able and willing to arrange my future existence—if any should be necessary for the fulfillment of the Eternal Economy—in the pleasantest possible manner for me and all parties concerned. This is my faith. I ask no one to subscribe to it, and will think—or try to think—just as much of them for honestly differing from me. Nay more, I will do all that I can to protect them in the exercise of their belief, providing it does not infringe on the freedom of some other being's personality. This is my faith to-day. I claim the right to change it to-morrow, though such act should contradict the rest of my life, ever the same, yet ever changing.

"To do good is my religion, and the world is my country." In adopting this quotation as a part or the whole of my creed, I claim no merit for it, unless I do the good, and welcome all men as Brothers; nor do I claim that I live up to these sentiments; but I am trying to think that 'tis my desire to do so. Yours truly, a tolerant free thinker,

PAT. J. HEALY.

ADDRESS BY MRS. C. M. STOWE.

BEFORE THE SOCIETY FOR SELF CULTURE.

Resolved that Christianity promotes the highest civilization.

Christianity calls our attention to the Bible for counsel and instruction, and are we benefited?

If civilization means progress in the Arts and Sciences, certainly the Bible cannot be valuable either as a guide or counselor.

To follow in the footsteps of any one of the characters held up for us to pattern after, by the exponents of the Bible, would greatly lower our standard of morality. Christianity has never given birth to a single reform or invention of any kind to bless the world. It asks you to lay aside reason, and accept the teachings of its expounders as a guide. Christianity asks you to accept all that comes from the Bible as true, and it condemns any who reject even those parts that contradict themselves. I have heard time and again these words from the pulpit, "You must take the whole Bible or none," and the meaning of it is, take it according to their interpretations.

When Temperance societies were in their infancy the church of which I was a member forbade the attendance of any of its members, and condemned the societies as infringements on the rights of the church; and when, in after years, they were forced by public opinion to welcome Temperance, they opened their saintly arms and hugged the infant almost to death, and would have buried it out of sight had not the infidel world stepped in and nursed it again into life.

Every advance step in science has been opposed by the church until public opinion has forced its acceptance, and wherever church views have been held tightest ignorance and superstition have most abounded.

Thomas Paine has been a subject of condemnation from every pulpit in the land. I have heard him held up to scorn by preachers who were looked upon as shining lights by the saintly worshipers at the Throne of Grace. Yet he did more for truth and freedom than any other man of his day, and as civilization advances he will stand high in the hearts of the people long after every pulpit in the land has crumbled and fallen to the ground, and priests have been forced by public opinion into better appreciation of the truth. I have heard from the pulpits of Christian churches every secret Order condemned by those who claimed to be expounders of God's laws. I have heard Masonry denounced by those Godly saints who understood not the first principle connected with it. Theatres have been denounced as dens of infamy, and those artists who have spent their lives and talent to fit themselves for the stage have been branded by the American pulpit as hell deserving souls.

Actors of unimpeachable character have been denied Christian burial because of the bigotry that reigns in the churches. To-day public opinion has forced itself so close to the church that it can no longer be ignored, and the result is that the "little church round the corner" has opened its door to the voice of the people.

Atheists and infidels have done more for the advancement of civilization than any other class of men, for they have dared to think and act outside of the barrier of the Christian church. They have taken reason for their guide, and have been rewarded by the truth.

Christianity cannot and does not mean religion, for man is naturally a religious being, and ever worships that which comes nearest his ideal of perfection.

Religion is inherent in all nations and tribes of humanity. As civilization advances, Christianity is forced into more liberal views, and the dead carcasses are being buried out of sight.

Christianity does not promote the highest civilization unless you can call gambling high. Go into the church festivals and behold the grab-bag, from two to four bits a grab, and the grab-bag is only a specimen of their games. Articles are put up to raffle for. I have at this time in my possession a ticket for which was paid one dollar to the overseers of the church at Gold Hill for the privilege of throwing dice for a Bible.

What think you is the effect of such a course on the young? Certainly this does not promote the highest civilization. At Petaluma some years ago while trying to raise funds for the benefit of the Methodist church, ladies went from place to place to entice men into their festivals to eat and drink with them until the wee small hours of night; not because they were hungry, but that they might coax from them all the money they could. I heard several citizens of the place say that church beggars were so numerous that they were a decided nuisance. Many would buy tickets to get rid of being importuned when they could not in justice to themselves and families afford to do so. Think you that such a course promotes the highest civilization? If God could blush, he would crimson at the impositions done to his children in his name. But civilization will march forward in spite of the foul carcasses of Christianity that clog the wheel of progress.

Forget the race, remember only the man. Let our Constitution ignore these superficial distinctions. Oblige every state to educate every soul God intrusts to its keeping. Secure the observance of this duty by giving every person the ballot; so that every community shall hasten to educate in order to avoid an ignorant ballot, the tool of knaves. Initiate such a land policy as shall give nine men out of ten a homestead. Make suffrage universal, impartial, and homogeneous throughout the nation. Put the credit of the nation at such a height that it can borrow at four per cent: make capital pay the debt; hasten the day when co-operation shall make every capitalist a laborer, and every laborer a capitalist. Trust none of these cardinal principles to the states, or to mere congressional legislation. Anchor them all in the National Constitution."—Wendell Philip.

Confucius said, "Let the public schools be carefully maintained, and above all, let youth be instructed early in the duties of life, and formed to good morals."

"The use of substances of intrinsic value as the materials of a currency is a barbarism."—RUSKIN.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM M. SLOOUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, APR. 24, 1875.

A few weeks ago we mentioned the fact that "Common Sense," of Paris, Texas, started a month after this paper was issued, besides appropriating the name, had patterned after our style, and had finally closed its first volume at the end of nine months, so that the paper would hereafter appear to be the elder of the two. The editor in a late issue admits all these facts, and then prints a full column of abuse in reply. The following are some of his choice expressions: "Jealous idiosyncy," "croaking drivell," "carpingly insinuates," "San Francisco scribbler," "ridiculous pique," "imbecile and nauseating vanity." We suppose this is what our contemporary calls "strong writing," and we must admit it is quite too strong for us. We did not intend to copy anything more than detached words; but the following is too great a curiosity in this latitude to be allowed to pass:

"Great Soul of Reason! The idea of a biped setting himself up to do battle in the glorious cause of Humanity's redemption from the blight of gods, devils and parsons, aping the pusillanimous squabbling of rival Christian theologues about inane nothingness.

Let our fidgety philanthropist consult his ghostly emissaries! Let him waylay his guardian ghoul! Let him importune the antique spectre of some pliocene protoplasm to teach him the shadowy outlines of approximating instinct, ere he presumes to prate to rational beings of what he conjectures about Common Sense!

His guess that we once belonged to the Christian fold is as baseless as those surmises upon which he so glibly spouts his pothouse blackguardism."

There's plenty more of the same sort; but this is enough for a specimen.

PROF. CHANEY'S "Little Church around the Corner" is well filled every Sunday, morning and evening, and the audience, as intelligent as any in the city, seem to be well pleased. He gives what they do not hear anywhere else, and so long as the novelty lasts the lectures are interesting. In his morning discourses Prof. Chaney talks about the Bible. Commencing at Genesis, he will go through the book, touching at the most interesting parts on the passage, explaining everything by the light of astrology. The listener can admire the ingenuity of the explanations, laugh at their ludicrousness or turn up the nose at their absurdity, just as inclination prompts. This is a free country, especially that part of it presided over by Prof. Chaney. In the evening there is a lecture on some scientific subject, either by Prof. Chaney or some other interesting speaker.

The address of Laura Kendrick, (late Laura Cuppy Smith,) is now 201 Montgomery Street, care of Albert Kendrick. Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly will please copy.

OUR POLITICIANS.

The parties of the country, the Republicans, the Democrats, and the Independents are before the people, and it is important to know on what basis they propose to bid for votes.

The Republican leaders say to us, "We have amended the constitution, freed the negro, and reconstructed the South under it. Re-elect us, and we will see that this work is preserved. We do not see that any reforms or retrenchments are wanted. This is always the cry of those who are out of office. We stand on the party platform." This they say, and nothing more.

The Democrats stand directly opposed to the republicans and their principles. They say the amendments ought not to have been passed, the Negro was better off as he was, and that our Southern brethren should be let alone to do as they please with him. How far they will go in that direction remains to be seen. They talk some of reform, but specify nothing, define nothing, and their former record does not recommend them as reformers.

The Independents clamor for reform, but are hardly specific enough as to how or what is to be reformed. They are silent as to the national issues. They leave us in the dark, while electing Congressmen, as to the policy to be pursued in the South, that is just now all important.

None of these parties suit us. We want the amendments to be constitution supported with all the power of the government, and made the law and the practice throughout the land. We have no faith in the Independents because they deny us that assurance; we utterly repudiate the Democrats, because they are opposed to the liberties of the country and the people, and we are not satisfied with the Republicans, because they stand in the way of many much needed reforms. It may be that many who cry reform, do not mean it. But it is certain that those who have led us so far astray, and say no reform is wanted, will not give us any if left alone.

We do need reforms, both in the Nation and the State. We want economy and honesty. We want legislative lobbies cleaned out. We want the salary grab repudiated. We want the Indian management entirely changed. We want a more honest financial system. We want the public lands reserved for the people, and kept out of the hands of grabbers. We want laws to curb and discourage the accumulation of great estates and vast fortunes in private hands; and for the better care and protection of the poor. We want great monied corporations so restrained that they cannot control our legislation, and endanger the peace and liberties of the country. We want a more equitable assessment of taxes, so that the rich will be compelled to pay much that is now exacted from the poor.

In fine, we want to see something like a model republic, which all the world may admire, in which penury is unknown, and the great contrast between the palace and the hovel of the old country will have no existence. We want no splendid vice, no squalid misery. We are rich enough to secure to all our people the conditions of ease and comfort. Shall we not try to do it? If the old parties will not, we must have a new party that will.

LECTURE OF REXFORD D. D.

The Hammond effort at a revival in San Francisco has been a confessed failure. The childish means used were not suited to a California audience. We do not learn that any effects have flowed from the effort at all commensurate with the cost, noise and show. Curiosity drew crowds to see how others would be affected, but few care to be actors themselves in the common excitement of revival meetings. One good result did follow: The Free Thought people thought they could get up a public demonstration too, and they did so to an extent proving that liberal opinions are wide-spread among us. But Freethinkers do not care to do all the talking themselves. They like to hear both sides of every question. Accordingly they invited the ablest clergymen of the city to come in and debate with them, Mr. Rexford being one of the number. He declined to debate, but consented to come if he could do so without reply. He even named the man who was to follow him, one of his own friends, Dr. Hollister, and stipulated that no other speeches should be made during the evening. The committee considered him a gentleman of learning and liberal views, and rather than not have the spice of variety, they accepted his terms.

Under these circumstances, the least spark of generosity would have induced Mr. Rexford to tread gently on the corns of those who had accorded him so much liberty, and whose tongues were tied by his own stipulation. But the Rev. gentleman did not seem to possess that spark. On the contrary, he used his large liberty to abuse and misrepresent those who had extended him the invitation. He distorted all their ideas. He proved that he knew nothing of the philosophy of Free Thought. There was scarcely a boy or girl, of fourteen years, in that audience, who could not have torn his shallow pretenses to naught, had opportunity afforded. Seldom, indeed, has any audience been so grievously insulted and abused. And yet they bore it like martyrs. They showed themselves infinitely superior, in mind, manners, and forbearance, to the man who presumed to lecture them without being posted on a solitary thought pertaining to them, and their mode of thinking. Could he have heard an hour's debate on the questions he raised, after his discourse, he would never again be guilty of exhibiting himself in a manner so preposterous, in a light so unamiable, before people who know what reason and fair dealing require.

Of Mr. Rexford's own religion he knows only what he has learned in the theological seminary, and seems to have no conception of the objections of those who stand opposed to it, or of the high principles of justice and virtue by which they would supplant it. He talked of "the great void in human nature that nothing but religion can fill, a void that demands a knowledge of God, of man, of his passions, his sentiments, and his aspirations for the good and beautiful, the possible and the unattainable," and then the Rev. gentleman exclaimed with all the pomposity of a Roman Pontiff, "When humanity asks who shall fill this void, Christianity steps up, and says here I am."

As to science, he appeared to have little idea of the meaning and scope of the word: He limited it wholly to gross matter, seemingly ignorant of the fact that it embraces everything in the universe, material and spiritual. Professing to define science, he spoke as if the term were confined to the classification of plants, butterflies, etc. He ignored mental, moral and spiritual science. He even forgot that there is such a thing as astronomy, which takes within its grasp innumerable worlds that Christ, "who died for all," never dreamed of. He ignored everything that cannot be touched, handled and chemically analyzed. He wanted to leave something beyond the verge of science for fanatical religion to do. And there is literally nothing. Science not only treats of what is, but of what may be, and even of that which never can be. It has taught us all that we really know of the universe, of man, his mind, his passions, his powers, his capabilities, and the possibilities of his future. It promises to continue investigating all these things, and disseminating useful knowledge till man is what he should be—till human society is the very picture of light and love. Does religion do this? Can it do it, or any part of it? What has it done?

It has given us an angry, revengeful God.

It has given us crude and false notions of man.

It has terrified us with a prospect of hell, for all who do not accept its absurdities.

It has represented us to each other as self-willed creatures, who could believe right and do right if we would, and therefore deserving of hatred and ill-will, if we do not.

It recognizes all the evils of society as coming from this innate depravity, and therefore incurable, and being such, it makes no effort to cure them.

It says, The powers that be are of God,—the poor are to be with you always,—as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, amen.

It is profuse in its charities for the poor, but it never thinks to demand justice; whereas justice is what is wanted, and not charity.

Not only does not religion add one jot to science, but science and Free Thought go infinitely beyond religion in the direction of all that is good and holy for man. It says that a man's character depends upon his organization, education, and surroundings. If these are good, the man will be good. It proposes to make these good,—to teach pure free thought,—justice for all,—a wise system of producing and distributing wealth,—the claim of all humanity to a decent subsistence, before any are supplied with gew-gaws and superfluities,—that God is the kind Father of all, and all his children are alike in his sight. It knows no kings, no priests, no masters, no oppressors, but all mankind as brothers and equals. It looks forward to a millenium as the result of human progress. It may make mistakes. It does. It will. But its efforts will be crowned with final success.

True science is the prolific source of all human good; while what this unmanly, shallow-minded preacher call religion, is the dark shadow of ignorance that obscures the coming day. Dare he compare his boasted religion with truth in an open debate? If so, let us hear from him.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN THE SCHOOLS.

The San Francisco Board of Education having, some months since, taken decided action against the recitation of "The Lord's Prayer" and other religious exercises in the public schools, have been petitioned to reverse their action and to order the Bible read and the "The Lord's Prayer" recited in the schools. On the other hand, petitions have been presented desiring that the rule of exclusion may be continued.

It is not expected that the Board will adopt any action which will undo the work they have so recently well done. That would be to stultify themselves. There has been no rule of the Board, until recently, either excluding or requiring such exercises. The most the petitioners on that side could have reasonably asked for was a recall of the order of exclusion, leaving the matter to the teachers, as before. But this would not satisfy them. They desire the Board to take up a vigorous line of march in the opposite direction. We do not believe they will do it especially in view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio that the provisions sustaining religious freedom in the constitution of that State (substantially the same as in ours,) do not allow of the Bible in the schools.

The Supreme Court of this State, some years ago, decided that it is unconstitutional to exempt church property from taxation, and would be, even if the property of all churches were to be exempted equally, for that would nevertheless be a discrimination in favor of that general class of property, and against others. The same principle settles this question. The spirit of the Constitution requires that no discrimination shall be shown in our Public Schools for a general any more than for a special class of religionists.

Those who claim that the Bible should be ordered to be read, deny its sectarian character; ignoring the fact that the Protestant Bible is not the same as the Catholic, nor is the Jewish the same as the Christian Scriptures, and that, if the order is adopted, discrimination and preference must be shown. We hope the Board have no idea of striking their colors at the call of the United Protestants.

Since the foregoing was written the Board of Education has taken the action anticipated. The Committee reported that to prescribe a course of religious instruction that would meet with the approval of all shades of theological belief would be an impossibility. The report was approved by the Board.

Women already vote on educational matters in Michigan and other Northern States, on all matters as the men do in Wyoming and Utah Territories, and in England on many subjects. Also, women, as queens, have, at times, been at the very head of political government in all ages of the world. This is experience enough to satisfy any inductive philosopher, and it may be a consolation to those who are afraid to walk alone according to their intuition, and who must be propped up on every side by "facts," as they term them. But history, experience, experiments, facts, all logically the same, can never settle what it is the province of intuitive justice to settle.

WHISPERS FROM SAN JOSE.

For Common Sense.

Mrs. Fannie Allyn put a brilliant period to a series of well-attended lectures in Little Music Hall, Sunday evening. Her controls selected "Hero Worship" from the questions presented by the audience, and made this the basis of the discourse, and stayed closely by the text to the close. They defined the various types of hero worship, and drew a wonderful likeness between ancient and modern worshipers. The argument was extended, and supported by copious drafts upon history, which COMMON SENSE unfortunately is not able yet to extend its pages sufficiently to print in extenso; suffice it to say that hero worship was seen to spring from ignorance, and the demand for the marvelous; its heroes and heroines were too often only men and women whom factitious circumstances had raised into prominence for the moment; it was too often only the glitter of gold that excited it. It was sometimes the obeisance judgment paid to principle which is always right, and is only marred by the limitations of the object. We seldom see the finalities of the principles we adore.

The replies to the questions were quite interesting. One required a decision whether a woman not in harmonious marriage relations could do her full duty to husband and children and still be true to herself. The decision was given by several examples. The answer implied a virtue in enduring the domestic infelicities to which, through ignorance and mishaps, woman has fallen victim, rather than to hazard the possible evils of a separation.

Mrs. Allyn, in taking a long farewell of her San Jose friends, to whom she has become strongly attached, defined her status as a free lover. It was that of one who scorned to ally herself with a man who did not command her love, respect and reverence to their fullest capacity—beyond that of all other men; it was that of one who loved her own child tenderly but had a tender care and affection for every other mother's son, and would lead her to care for and do for it, if need be, as for her own child. The remarks of the speaker on this subject were very tender and beautiful.

She referred to Mrs. Kendrick, who is to occupy the platform here next Sunday, in the highest terms of sisterly respect and congratulation. She spoke a few kind words in behalf of Mrs. Loui M. Kerns, rapping and writing medium, who is now in San Jose on a visit for rest, recreation and business; and in the closing poetic improvisation she took "Snow-Drop," the Indian control of the medium named, as a starting point, and wove around it a wreath of verse beautiful beyond anything I have ever heard—the tenderest, sweetest thoughts in the most delicate and brilliant setting.

S. W. R.

"PEOPLE FROM THE OTHER WORLD."—This is the title of Col. H. S. Olcott's book, giving the result of his investigations in spiritualism. It is the latest sensation; full of "startling facts," and containing numerous illustrations. It is not written in defence of spiritualism, but solely in the cause of truth. Spiritualism is not discussed in the book in its moral aspects, but the phenomena only is considered, and that merely as involving a scientific question which presses upon us for a solution. No similar book has ever been offered to the public. It is unique, and as interesting as it is novel. It is sold only by subscription, and our friend Pat J. Healy is now engaged in canvassing that portion of the city north of California, and east of Stockton street. Orders for him may be left at this office.

Putting a religious test into a civil Constitution would effectually exclude thousands of honest men, while it would be no bar to hypocrites and knaves.—Christian Union.

MRS. DRAKE'S LECTURE.

In Union Hall, on Sunday evening last, Mrs. L. E. Drake reviewed the lecture given by Rev. Mr. Rexford before the Freethinkers. After referring to the scholarship evinced by the lecture, and acknowledging that many of the sentiments expressed by him are acceptable to every cultured mind, Mrs. Drake proceeded to criticise the objectionable passages, such as the diabolical character of God, as represented in the bible and the Sacrifice of Christ, which Christians hold to be absolutely necessary for the restoration of man, while at the same time they denounce those who crucified him and curse the man who betrayed him, both necessary acts in the drama. By various illustrations from the bible Mrs. Drake proved that the Bible God is no better than a devil. She denied the existence of a personal God, and said, "We find in Nature everything necessary for the formation of worlds, the peopling of them, and development of such beings here preparatory to higher life hereafter; therefore we have no use for the Bible God." As to the assertion that "the church is the great conservator of order and security," she said that on the contrary it is the greatest disorganizer the world has ever known. It has caused wars, cruel persecutions, and has misled the people as to human rights and duties. Mr. Rexford compared mankind to a cripple, who manages to get through life by aid of a crutch. Christianity he said, is our crutch, and the Freethinkers propose to take it away, and give nothing in its stead. Concerning this, Mrs. Drake replied:

We frankly acknowledge that we do not intend to give him any false support. If he is unable to stand without his crutch, he must fall. Then we will rub him with the strengthening salve of individual sovereignty, and bathe him with the pure water of natural progress, giving occasional doses of the invigorating extracts of reason and common sense, until he is fully restored to the healthy condition nature fitted him to enjoy, and after that he will be able to travel for the remainder of his life without the Christian crutch."

* * * * *

We will give free scope to the reasoning faculties, feeling sure that every individual who cares to know the truth will soon discover the fallacy of the prevailing religion, the hypocrisy of its teachers and the cruelty and injustice of its God. Then they will gladly turn from their delusive snares, and accept that soul cheering philosophy which teaches that we who are linked with the lowest forms of earth, are by nature's law carried onward and upward to our happy homes in the spirit spheres—that philosophy which knows no "destruction of mankind," but which assures us that when man is perfected in one scene of action the way is opened to a still higher one. This is the religion of science, which Mr. Rexford says "can never satisfy the cravings of moral affection."

The remainder of the lecture was devoted in the main to a defence of the opinions of freethinkers on the social relations, showing the purity of their ideas, and the elevating tendency of the principles held by them. Instead of being immoral and base, she claimed that they lead to the highest morality, and that if their teachings were followed the human race would soon be regenerated.

Mrs. Drake will occupy the platform again Sunday, April 25th, afternoon and evening.

SOCIETY FOR SELF CULTURE.

A very large and unusually interesting meeting of this society was held at 39 Fourth street, last Sunday afternoon. The discussion was opened by Dr. White, in the affirmative of the question, "Does Christianity promote the highest civilization." The other speakers in the affirmative were Mrs. Dr. Carr, Dr. Hollister, and Mr. Martin; in the negative Mr. Arper, Mr. Hendricks, Mrs. Hanks and Mr. Knight. The speech of Mrs. Hanks was among the more thoughtful ones. She took the ground, there is no form of religion as yet widely spread which comes up to our highest ideas of civilization. Religion, she said, in reply to Mrs. Carr, cannot be divorced from humanity; it is a part of human nature, an element in man which serves to elevate and enoble him. It is not an outside observance, but an innate principle that leads man into higher paths. The good claimed by Christianity belongs not primarily to that form of religion, but is inherent in man; it is not the effect of Christianity, but the cause which makes Christianity and other religious beliefs as good as they are. At the close of the debate the President announced that the time had arrived for the election of officers for the ensuing six months. A motion was made that the present officers continue to serve, and it would evidently have prevailed, but Mr. Battersby peremptorily declined to serve as President. It was finally determined to defer the election until next week, but candidates were placed in nomination as follows: For President, Dr. Hollister, Mr. Kinney, Capt. Smith, Mr. Bordwell, Mrs. Hanks, and Mrs. Carr. For Vice President, Mr. Knight, Mr. John Smith, and Capt. Smith. (Mrs. Olmstead declined). For Secretary, Pat. J. Healy, Mr. Knight and Mr. Slocum. The latter declined on account of want of time. For Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Frost, Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Loomis and Mrs. Olmstead. For Treasurer, Mrs. Fitzgerald and Mr. Battersby. From among these names the audience will select, and if no one receives a majority on the first ballot, the one receiving the smallest number of votes will be dropped on the succeeding ballot, and so on until an election is had.

MR. YORK'S SOCIABLE.—We neglected to notice last week the very pleasant entertainment given to Mr. York by his friends, at the close of the Freethought meetings. The literary exercises were of an interesting and varied character, the music excellent, and the dance delightful. The net benefit to Mr. York was about $50. Great credit is due to Mr. Fitzgerald, proprietor of the Hall, for his generosity, and his efforts to make every one happy.

Some people seem to be made up of 'Thank you's.' They hardly permit of your winking before they drop their little acknowledgment. The question arises, Are they much better than others who do not thus annoy you! For it is annoying; and you feel as though you would like to be pretty certain that they, at least, were receiving a benefit from such a discipline. It is the attitude of the spirit that tells, and not the invention or habit of speech.

MEETING OF WORKING MEN.

The first of a series of meetings of the working men of San Francisco, to discuss the relations of Capital and Labor, employers and employed, laws affecting production and exchange, etc., etc., was held at Dashaway Hall on Sunday afternoon last. B. F. French was called to the chair, and Pat. J. Healy briefly stated the objects of the meetings it is proposed to hold. He said they are for the purpose of discussing the best means of equalizing conditions among men. "Our object is not to tear down, but to investigate into the causes of inequalities which it is evident are not inherent in the nature of things, but are the results of a false system adopted by a small minority of mankind, and which the majority have been induced by fraud and force to accept as the established order of things. If a remedy is not applied an upheaval must come." We are not, he said, in favor of violence; we do not want war; but the conditions now existing will necessarily terminate in that, unless some peaceful method is soon adopted to obviate this alternative. The United States government, poor as it is, is the best in the world, but it is grossly corrupt, and is the foster mother of injustice. We have the remedy in our own hands, without resorting to war, and we mean to apply the remedy. It is for this purpose these meetings are held—to educate and arouse the people.

Mr. Hatch dealt with the general principles which should govern the attempt to utilize the results of our civilization for the benefit of the producers. Civilization is so applied as to pamper, pet and spoil a few drones in the social hive, whereas its legitimate aim is to elevate and dignify the great army of the workers.

He defined civilization as the improved condition of man, resulting from the establishment of social order in place of absolute individual independence, and the lawlessness of savage or barbarous life. Isolation and selfish aggrandizement, the aristocracy of wealth, and class legislation, are all foreign to the spirit of true civilization, which regards the general good. It is for the interest of the rich that they be workers, and not drones and butterflies.

There were several other speakers, but we failed to get a report. A similar meeting will be held in the same place to-morrow afternoon, the 25th.

RENEW YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Three numbers more will complete Vol. 1 of COMMON SENSE. As it is much trouble to take names out of our mailing list, and replace them again, subscribers who intend to renew their subscriptions will please do so without delay. They will then be sure to receive all the numbers. Otherwise they may miss some, and it will be impossible for us to replace them, as we print only the number required from week to week. The prospects of the paper were never better than at present.

Hattie J. French, trance and test medium, started for California, March 22d, and is to stop in Philadelphia, Chicago, Ogden, Salt Lake City, Elko, Reno and Truckee to lecture and give tests.

BENEATH THE OAK.

BY KENNETH C. STOCK.

It might have been the staff from whence to-day
A nation's flag is waving—
Round which the dead on fields of battle lay,
Their country's honor saving.

It might have been the throne of queens or kings,
All human rights transgressing;
Where men and women are but menial things—
Revolting, not oppressing.

It might have been the old arm chair, that stood
Amid our tears or laughter;
Our strong defence and shield, which left but good
And blessed memories after.

It might have been a cradle, wherein lay
A child, whose smiles and treasures
Seemed but the gift of God from day to day,
Whose helpless presence blesses.

It might have been a casket, yet to hold
Within its cold embraces
The hand which neth these branches gray and old,
A name all thoughtlessly traces.

Ah yes "it might have been" thus shall they say,
When life's swift years are ended,
Of him, whose song beneath the oak to-day,
With tears and smiles is blended.

I turn—farewell old oak—and go where sin
With good the battle wages.

My name, ah well, it might—it might have been
A name far down the ages.

"RELIGION AND SCIENCE, or Christianity, Religion and the Bible versus Philosophy and Science," is the title of a pamphlet of thirty-two pages published by Dr. Pilkington, who is well known to the attendants at the Liberal meetings, where the Doctor frequently speaks. The little work has for its motto: "The truth shall make you free," and it contains many good and truthful ideas, although clothed in somewhat crude English. The Doctor does not profess to be a fine writer, nor even a profound thinker, but merely a plain, common sense man of practical ideas. He briefly reviews Bible history, for the purpose of showing that the Fathers of the church "were ignorant men, and never sought for the foundation of their opinions, and hence their goodness, even to this day, has not atoned for their ignorance, as it has resulted in a despotic religion so much to the detriment of the human family." The work is mainly historical, containing in epitome the prominent facts given in Draper's History of Civilization, and "The Conflict between Science and Religion," by the same author. The Doctor is evidently hopeful of the future; he believes "Nature is bound to assert her rights," and says it has already come to this, that "Catholicism, orthodoxy and science, as adhered to by their advocates, are perfectly incompatible? They cannot live together—one or the other must yield. Mankind will make their choice, as intelligence, interest or individuality predominates.

Would it not be well for the "Spiritualists' Union" to come down from the fourth story of their present location, and take Charter Oak Hall, now, while they can get it? No large society can ever be built up in a location so near heaven and so difficult of access as the one they now occupy. Come down, Zacheus, come down!

BARBARIAN MONEY.

The use of substances of intrinsic value as the materials of a currency is a barbarism.—BUNSEN.

How long shall it dwell in the bosom of civilization to poison the fountains of its life?

All national money was first barbarous—is now semi-barbarous; and while it continues we can never attain a higher state than semi-civilization.

We cannot call society civilized where men prey upon or live upon the labor of others. We must have a money to correspond with our progress in science and the mechanic arts, or "history will continue to repeat itself" "world without end," because the same causes will always produce the same results. "God is not mocked."

If we were called upon for the first time in the world's history to devise a medium of exchange or money, should we be likely to go to digging into the bowels of the earth or hunting in the gorges of mountains for metals the most scarce, or diving into the depths of the ocean for pearls most difficult and dangerous to obtain, to find it?

This was appropriate enough to barbarians, with their meagre cerebral development, their fondness for trinkets and glitter of diamonds; but would it be becoming a people professing to be civilized? Should we not be likely to search our intellects instead of the mountains and the ocean's bed—draw upon our knowledge of science and the arts, and see if something could not be devised better for a medium of exchange than pieces of a metal so scarce as to set everybody scrambling for their possession? something better even than parchment money based exclusively upon a metal? Should we not seek to relieve mankind of this disease called avarice, and try to save our souls from contamination and our bodies from want and suffering?

It seems to me, if the thing was now for the first time proposed, the task would be easy; but our minds are mystified and stultified by the use of a false money.

The first question we should be likely to ask ourselves would probably be: What function do we want a medium of exchange, or money, to perform? Do we want it to enable the cunning and crafty to enrich themselves by the labor of the simple and honest? Do we want it to be an instrument in the hands of the more intelligent by which they may appropriate from two to four fifths of the labor-products of the less intelligent? Do we want it to enable a Stewart or an Astor to own half a city like New York? Or to enable the Scotts and Vanderbilts to become kings of highways [highway men are not so dangerous]; or a few men to own Fall River, Boston, Lowell, Lawrence, the State itself; or a Slater to own three villages, and virtually the inhabitants thereof, in Webster, Worcester County, Mass? I think we want none of these. But do we want justice and equity established in this nation—in this world of ours? If we do, then the answer to the first question is simple and easy: A medium of exchange, or money, should enable all persons to exchange either labor or service (or labor-products, which is practically the same thing) one with another, the world over, with no loss to either, but with all the equal and mutual advantage to each by which two farmers or carpenters now "change works."

There are a variety of ways in which this could be done; and if there was no false system of money to be superseded, the following, I think, would be best adapted to equitable and universal exchange: Let depositories (or warehouses) be established in sufficient numbers, and in locations to suit the public convenience, where every kind of staple articles, not subject to immediate decay, could be deposited in the hands of responsible parties, where they could be delivered at the labor cost of production and exchange estimated in the number of hours of labor, and not in the turns of the currency. The parties holding these deposits, whether individuals or agencies established (or sanctioned, as the post-office or express companies are sanctioned) by the people, could issue certificates to depositors to one-half or two-thirds of the amount of the labor cost of production, risk, and exchange, entitling the holder of each certificate to a specific kind, quality, and quantity of these deposits, at the same time giving him a receipt for the full amount deposited. This would furnish the money required, and plenty of it.

The "volume" of such money in circulation would not need regulating by the financial wisdom of legislators. It would always be redeemable in gold, silver, copper, or some other equally "valuable" merchandise, except temporarily and locally in case of fire or some other accident, which would be covered by insurance.

It would never be above or below par. It could not be monopolized, nor could interest be obtained upon it, and there could be no fluctuation in prices, but only a steady diminution in prices as the labor cost of production should be diminished by the introduction of scientific methods and labor-saving machinery.

But, owing to prejudices and false habits, some modification of this proposition must be made, or people could not be persuaded to believe it was money at all, it is so simple. Yet the money of the future must contain the elements proposed in the foregoing, or it would not secure the emancipation of labor, which is the object in view.

The money now in use is elementarily the same in character that money has always been. It is adapted only to speculative purposes; i. e., to "buying and selling for gain," which is a crime against society denounced by the Bible and condemned by the wise and good of all ages. It is not adapted to, nor can it be used to effect an equitable exchange of labor or service; yet the character of a circulating medium must be such as to effect that, or labor will continue to be plundered and enslaved.

No analytical statement is required to prove this, for we have only to look at the world's history and its condition to-day to see that those who do the work of the world and create its wealth (except the natural wealth which God has created, and which should bear no price) are always poor, and vastly the larger number suffering extreme poverty. Those who build all the houses, own, comparatively, no houses. Those who make all the clothing and fancy goods have only the coarsest of the former and shabbiest of the latter to use, and scant at that; and because men do not always work with alacrity, all the day time, under these circumstances, they are often called lazy by those who never performed a useful day's work in their lives. O Shame, where is thy blush!

No adage is more true than the one which says that "money [of the past] is the root of all evil." But I hear some one say, It is not the money, but the love of it that does the harm. But if money was but the representation of Truth, Justice, and Equity, would the love of it harm any one?

And such is the kind of money we must have, or labor is doomed to be enslaved in the future as it has been in the past, with all the direful train of consequences.

Is such a kind of money possible? Yes. Can it be introduced in the midst of a false civilization and in the presence of a false money? Yes, as easily as railroads were introduced in the midst of streets and turnpikes, or telegraphs in the presence of post-horses and ocean-mails, if only the intelligent and conscientious people of the nation will it.

CHRISTIANITY VERSUS TEMPERANCE.

A year ago, as the reader remembers, a temperance crusade was inaugurated by some pious women, and praying bands, supported by the clergy, visited the saloons, and a great excitement was kicked up. At that time the following verses were written; but as COMMON SENSE is in favor of temperance, they were not published, we being willing to have good done, by whatever means and however inconsistently. Now the storm has passed. The atmosphere is less turbulent, but no purer than it was before the furore. Liquor selling still goes on, in perfect harmony with our Christian civilization, and only now and then is there a remonstrative yelp against it from the pulpit of some honest dog, who, like poor Tray, has fallen into bad company, and might as well make the best of the religion they are all pledged to sustain, though it naturally leads to intemperance, to dishonesty, to mental imbecility and moral degradation. No matter; they are all to be regenerated some day, through the blood of Christ:

Domine dirige nos.

Sweet Jesus! couldst thou now behold
The rage that frets thy prophets bold,
And see each virgin of thy band
Upon the beer-tap lay her hand;
How would it grieve thy heart to see
Them rant with such immodesty!
How it would shock thy soul to view
Thy shepherds join the jabbering crew!
Thy parsons, who should know that wine
Was sanctified by hands of thine,
That juleps, cobbler's, cocktails, grew
Out of thy dispensation too!
Didst not thou at that marriage feast
Brew several hogsheads, at the least,
Of wine that "Gerke" far surpassed,
Till men "well drunk" drank well 'till the last?
Didst thou not with thy dying voice
Bid each disciple to rejoice
In that blessed cup, which henceforth stood
"New Testament of Saving Blood?"
Hath not the Christian ever since
Bought thus his fervor to evince
By swallowing with his daily food
Deep draughts of this most precious blood?
At least if rich enough to drain
Goblets of sherry, hock, champagne;
But pauper acolytes, of course,
After they've gobbled up thy corpse,
Although they may indulge, perhaps,
In serous suds of gin or schnappe,
Have to content them, it is clear,
With draughts—at sight—of bitter beer.
Yet do they not in every clime
Bear witness to that death of thine
By filling them, at home, abroad,
"Fou" with the spirits of their God?
As that Jamaica maiden once,
To whom some deacon—pious dunce—
Proffered the now half-emptied cup
Her sister saint had just mopped up,
Cried "Fill him, Massa, prythee fill
Sweet Jesus' blood up till him spill,
You thinkee this heah nigga gal
No lub her Lord as well as Sal?"
So Christian men and nations too,
Must be adjudged by what they do;
Caste, color, clime, it matters not,
The greater saint, the greater sot!
Where'er thy saints and sailors go,
They teach the grogless heathen so,
Till every savage soon or late
Loves Christ, and takes his whiskey "straight."

Till "Rum and True Religion" bless
Fair sales that once were whiskeyless;
And each dark convert in thy pews,
Shouts "Heigh oh Baccy" as he chews!
Baccy and Bacchus hand in hand
March mandlin o'er each new taught land,
Whilst nicotena, old Nick's spawn,
Like Nicodemus, is "new born."
"Dogtail" and "Maryland" and "Shag,"
Their trembling limbs behind them drag.
Hard on the parson's heels they press,
With bibles, bilks, rum, beer, Guinness.
And shall we, Lord, decline to drink?
We into heathen darkness sink!
Quenching the memory of thy boom,
Whose fires burn bright in each saloom.
Forbid it Lord, we never will Lose opportunities to swill,
That all the world may know that we
Have left our "awl" and followed thee.
Perish the thought! nay, sooner far,
Let Frisco oust each Cop-tic star,
Than we deny ourselves to be
"Wine-bibbers," too, in following thee.
Yours, Mr. Editor, in Christ,

SHERRY COBBLER.

THE WONDERFUL HEALER AND CLAIRVOYANT
MRS. C. M. MORRISON.

This celebrated Medium is the instrument or organism used by the invisibles for the benefit of humanity. The placing of her name before the public is by request of her Controlling Band. They, through her organism, treat all diseases and cure in every instance where the vital organs necessary to continue life are not destroyed. Mrs. Morrison is an

UNCONSCIOUS TRANCE MEDIUM, CLAIRVOYANT AND CLAIRAUDIENT.

From the very beginning, hers is marked as a most remarkable career of success, such as has seldom if ever fallen to the lot of any person. No disease seems too insidious to remove, nor patient too far gone to be restored.

Mrs. Morrison, becoming entranced, the lock of hair is submitted to her control. The diagnosis is given through her lips by the Band, and taken down by her Secretary. The original manuscript is sent to the Correspondent.

When Medicines are ordered, the case is submitted to Mrs. Morrison's Medical Band, who give a prescription suited to the case. Her Medical Band use vegetable remedies, (which they magnetize) combined with a scientific application of the magnetic healing power.

Diagnosing disease by lock of hair, $1.00. (Give age and sex.)

SPECIFIC FOR EPILEPSY AND NEURALGIA.

Address MRS. C. M. MORRISON, Boston, Mass., Box 2519.

Those suffering from that most annoying of the minor miseries of human life—a cold in the head—or from catarrh in any form, should try Dr. Evory's Diamoré Catarrh Remedy. Just try it—that's all. Sold at this office, and by all druggists.

Send Austin Kent one dollar for his pamphlets on Free Love and Marriage, etc. He has been seventeen years physically helpless, confined to his bed and chair, is poor and needs the money. He sends four or five well-written essays for one dollar. His address is AUSTIN KENT, Stockholm, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., Box 44.

DR. R. P. FEELOW, THE GREAT HEALER.—This distinguished Magnetic Physician has been before the public for many years, during which time he has performed the most astonishing cures ever recorded in the history of healing, ancient or modern. He is now permanently located at Vineland, N. J., where he is devoting himself to healing the sick in every State in the Union by his Magnetized Powders. The cures that are being performed almost daily by the powder, speak volumes in its favor. It can be procured of the Doctor at $1 per box, or $5 for six boxes. Why remain in your diseased condition?

Signs of the Times.

The town of Sutro, Nevada, has one hundred inhabitants and four saloons.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore is expected to visit California this summer. She is now lecturing in Ohio.

Mr. Lick has expressed his willingness to have the tenants of his property pay over their monthly rentals of some $20,000 to the original trustees.

There has been an unusual increase of dementia among the inmates of the Liverpool Workhouse, which is attributed to religious excitement.

At the last annual meeting of the Index Association, the Directors were authorized to change it from a weekly paper to a monthly magazine, should they deem it expedient.

Since blonde hair has become fashionable it is interesting to know that dark hair can be turned blonde, that is killed, by washing frequently in a weak solution of soda twice a day.

It is a significant fact that the Boston News, which is the only out-spoken Woman Suffrage daily paper in Boston, also takes the lead in assailing the fraud and jobbery which disgrace the state and municipal government.

The free training schools established by the Woman's Educational Society, New York City, are accomplishing much good, enabling girls to get a knowledge of housework, etc., so as to render them self-supporting.

An incorporation has been organized in San Francisco to provide for women the medical aid of competent women physicians, and to assist in educating women for nurses, and in the practice of medicine and kindred professions. The institution is called the Pacific Dispensary for women and children.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Mrs. Minor of St. Louis, recently decided that women are citizens, but that the right to vote does not attach to citizens under the Constitution of the United States, therefore they have not that right in States the laws of which do not confer on them the right.

Vineland has grown in twelve years to be a community of over twelve thousand inhabitants, and has never been cursed with a single place where liquor was sold as a beverage. As a consequence there are no destitute, no business for criminal courts, a light tax for municipal purposes and the best of educational facilities. The founders of the town of Lompoc, Cal., have followed the example of Vineland.

One of the queerest signs of the times is the avidity with which church people seek to make it appear that Spiritual manifestations are all frauds—thus attempting to knock away all the foundation millions have for a belief in the other life. M. D. Conway writes from London a ridiculous story about the "exposure" of a medium, and adds: "There is not a medium of any fame in London whose fraud has not been exposed to the satisfaction of all except the large class of those who wish to be deceived."

The New York Tribune has now an average daily circulation of 50,000 copies.

Ruth Ellis, a maiden lady of Central New York, is said to be the writer of the Saxe Holm stories.

James Lick gave $2,500 to aid the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia, and expects to give more.

The Michigan House of Representatives has defeated a bill to tax church property when in excess of fifteen thousand dollars. In California no church property is exempt from taxation.

The Sacramento Record justly says our present mode of education is a failure. It has not increased intelligence, has not helped good morals, culture, courtesy or civilization generally. It is merely the exercise of the memory on words.

Geo. Jacob Holyoake's book, the "History of Co-operation in England," is dedicated to Wendell Phillips "whose voice, confronting dangerous majorities, animating forlorn hopes, has ever been raised in behalf of the slave, black or white, in bondage to the planter or capitalist."

Christian papers mention as a proof of virtue the fact that Sir Arthur Helps resigned his office as clerk to the council on the ground that a poor man like himself ought not to hold a position where he would be exposed to temptation. To our mind this, instead of a proof of virtue, is a confession of weakness, a want of virtue.

The Presbyterian Relief Fund for Disabled Ministers is $45,000 in debt, and cases of suffering among its beneficiaries are reported. The New York Independent intimates that the Society is not worthy of support, and says every communicant sent as a pauper to the poor-house is a living witness that the church of which he is a member is not worthy to bear the name of Christ.

Talmadge, the clerical clown of Brooklyn, referring to the newspaper accounts of the Beecher trial, said, "Three daily papers came into my house to-day, containing 123 feet of printed pollution." In the same sermon he said to his hearers, "Kick the infernal stuff out of your house." Example is better than precept, but it is precept, not example, that Talmadge deals in.

Hammond is drawing crowded houses in Oakland. It is pitiable to see a man demean himself as Hammond does on the platform, more pitiable to see learned clergymen sustaining such a mountebank, but most pitiable to see the crowds of people flocking after this coarse, vulgar swaggerer. Such a spectacle excites contempt for our fellow men. It is most pitiable, indeed.

Dr. A. L. Stone, Rev. Robert Patterson and twenty other San Francisco clergymen, signed a card printed in the New York Tribune denying the truth of the Chronicle's reports of Hammond's meetings, and recommending in high terms Hammond and his method. Every unprejudiced person who attended the meetings know that the reports were true, and that Hammond's "method" is simply contemptible.

MY CHURCH.

For Common Sense.

BY J. W. MACKIE.

About fourteen years ago, in an obscure part of Sonoma county, a friend and I were offered on very liberal terms the care of a farm, by an elderly gentleman who had a short time before been made a widower.

He was a member of a Methodist church, and probably hearing that we were not quite orthodox, orthodoxy being requisite to successful farming, he paid us a visit, and proposed asking me a few questions, before the bargain was ratified, to which I assented.

"Have you any objections to prayer in the house?"

"Certainly not; this is a free country, and I would not be worthy of the country, if I objected to any person praying anywhere."

"You do not understand me; I mean are you willing that we should all join together around one common altar, before retiring for the night, and together supplicate the Throne of Grace?"

"That does indeed change the question. I am willing that all men should pray when and where it suits them, but I do object to being forced to pray myself, or to enter into any contract to pray."

"Are you a member of a church?"

"Yes."

"Which Church?"

"My church is a large one; entrance into my church does not depend on the second birth, but on the first. Being born the first time ensures a membership in my church, and nothing but death can cut a person off from my church."

"Are you a Unitarian?"

"Yes, for I believe in unity; I am also a Methodist, for I believe in method; and a Catholic, for I believe in universal truth."

"I do not understand you. Are you a believer in the divinity of Christ?"

"Yes, or any other man."

This seemed to shock the old man, and I added:

"I have yet left me a reverence for grey hairs; it is not my purpose to shock your feelings, only I must be truthful to you and myself, for I would not accept a deed of your farm and be a hypocrite. I am an Infidel, having no fear of hell and no hope of heaven."

The old man arose, saying that he thought it best not to let us have the farm; so I was deprived of the experience which would have proven whether I would have been a success as a farmer.

But while the church universal includes every human being, and has for its object every human purpose and aspiration, yet we must be sectarian enough to work with subdivisions, to associate ourselves with those who can assist us in accomplishing certain ends, or in promoting our peculiar growth. Whatever association assists us in our progressive development, public or secret, in the theatre or ball-room, the lodge or sewing circle, church, chapel or cathedral, synagogue or mosque, or wherever men and women meet for a common purpose, that is where our branch of the church universal is located. But while associations can be made subservient to our good and growth, so soon as they become a hindrance it becomes our duty as members of the higher church to sever the connection and pass on to higher ends and nobler purposes.

In doing so the association to which we have belonged will probably look upon us as an enemy; especially what are called religious churches or associations, each one of which considers itself the church, the ne plus ultra. This is called bigotry, and is not confined to Christian churches. It seems to be rather an infirmity of human nature, rather than a peculiarity of any denomination. Christianity must be bigoted in its dogmatical teachings, claiming, as it does, the ipse dixit of the Infallible as the source of its teachings; but Infidelity, with less pretension, is often quite as bigoted. Who is more bold, and asserts with greater pertinacity, the boundary line of thought and doctrine than do many Infidels or freethinkers? Free Thought! how many Infidels are there who have liberality enough to admit that another man's free thought led him to believe in Christianity, in Judaism, Mohammedanism or Buddhism? We who dare to lay claim to the holy name of Freethinkers or Liberals should be willing to accede to others what we claim for ourselves, the unbounded liberty to think in any direction we please, as we please. Is my brother or sister a spiritualist? so he or she has a right to be, and I have no right to question their honesty, as they have no right to question mine when I declare that I am not. Yet I have seen Spiritualists and Materialists, as I have seen Christians, abuse a brother or sister because a difference of opinion was expressed. Each one sees his own truth so clearly that he will not believe in the blindness of those who do not see it, as also he will not believe there can be any imperfection in his own vision.

But in the great universal church, my church, all views are right, though partial and fragmentary; and if my little section of truth seems to conflict with another section seen by some one else, instead of playing the bigoted fool by denouncing the man or woman, or their truth, I should be content to allow them to view truth as they please, or as they can. No soul will accept as truth any doctrine or any church if there be nothing in that doctrine or church which it needs. In every form of doctrine ever given by men to men there must have been contained something which satisfied the demands of the human soul. It may have been false in fact, erroneous in logic, and in many respects detrimental to human progress and happiness, yet it must have contained a germ of truth needed by those who received it.

Freedom to think, freedom to speak, and freedom to act in every sense of the word, where such freedom does not interfere with the like freedom of others, is the issue of the age, and is the only issue of a liberal Liberalism. We must each and all of us abdicate the papal chair, a place no member of the universal church, my church, has a right to occupy.

PSYCHOLOGY.

DIALOGUE ON "FAVORABLE CONDITIONS," BETWEEN THE READER
AND THE WRITER.

Reader.—As your experience seems to have been extensive in respect to metaphysical subjects, perhaps you will give me your views respecting the idea involved in what are denominated the "favorable conditions" in "revivals," Patheism, (mesmerism) and correlative phenomena?

Writer.—Bear in mind that Patheism is a term used for designating all possible forms of artificial, nervous or mental phenomena. They might be classed under the term Suggestive, because they are always previously suggested by the idea and the method, or process adopted for their production. Were the "conversions" in "revivals" produced as is supposed, by the will of God, no previous "preaching" could be necessary; and, were the artificial trance produced, as is erroneously supposed, by the mere volition of another, no processes whatever could be necessary.

R.—But we are told, you know, that "God works by means."

W.—No matter what "they say" about the Unknown. Here is what I do know, namely: That the "miracles" of healing, reported of Jesus, were performed in the identical conditions set forth by Mesmer and by Patheism. Bating Mesmer's notions about a "fluid," the principles are the same, and, as I have said, there are two:

1. DOGMATISM. The power and authority to work miracles (artificial nervous phenomena) is always assumed. For evidence of this, read Mark, 1:27—41; Luke, 9:1, 5:13; Jesus said, 'I WILL.' And how the miracle followed I will now show you.

2. FAITH. Read Matthew, 8:8, 9:28, 13:58, 17:19; Mark, 14:17. This is that plastic yielding of the nervous system to the control of the idea dogmatically announced by the miracle-worker. And these passages should be read, because they show, unmistakably, that Jesus had no power, none whatever, to heal the sick, except that with which he was invested by human credulity and faith.

R.—And how long, alas, how long, will Humanity remain ignorant of this fact! All the power that Jesus has, or ever had, he is invested with by human faith!

W.—Yes, my friend, and do you not see that it makes no sort of difference whatever whether or no any such personage as Jesus ever lived or not, while faith is the power which "saves the sinner?" And precisely the same phenomena would follow faith in a comet or a meteor. When I was a Methodist I heard one of the bishops (E. Hedding) tell of an Indian woman "converted" and "born again" by her faith in two English words, the only ones she knew, and these (January, February) she continued to repeat, until, the bishop said, she was "soundly converted to God."

R.—He should have said she was "converted to Methodism," and thus have spoken truly. I have often been disgusted in hearing "revival" mountebanks boast of the number of souls "converted to God," under their dogmatic harrangues.

W.—And if their dogmas were true, it would be an everlasting disgrace that the whole world had not been "born again," long time ago. But their dogmas are not true, and that is the reason why Humanity always did, as it always will, protest against them.

THE CHRISTIAN EGG-SHELL.

BY COL. T. W. HIGGINSON.

The human race is outgrowing our special and limited religions. You may take the robin's egg from the nest on yonder tree, and so near is the bird to being hatched you may crack it with the edge of your nail and the bird is free. But all your power, and all your patient fidelity, and all the mucilage and sticking-plaster you can put on it, will never get that birdling back into that little egg again. So complete is the sense of satisfaction, such is the feeling of freedom which comes from once finding yourself, not merely out of these little sectarian names, but out of the name of the larger and grander sect, which is Christianity, that you will find when the egg is once broken the bird is free forever. You had better let him use his wings, even if he comes to mischief in consequence. And yet, on the other hand, is that bird to turn back and blame the egg, or that institution of egg, which somehow does in its own way hatch birds for good or for evil into being? Here again I must differ from my friend Abbot—whom I love to agree with, because I always hope that by agreeing with him I may perhaps catch something of that courage and fidelity of conviction that leave him too much alone. He has recognized what it is needless for me to repeat. The sweetness, the virtue, the love that still for multitudes around us are engraved in Christianity—he has recognized that. I recognize in return what he has said, that if the brightest pages of the past are written with the name of Christianity, so also are some of the darkest.

God forbid that I should hold any man, because he calls himself Christian, to be Christian in any other sense of the word than that which he habitually recognizes. Words change. You cannot keep a word unaltered. It is the business of a man who lives among men to take words at their current valuation for current purposes. You must deal with Christianity for what it is to-day, not for what it was in the past. I think it is a mistake to go about the world treating all our fellow-creatures as if they were their ancestors who lived a great many centuries ago and behaved very differently.

I cannot see as yet that science is so far displacing Christianity as to make Christianity legitimately a dead letter to the world. The time may come when equal intellect, with more heart, equal thought, with more tenderness, shall give us something before which the Christianity of to-day, or of all days, shall find itself but an incomplete thing, and shall withdraw itself so peacefully that it shall not need the word "anti" to dispel it.

The paper barrels manufactured by the Pacific Barrel Company are a perfect success.

THE CONSERVANCY OF CHRISTIANITY.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—I have read the report of Revd. Rexford's address before the Free Thinkers, at Dashaway Hall. There are a few good points in it, but his description of the conservancy of Theology is entirely false. Its conservancy has always been the stultifying of the intellect. It has always opposed Science and the education of the masses. Men who were called Christians have often advanced, as individuals, beyond the iron-bound limits of Theology, and have searched into the hidden treasures of Nature, but dared not reveal their discoveries to the multitude, because not consistent with the interpretations of theological despots. Christians have always allied themselves to the despotism of capital in its varied forms. Whenever did they take sides with the oppressed? Never! and to-day they are on the side of despotism. They always opposed secular education, but the competition of nations to obtain the manufacturing supremacy compelled the governments to advance the education of the masses. I recollect how the clergy and manufacturers in England resisted it. The Free Thinkers went boldly forth and lectured to the people, and printed cheap newspapers and periodicals, and were often imprisoned by the Theological Judges. I well recollect the miserable tracts left at the houses of the working classes weekly—all hell-fire and brimstone. They condemned the reading of newspapers and periodicals, taught us in the Sunday schools not to use our reason, but to accept their interpretations of the phenomena of nature. As science advanced they had to yield, and then claimed to be the discoverers of scientific truths, and the staunch patrons of scientific research; but we know their history. Their conservatism is force. What a pandemonium society is to-day, and always has been. Armies of Police and armies of Military required to conserve society; while corrupt judges and social tyranny are still rampant. Poor Picket, as an illustration. I blame Free Thinkers of the city for not agitating for his release. What are you doing when a brother Free Thinker is incarcerated because he has been an advocate of Free Thought and Man's Rights?

The New York Times thinks Reverend Hammond should be ducked in a horse pond for terrifying sensitive children by telling them that the devil will devour them in hell, if they do not repent of their sins, the children not knowing the meaning of sin. I think he ought to be driven out of society. It is the old system—crushing out the noble instincts and aspirations in early youth, and subordinating the masses to Theological despotism through fear. He is worse than a pestilence. I still feel the effects of such teachings upon me, when a child. Freethinkers of the liberal school must energetically oppose him and his class, not by introducing the hell and heaven of the Spiritualists, but by advocating culture, investigating the hidden treasures of nature, and by endeavoring to comprehend the principles that lie at the basis of a true social system, and then practically carrying them out. Yours,

R. MILLS.

WORDS OF WARNING.

LETTER FROM A WORKINGMAN.—A SOMBER VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—This is the first opportunity I have had to send a few lines to you for some time. I have had another severe attack, and I have been in bed nearly three weeks. I have not been able to read a paper, and you know how anxious I am to know the events that are transpiring. However, I find a crisis is rapidly and surely coming in this country. Look at the commercial decay of New York—its ship-yards deserted; the rate of interest on money destructive to trade; gold lately up to one hundred and sixteen; railroads unable to carry freight from the west to the seaboard at rates that will pay the roads and the farmers; the reduction of wages in the coal districts and in the factories, and the producers starving by thousands. In the large cities crime is rampant, and criminals are at large by the hundreds; state and municipal officers dividing the proceeds of taxation among themselves; post office frauds, Revenue frauds, corruption in Congress, and all other legislative bodies; the industrial classes uncared for, despotism foreshadowed, usury eating out the vitals of the nation; the capitalists converting their property into money, and settling in London and Paris by hundreds. The drain of specie continues enormous. There are strikes among the operatives, and to crown all, the elements seem at war with the human family.

The future of the Pacific Coast seems anything but cheering. Where are the thousands of the industrious classes that are flocking to these shores to find work? Capital does not come at the same rate, and money is being drained eastward, because of the high premium on gold. In this city (Carson) men are begging for work, willing to work for their board, mechanics too. Virginia City is over-crowded with immigrants seeking work. And who is attracting them to this Coast? Railroad men, land thieves and capitalists in general; because they want labor cheaper here than it is in the east. Owners of real estate in San Francisco are encouraging the emigration. They think property will increase in value. They are sowing the wind, and will reap the whirlwind. Some of the newspapers are already alarmed at the rapid rate of immigration here. They cannot stop it. What a deplorable state of things.

R. MILLS.

Carson City, April 15th.

COMMENTS.

The fact that our friend writes from a sick bed, explains in part the unfavorable view he takes of things. With returning health, the world will have a brighter look to him. There are in California hundreds of thousands of acres of unoccupied land, enough to sustain ten times the population we now have. It is true that much of the best land has been secured by capitalists, but much still remains which can be purchased at low rates, and if the immigrants with families have even a few hundred dollars to begin with, they are secure against suffering, while those without families can soon find work.

What we need here is an amendment of the constitution that will enable the Legislature to tax unimproved land at high rates, exempting from taxation improvements to the extent of one thousands dollars or more. There should also be a system of graduated taxation on all other property, so that the more a man owns the more he must pay. As there is now the certainty of a dry season and poor crops, it is possible there will be some suffering next year, but if the result is to force our agriculturists to a better system of cultivation—dry tillage—the lesson will in the end be beneficial.

CREDIT AND CAPITAL.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—In my article in your paper of the 17th inst. your typo makes me say, there was not a time when capital did not exist. If this expressed his opinion it did not mine. The point I intended to make was directly the reverse, viz: that capital and labor are not mutual and co-ordinate factors of wealth, but that labor was originally the parent of capital, which has proved to be a most ungrateful bantling whose crime is even more unnatural than that of the fabled Saturn who devoured his own offspring. Capital devours the womb out of which it sprang. Many labor reformers believe there is a just mean where capital and labor may meet and equitably divide the profits of industry, while many are now contending that capital has no right to share the profits of labor, and in defence of their position they assert that capital is not necessary as a means to employ labor. They contend that credit can and has for many years been the means employed for this purpose, and they also contend that capital does not furnish the security upon which this credit is based, but that labor furnishes the only security, because labor alone creates the commodities that the creditor takes in payment of his debt, or in payment of the interest.

If it is true then that the credit of the laboring classes is the means used to employ labor, what justice can there be in denying to the laborer all the profits of his industry? It can be proved that credit, without the aid of one dollar of capital, and to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars, is used in our country to employ labor, and this is the way it is done. Our National debt was first incurred in greenbacks. These were exchanged at the National Treasury for bonds bearing 6 per cent. gold interest, payable semi-annually, and as the gold value of all the greenbacks turned into bonds was only 55 cents on the dollar, our government is now paying over 11 per cent interest on the national debt; that is to say, every one hundred dollar bond, taking the average prices for which the greenbacks sold for gold, only cost 55 dollars gold, and this makes the interest paid to the bond holder over 11 per cent. per annum. This, all will admit, is as much interest as any people should be compelled to pay on their national indebtedness. These bonds are deposited in the U. S. Treasury to the amount of about 400 millions of dollars. Ninety per cent. of the amount in National bank notes are issued to the bankers gratis, on this security, and these notes are loaned to the people, to whom they rightfully belong, at a rate of interest varying, according to the Treasury report, from ten to twenty per cent. per annum. Will any financier show us where the bankers have one dollar of their capital invested in this national bank currency? and if they cannot, then capital is not necessary as a means to employ labor, and interest should not rob the producer.

WORKMAN.

WHISPERS FROM SAN JOSE.

Mrs. Laura Kendrick returned to the Free-Thought platform on Sunday. She spoke in the morning on "True Growth"; in the evening on "Young America," subjects chuck full of thought and suggestion, and the readers of COMMON SENSE will feel no uncommon surprise to be told these subjects were treated by the speaker with a grace and power befitting their high importance. The audiences were not large, but select. San Jose and vicinity have too strong temptations in the form of walks, drives, gardens and groves to allow the rostrum, on a bright, warm Sunday, to become a great financial temptation to any speaker, even one who, like Mrs. Kendrick, speaks "with the spirit and the understanding also." Mrs. Kendrick will occupy the platform in Stockton next Sunday, and the four Sundays immediately following will probably speak here.

Mrs. Louie M. Kerns, referred to in my notes of last week, was here for a few days, and seemed to draw a good deal of restful strength from the sun, moon and stars, the birds, flowers and people, and we expect her to come back to us next Sunday to remain a week or more. While here she gave several private, and one public, seance, and her controls, at least, have reason to feel good over the success of their efforts. The public seance was projected and conducted (so far as we on this side are concerned) under the most unfavorable conditions. The chairman, a Mr. Freeman, bluff, positive but honest, was critical even to captiousness, and yet some eight or ten messages were received, several attending spirits described, and everything recognized, complete and without a flaw. I would like to write for our COMMON SENSE readers a report of the wonderful occult revelations, and strange coincidences, personal surprises cropping out at every point, but I fear to crowd upon your pages, which have such diversity of thought to represent. Vasquez, the executed bandit, came back and thanked a lady of San Jose for having visited him in prison, and taught him something of Spiritualism. The change of conditions appears to have developed one part of the unfortunate Spaniard's nature. He is not lost to gratitude, whatever other losses he has sustained. Mrs. Kerns will give a public seance here next Sunday evening in Little Music Hall. S. W. R.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—I know very well that one trouble you have, in common with all other editors, is to satisfy your contributors, and put aside what deserves to be consigned to the waste basket, and I must confess that oftentimes when I read my productions in your paper, I cannot help wishing you had disposed of them in that way. People sometimes forget that an idea, as Spencer says of a truth, "is at first but dimly perceived," and requires to be worked out like a problem in Euclid. If we would take more pains to do this we would often find that the path we thought we saw so plain was like a Texas road that often runs into a cow path, ending in a squirrel track and a hickory tree; or like The Flying Dutchman, vanishes in a mist.

CONTRIBUTOR.

COMMON SENSE is furnished to subscribers for Three Dollars per annum, in advance. To save trouble to subscribers in various localities, friends will receive and forward subscriptions, as follows: C. W. Holt, Sacramento; Mrs. G. B. Kirby, Santa Cruz; R. W. Pontius, Seattle; W. J. Sweasy, Eureka; Mrs. Crane, Santa Barbara; Dr. E. Stevenson, Virginia City, Nevada; Dr. O. B. Bayne, Ferndale; E. H. Allen, Chico; J. L. Hatch, Santa Clara; Dr. D. W. C. Franklin, Los Angeles; E. S. Pope, San Buenaventura; P. H. Traak, San Diego.

In places where there is no agent, subscribers may remit in gold coin, currency, or by postal order. Address,

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, BUSINESS MANAGER,
Box 2163, San Francisco, Cal.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM H. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAY. 1, 1875.

FRIENDS of COMMON SENSE whose subscriptions are about to expire, can be of great aid to the publisher by sending in without delay the money for renewals. Three dollars is a small sum for each, but when multiplied by one thousand it makes an amount large enough to make a material difference in our financial affairs.

Mrs. ADDIE L. BALLOU returned from a very successful engagement in Humboldt county last week, and has now gone to Santa Cruz, where she will meet many friends made during her visit there a year ago. After a few weeks' sojourn in that pleasant sea-side retreat, she will appear again before a San Francisco audience, probably under the auspices of the Spiritualists' Union.

J. L. York lectures before the Spiritualists' Union, 911 Market street, to-morrow, Sunday May 2d. His subject is not yet announced. These meetings, owing to the difficulty of reaching the hall, (in the fourth story) have not recently been large. It is a shame to ask any speaker to talk to empty seats. While Union Hall is not usually one-fourth filled, the meetings of the Charter Oak Society have been suspended indefinitely. We hope that one or both of the societies will soon disband, and that Charter Oak Hall may be secured as a permanent meeting place for all Spiritualists on a liberal platform. There never was any good reason for a division.

SELF CULTURE SOCIETY.—The subject for discussion is still the Influence of Christianity on Civilization. The speakers on Sunday last were Mrs. Hanks, Mr. Lundi, Mrs. Ballou, Mr. Klein, Capt. Scott, Dr. White, and Mr. Pinkham. We shall publish Mrs. Hanks' address in full next week. Officers were elected for the ensuing six months, as follows: President, Dr. Hollister; (all the other nominees declined) Vice President, Mrs. Mary Hanks; Secretary, H. L. Knight; Treasurer, Mrs. Fitzgerald; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Frost. No Literary Committee was chosen, and it is hoped by some that none will be, as there seems to be little use for such a committee. The Secretary made an interesting report, showing that the Society is in a flourishing condition.

"Friends of Progress" and other "Liberal" people who desire to aid those of similar convictions, can do so, and also benefit themselves, by patronizing Mrs. Roberts, 29 O'Farrell. Read her advertisement.

OFFER TO SUBSCRIBERS.

With our next number the first volume of COMMON SENSE will close, and being desirous of extending its circulation, we offer each subscriber who will send us an additional name with his or her renewal the two copies for five dollars. Some can afford to spare the two dollars extra to furnish the paper to a friend, and some can spare the time necessary to obtain an additional subscriber. In one way or another we hope every old subscriber will assist us in extending the circulation of the paper. The more extensive the circulation is the better paper we can afford to provide; therefore it is for your interest, as well as our own, to do what you can to aid the enterprise. Do not wait a day before acting on this suggestion.

A legacy of one thousand dollars was bequeathed to the Children's Progressive Lyceum, by Thomas Neil, conditioned that if at the time of his death the association had ceased to exist, then the legacy should be applied to the British Benevolent Society. At the time of Neil's death there existed an unincorporated association of Spiritualists and Lyceum connected therewith. He was a member of both, and it was beyond a doubt his intention to leave the money to the Lyceum. After his death the persons who constituted the old association incorporated under the name of the San Francisco Spiritual Union, and received the Lyceum under its care, and for this reason the Court, Judge Myrick, disregarded the evident intent of the donor, and awarded the money to the British Benevolent Society. If this money had been left to a Sunday school connected with any Christian Church, and the circumstances of the case had been otherwise precisely similar, who can doubt that the church school would have been awarded the money? Spiritualism is not respectable yet.

The Banner of Light refuses the courtesy of an exchange with its near neighbor, The Kingdom of Heaven, whereupon Thomas Cook, editor of The Kingdom, gives Mr. Colby, of the Banner, a column of sharp words, ending as follows:

We think just as much of Colby, if he is an old dotard, as of an own blood brother; we are no respecter of persons, but think just as much of one person as another, though they may hate us; for none made themselves or chose their life-line. Therefore if Colby is getting old, and is in his dotage, and like an old dog can't be taught new tricks, he cannot help it. He and his noble old Banner have done well, but neither have soared beyond the reach of criticism. Both have about filled their mission, and if they will not move on they must move out of the way for those who DARE.

Good for Brother Cook. Be charitable, but do your duty, and tell the truth. The truth will win in the end, though you live not long enough (in this world) to enjoy its fruits.

"Life Scenes in New York City," a little volume of rhymes by Francis A. Logan, has recently been published, and is sold by the author for 25 cents. The sentiments inculcated are good, and possibly the rhyme may have additional attractions to some readers.

WORKINGMEN'S MEETING.

Another meeting was held in Dashaway Hall on Sunday last, for the discussion of questions of interest to all, but especially to the industrial classes. Mr. J. D. Pierson was called to the chair, and on accepting the position, made a few remarks in favor of combinations of workingmen. Hon. J. M. Days, who was expected to speak, being absent, W. N. Slocum read a brief essay on the present condition of society, the workings of our governmental and social system, and the necessity for the education of the working classes. Pat J. Healy spoke of land monopoly, the oppressions of interest, the danger of bloodshed unless something is done to avert that result, and urged workingmen to inform themselves for the purpose of self-protection. Mr. Farrel spoke of the unjust (not unequal) distribution of wealth, defending the Communistic idea that he who produces should possess the product. He said American workingmen are behind those of England in knowing how to protect themselves. We have no writers on political economy like John Stuart Mill, and have had very few on the rights of man since Jefferson and Paine. The rights of property have been considered here far more than the rights of man. He gave some interesting statistics, and closed by earnestly exhorting workingmen to form societies for self-improvement and protection. Brief remarks were made by Messrs. Byrnes, Hardcastle and Swain, and the meeting adjourned for one week, when J. M. Days will open the discussion.

JOHN COLLIER.—The Free Religious Society of Springfield, Mass., have shown their appreciation of Mr. Collier's ability as a popular lecturer by presenting him with a valuable gold watch, and several articles of silverware. The watch is worth $125, is finely engraved, and bears the inscription: "John Collier, Springfield, Mass., March 26, 1875; a tribute of friendship." Mr. Collier, from England, has lectured before the society four months during the present season, and has drawn good audiences, his last month being the most successful. Mr. and Mrs. Collier would be glad to visit the Pacific Coast, if a tour can be arranged, and societies here are requested correspond with our English friend and brother, care of Harvey Lyman, Springfield, Mass.

The Schenectady Union, noticing the appearance of footprints the size of a child's foot on the ceiling of the kitchen of Mrs. Veeder, a lady in that city, says the tracks continued to appear in broad daylight, in the presence of witnesses, but adds that as Mrs. Veeder is not a Spiritualist, therefore the phenomena cannot be traced to a spiritual source! What possible difference can it make whether Mrs. V. is a Spiritualist, a Methodist, Buddhist or any otherist? Some folks have queer ideas of Spiritualism.

Charles E. Pickett, after nine months confinement in jail for contempt of Court, has been released, his counsel asserting that he intended no disrespect. Pickett claimed the seat of Justice Crockett, and took possession of it before the Court convened. He should have been treated as a lunatic instead of a malefactor.

INDUSTRIAL FAIR.

The tenth Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute is to open on the 17th of August next. The grounds have been enlarged by the addition of a horticultural garden, covering an area of 24,000 square feet, adjoining the pavilion on Eighth street, extending from Market to Mission. This makes a total area for purposes of the exhibition of more than 200,000 square feet. Three thousand seats for visitors have been fitted up. The managers have decided to offer premiums for the best articles on display in each department. The premiums awarded will be as follows: Sixteen gold medals, fifty silver medals, society diplomas, certificates of merit, and special premiums as the managers determine. Applications for space must be made on or before July 20th. Exhibitors from abroad can consign goods to the "Managers of the Tenth Industrial Exhibition, 27 Post street, San Francisco," and they will be stored, if they arrive before the day of opening, free of expense, but transportation charges will not be paid by the managers.

LAVENDAR AND CHANEY.—These two gentlemen held forth to large audiences on Sunday evening last, Prof. Lavendar in Charter Oak, and Prof. Chaney in his "little church around the corner." A representative of Common Sense called first at Brother Chaney's, where he expected to hear some "scientific subject ably handled," but found the Professor relating ghost stories. After listening to three or four, he concluded to visit Brother Lavendar, and found him telling a story too; but it was an interesting one, instructive also, and exceedingly well told. It was a narrative of his experience among the Shakers. He went there hoping to live a retired life, free from the perplexities and worry of business, with work enough to secure good health, and plenty of time for reflection, meditation, "communing with the spirit," etc. He found more work than play, no freedom of thought or opinion, no opportunity for improvement, and went away satisfied with his experience. He described the peculiar religious services of the Shakers, their mode of living, their government, manner of recruiting their numbers, etc. Some parts of the discourse were very amusing. Mr. Lavendar's style itself is comic, and except when speaking earnestly on a serious subject, he keeps his hearers in the happiest of moods. He speaks again to-morrow evening. He may not be as interesting on some other subject, but we trust that none who go to hear him on our recommendation will be disappointed.

Spiritual meetings are now held in Liberty Hall, Oakland, near Market street depot, every Sunday, morning and evening. Interesting addresses are given by Mr. Curtis, Walter Hyde, of New York, Mrs. F. A. Logan and others.

DIFFICULTIES WITH SPIRITUALISM.

A correspondent of the Golden Age furnishes that live paper with a somewhat formidable list of difficulties which he has found in the way to prevent his acceptance of the spiritual theory to account for various phenomena called Spiritual. He says:

My perplexities for the most part pertain to the character of the communications received, and various circumstances attending them: (1) There are so many frauds, known and acknowledged to be such, that I cannot tell where the Fraud ceases and the Genuine begins. (2) The spirits, so called, give so little that is worth knowing. What they tell us is generally very commonplace, disappointingly so. (3) Mediums of the greatest power are frequently uncultivated, ignorant, vulgar, and sometimes boorish; and, what is worse, they are, in certain cases, persons devoid of the first principles of honor, morality or decency. To profess to converse with those one loves through such mediums, seems to a sensitive soul like profaning the dead. (4) I see no mediums of the most cultured and highly intellectual classes. True, I meet very fine people who are either Spiritualists or incline to be such, but they are not mediums. (5) A want of harmony in the communications we receive on important subjects, e. g., in regard to the exact character of the Bible, God, and the conditions of the future state. (6) The meagre knowledge we get of what definitely exists beyond the grave. I know of no single valuable point more than the profession that spirits live and commune with the inhabitants of this world. Now, if they do so communicate, why do they not unite in telling us something about the Hereafter that is positive, definite and worth knowing? (7) The deleterious effects of mediumistic gifts, and their exercise upon the mediums themselves, mentally, physically and otherwise. In many instances mediums become queer, eccentric, restless people. If I am not mistaken, I have noticed in this class of persons a special tendency to restlessness, in their social and domestic relations especially. (8) I fail to find in Spiritualism large, positive results for good—public, social or domestic. Spiritualism claims to be very strong in America. I think it is; but I cannot see points of marked value corresponding to its numbers. The tendency thus far seems to have been destructive—intellectually, socially and domestically, not to say morally. (9) The tendency to carry people back to mystery and supernaturalism. Were it not for the general intelligence which the last two or three centuries have begotten and fostered; were it not for the light of science and letters, whose refulgence is poured upon us with so much benignance to-day; were it not for these things, Spiritualism, as it seems to me, would bind us hand and foot in mystery and supernaturalism, and carry us back to the superstitions of antiquity. For myself, I have been for the last dozen years endeavoring to throw off some of the remaining excrescences of superstition bequeathed me from the Middle Ages; but Spiritualism virtually asks me to go back to even more than I started out with. (10) The utter captivity to which I am reduced when I attend a seance. Nature gives five ways of acquiring knowledge on all subjects to be investigated. Without the eye, the ear and the touch, we are worse off than the idiot. Yet, when I go to a Spiritualistic circle, the lights are usually turned down till I am blind, or as bad as blind; then I am compelled to join in the circle, and thus robbed of my hands and my touch; and, to complete the emasculation, I am requested to join in some old song of mediæval times, till the air is rent with discord and my hearing destroyed. I can scarcely think of anything more idiotic than a band of grown-up men and women sitting in a circle, with the lights turned down, singing at the top of their voices—

"When I can read my title clear
To manna in the skies," to conjure up the dead. Yet, in this imbecile condition, I am expected to investigate what to me is of the most vital import—the verity of spirit return after death. It strikes me as in every way the most ludicrous thing on earth. What would we say of a few savants of science, sitting thus around a polyp of the sea to make microscopic observations for the advancement of knowledge? It would not be half so ludicrous, and quite as satisfactory, to my mind.

Thus I have stated what to me are some of the more prominent difficulties in the way of Spiritualism. If the dead may commune with the living, and the living with the dead, for one, I would like to know it. It would forever settle some questions and turn my faith into knowledge. I do not desire controversy, but would hail any clear and convincing light with unspeakable joy.

COMMENTS.

1.—It is true there are frauds connected with spiritualism, but any sincere investigator can find honest mediums, or can sit with friends in whom he has confidence.

2.—True again; but that fact confirms the spiritual theory. Spirits are but human, and they know little more immediately after the change called death than they did before. Nine-tenths of our daily talk with friends is of the same quality.

3.—Most mediums are such merely by virtue of their physical organization. It is perhaps a matter of regret that communications from those whose memory we revere have to be filtered through such channels, but we must accept things as nature has ordained, seeking to understand her laws, that we may learn how to obtain better instruments, meanwhile making due allowance for the imperfections of those we have.

4.—Powerful intellect and high culture are not in consonance with the qualities which seem to be essential to mediumship. There are certain phases of mediumship which are in harmony with and aids to culture, such as impressional and inspirational mediumship. These develop the intuitive faculties, and are in accord with the most exalted intellect, as witness Swedenborg, and others of great mental power and moral purity. The names of many living seers could be given in illustration, if necessary.

5.—There is the same want of learning in the communications as there is in the people who seek them, the mediums through whom they are received, and the source from whence they come. No other result could be expected. We do not make the law—but must accept it as it exists. It is not to be wondered at that descriptions of the future state do not agree. It would be wondrous strange if they did. Souls are not only differently situated there as here, but, like ourselves, no two look upon the same thing in precisely the same light. All the messages purport to be from spirits. That of itself is an important agreement. They agree also in the statement that the spirit retains its individuality, with all the characteristics of mind and moral character it possessed here, and that its happiness or misery depends upon its organization, the experiences it has passed through and the degree of progress it has made. Although some "communications" refer to the spirit world as a locality, and none deny that it is objective, and to a degree material, yet the general tenor of the teaching is that it is a condition, and that the terms heaven and hell are but representative of extreme mental and moral states, and further, that the continuance of a spirit in an unhappy condition depends there as here in part upon its own efforts, in part upon its surroundings, but still more upon the tendencies of its organization. Surely these assertions, coming as they do from millions of spirits, and through mediums in all parts of the world, are sufficient points of agreement to excite our special wonder. As to the Bible, and God, when people agree upon them here, it will be time enough to ask for an agreement there; those now there being the same that were once here.

6.—It is not to be supposed that we can with our material senses get a clear idea of spiritual things. It is only by having the spiritual sight opened that we can get even an approximate idea of spiritual life. There are all degrees of intelligence and moral purity in that world as in this, and the experience of souls in that life varies even more than does the experience of human beings here. It is not reasonable to expect their statements to harmonize perfectly, nor that they should make clear what we cannot comprehend. Even in this life it requires two exalted minds to clearly convey one exalted thought. There must be a competent source, or the idea cannot spring into life, and it must then reach a receptive mind, or it falls dead in the utterance. Our inquirer asks too much.

7.—Mediums are not made "queer, eccentric people" by mediumship; but they are fitted for mediumship because they are not like other people by nature. It is true that many persons have been injured by surrendering themselves to diverse and unhealthy influences, but many more by using proper care have been benefitted. We know of individuals who owe all they are to spiritualism. They have become well informed without study, physically healed without medicine, and morally uplifted without human aid.

8.—If spiritualism has not yet accomplished good results, but has been on the contrary destructive, it is because of the grandeur of its mission, requiring time for its fulfilment. At its very birth it found itself at war with established institutions, and it could not build up without at first tearing down. For twenty-five years it has been an iconoclast, ruthlessly destroying idols, without injury to the idol worshipers. Though despising men's superstitions, it has been full of charity for humanity itself, and has taught among its cardinal principles that individuals are not wholly to blame for their imperfections; that evil is not evil per se, but undeveloped good; that even crime is a disease, and that the criminal is deserving of commiseration and aid. It recognizes in every human being the germ of an immortal soul, and is content to wait, as nature requires, for the glory that surely awaiteth us all at last. Its mission is not complete, but has just begun; and the progress it has already made is greater than that made by christianity for centuries after the death of Christ. There is opportunity enough yet in the womb of time for Spiritualism to show what it can do.

9.—Spiritualism, instead of leading to mystery and supernaturalism, has rescued many things from the category of mysticism, and has proved that the supernatural is but a name for that which has no existence. All things are natural; all are governed by law; there is nothing outside of the universe, nor above nature, not even that myth called God. Spiritualism strikes at the very foundation of mystery, the assumed Godhead itself, and shows there is no room in nature for such a being, no work for him to do, no purpose he can fill, and no use in his existence. Nature itself is all sufficient. Because Spiritualism has rescued from undeserved opprobrium the ancient science of Astrology, and has recognized the fact that every atom in the universe of worlds is related to and has an influence upon every other atom in that universe, some of the would-be-wise, some of the pretenders in science, have derided it as the fosterer of ancient superstitions; but no man of marked ability presumes to deny that astrology, in spite of all its absurdities, was based on truths firmly established by human experience. We are not afraid of hard names; therefore we do not shrink from acknowledging any truth no matter how unpopular. Truth will outlive all opposition, and triumph at last; so the sooner we put ourselves in harmony with it, the better it will be, not for truth, but for us.

10.—This is amusing, to say the least, but it proves conclusively that our critic has not traveled very far on the path of spiritualistic investigation. The man who has not passed beyond the inanities of the ordinary spiritual circle, such as is here described, has much yet to learn.

In conclusion, it is evident that the writer in the Golden Age has not studied carefully the spiritual philosophy—has not looked at it in the light of nature and reason; but has judged it by his own standard. In other words, instead of bringing himself into harmony with the philosophy of spiritualism, he has attempted to make it harmonize with his preconceived notions, and the result, of course, is failure. We have only this to say to him: Cultivate your own spiritual gifts. Put yourself in a condition to receive, and aid will be given you. All "clear and convincing light" must come, not by others, but through yourself. Keep your cup right side up, and it will be filled to overflowing with the waters of everlasting life. W. N. S.

Mrs. L. E. Drake closed her engagement with the Spiritualists' Union on Sunday evening last, her subject being "God in the Constitution," on which she threw new light, giving facts sufficient to convince the most skeptical that the Christians are determined on a certain course, and in her opinion they will succeed.

RADICAL THOUGHT.

Mr. John Ball, a member of the Friends of Progress, recently delivered an address before the "Circle" in this city from which the following extracts are made:

OUR REPRESENTATIVES.

In a Democratic Government the rulers are the representatives of the people, and it is folly to call the representatives hard names. Teach the people to elect better and honest men. If a man takes a bribe from a candidate, he has no right to grumble if that candidate, after his election, also takes a bribe. The very foundation of the Government is the vote. If you build a house with rotten material, the whole house will be rotten; and if the voters are corrupt, so also will be the representatives. We must strike at the root. Our work is among the people.

CAPITAL AND LABOR.

The present antagonism between Labor and Capital is causing an incalculable amount of suffering and distress among all classes of the people. It is of no earthly use to rail at the Capitalist. Although he is perhaps better off than the laborer, still he is one of the victims to a false and vicious system. Workingmen call a capitalist everything but a gentleman, if he docks their wages a dollar a day, but when they hire a man to make a pair of boots, they will not pay $10 if they can get them for $8. Because they will tell you they "must buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest." Very well; but be consistent, and allow others the right to act the same way. It makes no difference whether a man spends one dollar or a million, under the present system he has the right to get the most for his money. This is one of those good old ways when the strongest wins—every man for himself, and the devil for us all. The system is false, and we, as reformers, should set our faces against it.

Capital should be subservient to labor; and all labor should be remunerated on a just and equitable basis. For in the vineyard of God's Universe all must labor; it is a law we break at our own peril; and the idlers, in time, will be starved out. The present antagonism of Capital and labor places them both in false positions, and ruins the capitalist and laborer alike. They should be friends, not enemies. This being so, there must be something wrong, somewhere; and the question for us to consider is. How can these things be put right? Capital is the fruit of labor. The fruits of labor ought surely to belong to the laborer, and, every man should be remunerated according to the amount and skill of his labor. There should be no surplus capital, for the amount and quality of the labor required to place any article in the market should be the measure of its value. We can't turn the world upside down in a day; but the sooner we begin to destroy the false and build up the true, the better will it be for ourselves, and for the world.

NATURAL LAW.

The world, like the average individual is educated through experience, and my hope is not in the general destruction of the old maxims and rules of life observed by our forefathers, but in the all-wise and unseen Power, which is the source and inspiration of all Life and intelligence. Whichever way we turn, if we look deep enough, we find engraven at the root of everything the word Law. Effect follows cause, as the night the day; and whatever value an exception may have to a rule, there is no exception to a Law! for like God, Himself it varies not, but is eternally the same. And before we can cure the ills which afflict humanity we must understand the laws which underlie humanity and the various phases of its existence. It is beginning to be understood that we are what our progenitors have made us, and most of us are sent into this world more or less deformed and unhealthy. We are born with tendencies to all manner of crimes, and we inherit the malignity of devils, because our parents and their ancestors, disobeyed the laws of generation. There is but one cure for this evil, and that is true marriage; and no law should bind a man and woman to a false union.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION.

Of course there is a dark side to this social movement, as there is to all other things, because there is a certain class of people in whom the evils of any system find expression without any of the corresponding virtues. But it is not right that because a man and woman are legally married and afterwards find they are not well mated, that they should be obliged to live together as man and wife, or lose their good name. Because a human reptile works himself into favor with the heads of a household, and through their influence marries an unsuspecting daughter, and after he has possession of his prize, turns round upon her and shows himself in his true colors, and she finds the terrible mistake she has made, is it not monstrous that any human law should compel her to live in his baneful society? It is time such laws were buried in oblivion in every country worthy of being called civilized.

THE LAW OF LIFE.

It is believed by many, and it has been advocated in this room, that there is no such thing as a universal standard, which will answer as a rule of life for us all, but that what is right for one man or woman might be wrong for another. As a rule of life, perhaps, some people have put into practice such a doctrine; but, underlying all rules, at the basis of our inmost lives, is a law as eternal as God himself, and as extensive as the universe. It is a law on which all life is founded, and to which, sooner or later, all life must conform. Man is not an airy nothing, but an eternal fact, which can no more be crushed out of existence than the universe itself can be obliterated. "Man, know thyself," is an injunction we are all trying to obey; but knowledge is but half the battle. We must know, but we must also do.

INDIVIDUAL SOVEREIGNTY.

The one point gained is the recognition of the sovereignty of the individual; but the trouble is, we confine ourselves to our own personal well-being, and it is this selfishness which causes all the discord and all the failures in the ranks of Liberalism. Friends of progress, we must advance one step further, and then we can carry on the work of reform with undivided ranks, and with irresistible power. We must infuse into every element of reform that unselfishness which will permit us to work for the good of the whole, regardless of our own personal interests. It is quite true that we shall be gainers in the end, because we shall be better women and men.

PRACTICAL REFORM.

We must look steadily at the facts; and when any plan is agreed upon whereby any of the crying evils of our day may be lessened, we must go to work and carry out such plan, regardless of what it may cost us. Till we are prepared to do this, we shall do nothing; but when we are prepared to forget ourselves in the work we are doing, there is no power on earth that can thwart our designs; and there is no intelligent power that will desire to do so. There are persons enough now in this room to change the whole phase of civilized society, in twenty or twenty-five years, were we but united in a spirit of universal love on some work of needed reform. There is no limit to human capabilities when engaged in a righteous cause, and inspired by an unselfish devotion to the universal good.

WHAT DOES LIFE MEAN?

Development and progress are written on every square inch of the universe. You may call the source of that development what you like; I call it God. Each individual soul is a consequence of causes which have been existent throughout all time. Exactly how or why we were made rational and sentient beings we may not know; the forces producing us were things over which we had no control. But we find ourselves here—living and thinking beings—and what for? I believe it is that we may incorporate into our lives the life of that self-existent and infinite Power which I call God. When the first glimmerings of the truth filter into the budding soul, it is filled with great interest, and it begins to yearn for something it cannot, as yet, understand. But there is no legitimate aspiration of the human soul, which, by diligent seeking, will not be satisfied. We are born into this world without our consent, but we are born into that higher life of the Kingdom of God only at our own desire. No soul ever yet entered that higher life without knowing it—for it is knowledge and power. Truth is eternal, and till we know it is, we have not found it. You cannot mistake it; for to doubt is to be damned. Skepticism may be honest; but it is only honest as it is seeking for the truth; and there is no rest—there is no true peace for any living soul—till it has found rest in a knowledge of the truth. Ignorance is not a bliss, never was, and never will be.

WHAT IS IMMORTALITY?

Spiritualism has banished the terrors of physical death, but it has not demonstrated the immortality of the soul. It has, to some extent, broken down the barrier between this world and the next, but as we are here, so we shall be there; for it is merely a change of place. And we may live on for ten or twenty thousand years, and yet not be immortal. Immortality is a birth of the soul, and neither men nor spirits can help us. We must walk alone through the portal that leads to eternal life, even as we pass alone through the "valley of the shadow of death." We shall find true soul-life at last, and when we find it all is peace, and there is none without it. This is a personal matter for each one, and if we are honest in our efforts and aspirations, it is all that is required.

Scan o'er the past, and let thy future be
As true to God as He has been to thee;
Stay not thy course; but be thy onward flight
From doubt to truth, from darkness into light.

Darkness, like a pall, has hung over the past history of the world, but there is yet to be the dawning of a brighter day, in which the sunlight of universal love shall shed its rays on an enlightened humanity, and all nations and peoples shall be prosperous and happy. Let us cherish faith in each other, and hail with delight the dawning of that glorious time when the mists shall be cleared away. The world will move on in its march of progress, whether we are its friends or not; but it is to our eternal well-being that we be found on the side of truth. Hand in hand, and hearts united, we can stand undaunted before all the powers of evil, and leave a record on the sands of time which the ocean of eternity cannot erase.

Bayard Taylor, in his lectures upon ancient Egypt, informs us that many sentences recorded on the papyri found in the tombs, give evidence that most of the Mosaic law was compiled from the religious tenets of the Egyptian priesthood, and that some of the rites observed by the Jews, as recorded in the Bible, had their origin in Egypt where they were observed before the days of Abraham!

THE FREETHOUGHT MOVEMENT.

To-day, May 1st, at Charter Oak Hall, the Committee of Forty will convene, to decide upon some plan of organization. At the preliminary meeting of this Committee, held three weeks ago, a sub-committee was selected to draft a constitution, and the following has been agreed upon, and will be offered to the Committee for acceptance, together with various recommendations not yet ready for publication.

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SEC. 1.—This organization shall be known as the California Society of Freethought.

SEC. 2.—The objects of this Society shall be to assist in freeing the minds of the people from superstitions, and prejudices of a hurtful nature, whether relating to religion, government, educational matters, or any other subject which has a bearing on human welfare, and to establish in their stead principles based on science, and institutions dictated by common sense.

SEC. 3.—All residents of this State who maintain the right to think, speak and act for themselves, untrammelled by creeds, sacred books, or any other authority than the truth (as they are able to perceive it) may become members of this Society by subscribing to this Constitution.

SEC. 4.—All the rights and privileges of this organization shall be accorded to members without distinction of sex.

ARTICLE II.

SEC. 1.—The officers of this society shall consist of a President, nine Vice Presidents, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary and a Treasurer, who shall be chosen at the Annual Conventions, and shall hold office one year, and until their successors are elected and qualified.

SEC. 2.—These officers, in addition to the services implied by their respective titles, shall act jointly as an Executive Committee, whose duty it shall be to make all necessary arrangements for the Annual Conventions of the organization, elect officers to fill vacancies, call special Conventions whenever expedient, and take such other action for the promotion of Freethought as may appear to them advisable. A majority of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

ARTICLE III.

SEC. 1.—All Freethought associations now organized, or which may hereafter be organized in this State, after officially declaring their adhesion to the principles governing this Society, and notifying the President of such action, shall be entitled to representation in State Conventions in the proportion of one delegate for each ten members.

SEC. 2.—In localities where no Freethought society exists, any number of persons, not less than five, after subscribing to this Constitution, may choose one delegate to represent them in State Convention.

SEC. 3.—A State Convention of this Society shall be held on the first Thursday of October, in each year, to be continued, from day to day, at the pleasure of a majority of the members.

SEC. 4.—In the forenoon of the second day's session of each Annual Convention it shall be the special business of such Convention to elect officers for the ensuing year, the election to be by ballot, in the following order: 1st, President; 2d, nine Vice Presidents on one ticket; 3d, Recording Secretary; 4th, Corresponding Secretary; 5th, Treasurer. The name of the person receiving the lowest number of votes shall be omitted on each successive ballot, until the candidate receiving the highest number shall have a majority of all the votes cast. Such person shall be declared elected, and the term of office shall commence immediately thereafter.

ARTICLE IV.

SEC. 1.—This Constitution may be amended by a majority vote of all the duly accredited delegates of any Annual Convention; but no amendment shall be made on the same day in which the proposition to amend is offered.

In referring to the failure of Spiritualists to organize, the Golden Age says there are sects enough in the country already, and a new institution would prove a curse.

For Common Sense.

LOVE IS FREE.

BY J. BALL.

Can you stop the mountain torrent?
Can you bind the ocean-gale?
Can you dam the river's current?
Can you level hill and dale?

If you cannot, then you never
Can, the heart that beats for me,
From my fond embraces sever;
Nature's law makes our love free.

Free are we when deep affection
Twines our hearts and lives in one—
Free to sever this connection,
When its destined course is run.

Nature works by "Silent Forces"
In and through all things that be;
These have their appointed courses—
In those courses always free.

So in man must Nature ever,
Fount of inspiration be—
From which rises streams that never Cease their flowing pure and free.

ONLY A WOMAN.

BY HESTER A. BENEDICT.

Only a woman, shriveled and old?
The play of the winds and the prey of the cold!
Cheeks that are shrunken,
Eyes that are sunken,
Lips that were never o'erbold;

Only a woman, forsaken and poor,
Asking an alms at the bronze church door.

Hark to the organ! roll upon roll
The waves of its music go over her soul!
Silks rustle past her,
Thicker and faster;
The great bell ceases its toll.

Fain would she enter, but not for the poor
Swingeth wide open the bronze church door.

Only a woman—waiting alone,
Lily cold on a ice-cold throne,
What do they care for her?
Mumbling a prayer for her,
Giving not bread but a stone.

Under old laces their haughty hearts beat,
Mocking the woes of their kin in the street.

Only a woman! In the old days
Hope caroled to her her happiest lays!
Somebody missed her,
Somebody kissed her,
Somebody crowned her with praise;
Somebody faced up the battles of life,
Strong for her sake who was mother or wife.

Somebody lies with a tress of her hair
Light on his heart where the death-shadows are;
Somebody waits for her,
Opening the gates for her,
Giving delight for despair.

Only a woman—nevermore poor—
Dead in the snow at the bronze church door.

BE STILL AND WAIT.

BY RANDMICK R. McFARVIN, M. D.

Be still, O Soul!
Immortal Fates with tireless fingers work,
And from the tangled threads of time
Do weave the garment of eternity.
Be still and wait.
The loom hath many threads;
But the swift shuttle runneth well.
A day, a night, and lo! between two hours
The fabric falls.
Be still and wait,
For thou shalt wear the garment of eternity,
The shining robe of immortality.

A FRAGMENT.

"An hour before she spoke of things
That memory to the dying brings,
And killed me all the while;
Then, after some sweet dying words,
She seemed among the flowers and birds,
Until she fell asleep.

'Twas Summer then, 'tis Autumn now;
The crimson leaves fall off the bough,
And strew the gravel sweep;
I wander down the garden walk,
And muse on all the happy talk
We had beneath the limes;

Of golden eves when she and I
Sat watching here the flushing sky,
The sunset and the sea;
Or heard the children in the lanes,
Following home the laden wains,
And shouting in their glee.

But when the daylight dies away,
And ships grow dusky in the bay,
These recollections cease;
And in the stillness of the night,
Bright thoughts that end in dreams as bright,
Communicate their peace.

I wake and see the morning star,
And hear the breakers on the bar,
The voices on the shore;
And then, with tears, I long to be
Across a dim, unsounded sea,
With her forever more."

THE WONDERFUL HEALER AND CLAIRVOYANT
MRS. C. M. MORRISON.

This celebrated Medium is the instrument or organism used by the invisibles for the benefit of humanity. The placing of her name before the public is by request of her Controlling Band. They, through her organism, treat all diseases and cure in every instance where the vital organs necessary to continue life are not destroyed. Mrs. Morrison is an

UNCONSCIOUS TRANCE MEDIUM, CLAIRVOYANT AND CLAIRAUDIENT.

From the very beginning, hers is marked as a most remarkable career of success, such as has seldom if ever fallen to the lot of any person. No disease seems too insidious to remove, nor patient too far gone to be restored.

Mrs. Morrison, becoming entranced, the lock of hair is submitted to her control. The diagnosis is given through her lips by the Band, and taken down by her Secretary. The original manuscript is sent to the Correspondent.

When Medicines are ordered, the case is submitted to Mrs. Morrison's Medical Band, who give a prescription suited to the case. Her Medical Band use vegetable remedies, (which they magnetize) combined with a scientific application of the magnetic healing power.

Diagnosing disease by lock of hair, $1.00. (Give age and sex.)

SPECIFIC FOR EPILEPSY AND NEURALGIA.

Address MRS. C. M. MORRISON, Boston, Mass., Box 2519.

Signs of the Times.

The Presbyterians are preparing for the great London meeting to form a confederation of all the Presbyterian bodies in the world.

It is proposed by the Beecher party that Mrs. Tilton be examined by the Judge and jury, but not by counsel. This would be a good thing for the Beecher side.

Solon Pattee was lately employed as an expert to examine the books of the Police Department, spending one month at the work, for which he received the handsome sum of $500; but the Board of Supervisors at their last meeting voted him $1,050 additional, making over $1,500 for one month's work.

The Golden Age says the new Tribune Building is an architectural fraud. The editor should see our "big box full of bay windows" called the Palace Hotel, if he desires to see the greatest fraud in that line in America. It looks as if the architect started out to put up a cotton factory, and that the owner changed his mind when too late to change the plan.

Rev. T. M. Dawson, late of the Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, Cal., has resigned and gone to Nevada, leaving a number of other clerical gentlemen losers to the tune of some thousands of dollars, invested for them by Dawson in mining stocks, which have declined in value. Among the losers are Rev. Mr. Alexander, Rev. Dr. Poor, Rev. Alfred H. Kellogg, Dr. Fish, etc. Some of the losers are mum through fear of exposure. Rev. Dawson was divorced from his wife some months since, on the ground of desertion, she refusing to come to this State with him from New York.

Opposite the silk mill of Cheney Brothers, the well-known manufacturers at Hartford, there was a large liquor saloon where the employees were in the habit of squandering their earnings. In order to do away with the nuisance the Cheney brothers purchased it, and turned it into a temperance coffee and cheap lunch house, to which they have since added a department, which is under the control of a number of ladies in the city, where they furnish poor women with cloth and other materials for making clothing, and pay them for their work with groceries and provisions. The articles are purchased by people in the city and visitors, and the project has worked finely, and has been a great help to the poor during the past winter.

Of the 12,000,000 women in America, at least 10,000,000 wear calico dresses. If the times are hard the women manage to do with one dress less during the year, making a loss to the trade of 100,000,000 yards. This shows what an effect poor crops have on the general business of the country.

The Westminster Review says of Miss Cobbe's last book: "It is a sign of the times when an accomplished and sensitive woman can discuss, without the veil of anonymity, such a matter as the 'Life after Death,' and utter thoughts upon it which are not unworthy of Francis Newman or Theodore Parker."

Mr. Ralston, after testifying before the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors that he had several times subscribed to pay Rosener, the Assessor, money, giving $1000 at one time and $1,500 at another, and on one occasion raising $6,000 from other bankers, whose assessments were too high, all for "election purposes," of course, now, when exposure comes, and public odium is likely to attach to him, says he did it all to aid Rosener because he is a Jew, and he wanted to sustain religious freedom!

When the "dishwasher" of the Cosmopolitan acted as go-between for certain School Directors and poor girls who wanted positions as teachers, the Bulletin thought no terms too strong to characterize his meanness; but when the millionaire, Ralston, acts as go-between for a thief on one side and dishonest tax payers on the other, the Bulletin is mum. It has not heard of the case; or possibly it thinks, as does Ralston, that the one who exposes such acts is "a dangerous man in the Community"—that is, we suppose, dangerous to the community of thieves! We agree with Ralston perfectly, if that is what he means.

The Pacific Bank was assessed on a capital of $556,000. Mr. Ralston of the Bank of California who acted as "go-between" for the Assessor and the rich men who wished to escape taxation, sent a note to Mr. Sutton of the Pacific Bank, asking him to "see him." Mr. Ralston wanted $1,000 for Rosener, as Sutton says, to secure a reduction of assessment, but Ralston says, he simply asked it as a "contribution," saying to Sutton, "I don't ask you to give it as a consideration for this reduction; I don't look at it in that light." The reduction was made however, to $300,000; so by paying $1,000 the Bank saved $5,000. Now Mr. Sutton has told the truth about the transaction, and Mr. Ralston now says he regards Mr. Sutton as "a dangerous man in the community." "When thieves fall out," etc.

A REVIEW OF DR. GIBBONS' ADDRESS.

BY HENRY T. CHILD, M. D., OF PHILADELPHIA.

I have just read the "Annual Address before the San Francisco Medical Society, delivered December 21, 1874, By Henry Gibbons, M. D. With your permission I will say a few words about this address, upon what the doctor "prefers to call Spiritism," meaning Spiritualism, and its hygienic influences. He objects to seances, because—

A number of individuals sit around a table, with their hands resting upon it. They expect or desire to witness some extraordinary phenomenon, having relation to departed spirits. Their minds are solemnized by the nature of the occasion, and, indeed, the direction of their thoughts towards another world is considered essential in some degree to the success of the experiment. In this state of anticipation they sit for an hour, sometimes for two hours, or even longer. Will any sane man or woman assert that all this is compatible with the normal and healthful action of the brain and nervous system?

I should like to ask the doctor how much this differs from nine-tenths of the religious meetings which are held all over the world. He says:

Night after night, the body and mind are subjected to the same excitement and strain. The subject is ever present in thought. Before the brain has recovered from the impression made by one seance, there comes another. Nervous and susceptible people must soon feel and show the noxious influence. Those of cold and phlegmatic dispositions may not exhibit the consequences, but this does not prove that no hidden evil results.

That is sound common sense, but it does not apply to Spiritualism any more than it does to any other religious, or, indeed, any other kind of meetings carried to such excess. He continues:

I do not assert that all the disciples of Spiritualism are subjected to the ordeal described; but that processes equivalent to them are generally practiced will not be denied. Nor is it essential to my purpose to deny the truth of the alleged phenomena. It is better for my argument to admit the validity of the statements made by Spiritualists. If all they claim be true, their practices are the more deleterious to health.

The doctor is too much of a philosopher to argue that the abuse of any good thing is a reason for its prohibition. How many people are there who "sit around tables" and eat very improper articles at very improper times? Every sensible person will object to this, but are we to abandon eating proper food at proper times because of certain and very common abuses?

The doctor's remarks about mesmerism display an ignorance of that subject that is inexcusable in a man of his learning. He says, "It is argued there should be no limit set to the boundaries of science; the truth should be investigated at all hazards." Then follow some charges against Spiritualism which are gratuitous and unworthy of a liberal man, such as I believe the doctor to be, and not one who should be included in the category of the prejudiced of whom, a spirit once said to me, "Woe unto them that are inspired by their prejudices, for they walk in darkness, and the shadow of unrest falleth around them."

Spiritism loves darkness rather than light, and covers its asserted phenomena with a veil of privacy. So far from enlarging the boundaries of science, it is in direct conflict with the established laws of matter, and promotive of credulity and superstition. All its modern revelations amount to little more than a rehash of the ancient annals of witchcraft. No new truth in Geography, Astronomy or physical science has it brought to light.

This is not true to all, though it may be to the writer.

Even should it claim to do so how are we to determine the credibility of the claim, when, by universal acknowledgment, honest spirits and lying spirits testify indiscriminately, so that the only proof of the truth of any revelations is a knowledge of the fact possessed by a living witness.

This is one of the most important facts in connection with modern Spiritualism, teaching as it does that the change called death leaves the individual precisely as he was before. Old theology has taught for a long period that there are but two conditions in the other life, one of endless happiness, in which the few—the saints—dwell forever, and one of endless torment, to which the mass of mankind go—all who violate any single item of the moral code, according to their interpretation of the declaration of the apostle James. Spiritualism proves that each individual is the same after death that he was before, and by the fact which the doctor cites, establishes this most important and valuable truth. The presumption is that if the doctor were to pass over to the spirit life, he would still feel some opposition to Spiritualism, and see no good in it, for a time at least, and this would furnish one means of identifying him.

The doctor refers to insanity, and says, "The tendency of these pursuits to disorder the intellect is not to be tested by the records of insane asylums, or measured by the actual number of cases of insanity known or reputed to have so originated." We do not see the reason why statistics should be ignored here. This is a subject of vast importance. We contend that Spiritualism is not only less liable to produce insanity than popular theology, as the statistics of the subject show, but that it is better calculated to remove the causes than any other system that has ever been presented to humanity. Spiritualism settles the question that man is a spirit now and here; that this spirit has continued in unbroken identity, and that under favorable conditions, it can communicate with those still in the body. There is not the least necessity for this investigation to injure the health of any one, and Spiritualists ought to protest against all practices that tend to injure health. It is well known that many of the pursuits of life are attended with injurious influences, and we ought to guard against these. Spiritualism only requires candid and impartial investigation. Laying aside those personal prejudices which prevent this, we can soon acquire that knowledge that shall settle the question of a future life, and remove every lingering doubt, and with these, the chief causes of insanity. Trusting that the doctor will receive these criticisms in the spirit in which they are given, we ask him to treat this subject in a manner that will be satisfactory to him when we stand on the other shore and look back upon this short life journey.

IMPEDIMENTS TO TRUTH.

BY C. BRINTON, JR.

Sooner or later we all learn "that no pleasure is comparable to the standing on the vantage ground of truth." In the pursuit of this sure foundation, one naturally expects to encounter those obstacles which bar access to the unknown—but the truth-seeker has frequently to encounter, in addition to normal obstructions, artificial hindrances, barriers against the truth erected by those who have been deemed its peculiar champions. To comprehend how resistance from such improbable sources can arise, it becomes necessary to examine past revolutionary epochs. When the ever recurring conflicts between light and darkness—conflicts through which humanity has always obtained the power of using some faculty, physical or mental, which restriction had held in abeyance—are examined, the rulers of the day, guided solely by precedent, are evermore seen to be arrayed against the prophetic quickenings of the new era. Existing authority, esteeming that only to be wisdom which the experience of the past sanctions as such, condemns, as the language of folly, the uncomprehended inspirations of the seers who herald the incoming blessing, consequently, these prophets have found the dungeon, the rack, the stake as their welcome. "Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne." Why, to-day, we think, and are unquestioned as to our thoughts; why, to-day, we speak, and are free to repeat our speech; why, to-day, we have an individuality undisputed by kaiser or pope, is simply because some souls in the past were brave enough to use their reason—were bold enough to proclaim their deductions in the face of those limitations by which ignorance shackles human capacities—truth-seekers, who, rather than forego the crystal waters of knowledge, become martyrs for truth's sake.

To-day we are just entering the portals of the most glorious revelation that the ages have ever recorded; that which was spoken of by the prophet Joel, which was inaugurated by the heavenly impartation of Pentecost, is coming in its fulness, uncircumscribed by locality, limitless in duration, wide-spread as the universe, all-reaching as humanity's need, celestial knowledge out-poured by the Author of life, that his created may be able to enter "the new heaven and new earth." The dawning of spiritualism has plucked the sting from death, has despoiled the grave of its victim, has brought immortality to life; yet, vested theology, delving among the dry bones of a once quick revelation, turns away from the living light that reveals the hidden, and clings to the partial knowledge while looking "through a glass darkly."

Theology accepts an illumination given to a less advanced period of the world's history as the sole standard of to-day; it sets a literal interpretation of symbolical teachings as an authoritative check over the spirit of free inquiry, and treating reason as if every untrammelled thought could educe only evil, theology requires servants to bow in unquestioning reverence before its creedal edicts. It utters anathemas against Freethinkers, and so far as the spirit of the age will permit, constrains obedience to its precepts by depriving the skeptic of those privileges which inhere to Christians. Already this year, Mr. Thorne, member-elect of the North Carolina Legislature, was refused his seat because his conceptions of God differed from the attributes ascribed to the Supreme Being in the decalogue, while a German applicant for naturalization was refused citizenship, by a Philadelphia judge, because of infidelity.

Spiritualism, devoid of those dogmas which bar the avenues of knowledge, without those creeds which restrain advancement, holds that humanity is imperfect, not vile; it aims to educate human faculties, to unfold human capacities, to develop human susceptibilities, believing that it is far more in harmony with supreme wisdom to evolve individual endowments to a complete and harmonious whole, than it is to repress human powers of perception, of action, or of fruition. Spiritualism seeks students to test the phenomena of life, and bids them hold fast only that which convinces the judgment.

GOD IN ALL FORMS.

The human mind is so constituted that it judges things not of the senses by a law of analogy corresponding with the experience of the senses. We personify the power of life, motion, sensation and intelligence, and endow it with attributes like those possessed by ourselves. Ask a man to tell you of his God and he will tell you of his own character. Every nation has fashioned its deity in accordance with its own spiritual development. In the ages hard and finty they carved stone images, and worshiped the strong, heavy, ponderous and mighty. We even build what we are able to form out of gross matter as a representative of our highest ideal. Matter is spirit unrefined, and spirit is matter refined. God, being a spirit, is the life and power of all forms, and consequently there is no particle of matter in the universe that does not contain a perfect embodiment of the "First Great Cause." The highest manifestation of God is in forms.

"He lives in the sunshine,
And dwells in the storm."

The beautiful flower that blooms to gladden the heart with its beauty, to regale the senses with its delicious aroma, is a manifestation of Deity. The song of birds, the low wail of the wind, the shrieking of the tempest, the soft lullaby of the fond mother to her helpless infant, and the loud roar of the cataract, the mighty surges of the Storm King, all are manifestations in oral form of the "voice of God." The spirit must work harmoniously through matter to produce a perfect form; hence the want of harmony develops imperfect forms.

In the moral, as in the physical world, action involves a sequence that cannot be deputed to another.—Brinton.

LIBERALISM.

For Common Sense.

BY JOHN BALL.

If modern Liberalism has a mission at all, it is to tear down every vestige of the "platform" on which the Christian church of to-day rests. The doctrines of Human Depravity, and the Plenary Inspiration of the Scriptures, are both untenable, and when they are gone, I fail to see the need of such an organization as the Church of Christ. It must give place to something better. The religion of the future cannot possibly be the worshiping of a God who has revealed himself at sundry odd times, and through certain individuals. Christianity holds about the same relation to the religion of the future as the account of the creation recorded in Genesis holds to the science of Geology. If a student of Geology were to take Sir Charles Lyell's theory of the formation of the earth, and try to make every new discovery in that direction for the next fifty years conform to the theory instead of making the theory conform to the facts, it would be just as sensible as asking rational beings to-day to worship just so much of God as was known two thousand years ago, and no more. God is continually making a revelation of himself, or rather, man is continually learning more of Him. Every new science, and every addition to a science already known, expands our knowledge of God. Every man must worship the God he knows, for he cannot intelligently worship a being he does not know. Over every church door should be written this inscription, "To an unknown God, whom ye ignorantly worship." Nowhere in the past history of the earth can you find any traces of man's fall; but everywhere he has left marks of his progressive tendencies. Man's face is pointed heavenward, always has been, and always will be. And the laws underlying human development are just as uniform in their working as is the law of gravitation. Law and order are manifested throughout the inception and development of human life, as there is throughout every other department of nature. All men are working out their own salvation, and will eventually succeed; for the God of all the earth is just. Christianity has done its work; Liberalism is preparing the way for a new and better order of things, wherein that "abomination of desolation" called Free Love, will prove itself a purer and holier thing than the marriage system of the present day. All evil is but undeveloped good; and when human nature has free course, unfettered by tyrannical, monopolizing corporations, and undamned by a superstitious church, man will show himself, not sin-stricken and palsied with lust, but free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; perfect as nature intends he shall be; an intelligent, aspiring and progressive being. Liberalism is but a new departure; we are breaking loose from the leading-strings of our decrepit guardians, but it is a natural growth; and all the churches in christendom cannot check its onward march.

The Philomathean, a literary society connected with the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University, recently elected Miss Julia Lettmer, President.

TO CHRISTIANS.

For Common Sense.

I put the following to christians, to clergymen, to "revival" ministers. I was one of this class myself, when younger than I am now. And, first, let me remind you of a "command of the God" in which you believe. It is as follows:

'Be ready, always, to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear.' 1 Peter, 3:15.

For some fifty years I have been familiar with ministers and churches, and I am sorry to say that I have never found them perfectly obedient to this command. But I proceed:

In a work on "Supernatural Religion," issued in London, and lately published in Boston, it is clearly shown that neither of the "four gospels" was written until one hundred and fifty years after the events had occurred! And, it is on historical records, "got up" as these were, by those who were not contemporary with the facts, that you base your "faith" and hope regarding man's final destiny!

Geology proves that man had existed on this globe uncounted thousands of years before the period affirmed in the Bible, when Adam was "created." What, then, must have been the destiny of the innumerable generations who lived and died without any idea of Jesus, or "faith," as a condition of happiness beyond the grave?

The oldest, the most divine and the best religion is in a consciousness of the relations of life, which is the religion of Humanity. All others, such as the Hindoo, the Jewish, and the Christian, are factitious. And, of the historical religions, Christianity is the youngest; having existed only about eighteen hundred years. And now, tell me why Christianity was so long delayed? And more, why was it never introduced (as in Judea) into China, India, and other nations, all of which, according to your theory, have been going straight to the devil from the beginning? If Christianity is absolutely essential, whose fault is this failure? And, if the salvation of the world (saved from what?) depends upon those spasmodic, mental epidemics called "revivals," how long do you think it will be before the millennium, and the whole world will be "born again?"

LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

Quincy, Mass., March 17, 1875.

Accept failure as it comes; make the most of it; master it, never let it master you; impress it into your service; turn it over and over again until that side comes uppermost which reflects the heavens above. Then shines for you the truth and the beauty which you are to pursue, and which no calamity could destroy. Thus success becomes not a dream of the future, but a present reality. Failure ceases to be failure when thus valued. There are no circumstances so desperate but the spirit of man is superior to them if he chooses to summon to himself its aid. He is himself creator; let him accept his chaos, and build anew. The point is to never surrender, neither to one's lower self, nor to an unbelieving world. Though you die in the gutter, pick yourself up in the next world, and move on!

TIGHT LACING.

ED. COMMON SENSE.—In those good old days which we are always regretting, when the children (in England) were put into corsets at six years old, I was once remonstrating with a lady friend about her custom of lacing tight the stays of her eight year old little daughter whose figure was, as it should be at that age, "straight up and down" from shoulders to hips.

"Why, my dear," she replied, "if I do not lace her a little now, she will have no figure at all when she is grown up and goes into society, and then how I should reproach myself! Really" she continued with emotion and emphasis, "when I think of my husband's friend Dr. Thornton and his fanatical way of going on with their little Ellen, I pity the poor child."

"What did he do?" I enquired.

"Why, would you believe it? he told his wife that the child should never have a corset put on her,—that all her clothes should be loose round the waist, and the sleeves should be put in above the arm joint; and now she is twelve years old—too late to save her figure. Just think what a fright of a figure the poor child will be when she goes into society without any waist."

This incident occurred precisely forty years ago, and I had long since learned to believe that this senseless and cruel attempt to improve on nature, was exploded; confined at least to the ignorant and vulgar, and to the inertistic and weak-minded among dress-makers who catered to the weak-minded and vulgar; and I believe I am right with regard to this fact in the United States; but the other day I was running over the "Englishwomen's Domestic Magazine," of March '78, one of the oldest and most popular journals of Fashion in the old country, when my eye lit on the following paragraph in the "Conversazione" (or answers to Correspondents) which the Editor prints in full on account of the intrinsic merit of the suggestion. "Governess" writes.—

"Dear Madam:—I think the following hint may be useful to those having the care of young ladies, and is equally serviceable where the use of the corset is continued night and day. It consists in using a strong silk elastic lace instead of the ordinary one—a piece of silk elastic about a quarter of an inch wide and two yards or so in length, should be inserted instead of the plain silk or cotton lace; taking care however, that the stays are very fully boned, fit perfectly, and are not tight round the chest or hips. When this plan is adopted at an early age, and persevered in, it is astonishing how reducing an effect it has on the size of the waist, while at the same time it does not interfere with the action of the lungs in breathing!!! * * * * * I feel sure that any one trying this plan will be pleased with it, remembering that it is most suited to growing girls. Adults wishing to conform to the present fashion will probably find the silk elastic lace insufficient to reduce the figure to anything like elegant dimensions; it is the constant but gentle pressure of the elastic which is so valuable in moulding the still plastic forms of girls of eight or ten years of age."*

* Now, Mr. Editor, what I wish to say is this:—No such preparatory and cruel advice "to those having the care of young ladies" could find a place in any magazine published in the United States. Unquestionably two thirds of our young women injure themselves by compressing the waist more or less,—the weak-minded and vulgar taking the lead; but it is not common with us for children to wear corsets at all, much less to sleep in them, and such an advertisement as the above, found in Demorest's or Godey's Monthly would create astonishment among the weakest readers of those Weeklies. American women are less subservient to tradition, are more individualized, are not left wholly ignorant of physiology and kindred science, and such stuff as this no longer applies to them. G. B. K.

THE GROWING ANTAGONISM.

A writer in the Fortnightly Review thus states the theses of Karl Marx:

"Marx asserts that capital, when possessed by a comparatively small class, as is now the case, is the most terrible scourge of humanity; that it fattens on the miseries of the poor, the degradation of the worker, and the brutalising toil of his wife and children; that just as capital grows, so grows also pauperism, that mill-stone round the neck of civilization. The revolting cruelties of our factory system, the squalor of our great cities, and the presence of deep poverty seated hard by the gates of enormous wealth, these, he says, are not accidental blemishes on our civilization, that will bye and bye vanish, they are inevitable; they follow capitalism as surely as night follows day."

And all this adds, the writer, "is the complaint which has been poured out since the world began; the complaint of the poor against the rich; the weak against the strong; the baffled against the successful." What are we to understand by this? That because these evils have existed so long—that because they have grown hoary with age—they are not to be condemned, but respected for their antiquity? Are the charges so seriously made by Marx, and thus flipantly answered by the reviewer, to be set aside or trifled with? There are signs of the times which it would be well for such writers to give more heed to. The American people, at least, will not be ground into dust beneath the iron heel of capitalism. They are too intelligent, and the power to subdue them does not exist. WORKMAN.

COMMENTS.

It is not the mission of COMMON SENSE to widen the breach between these two classes of society—the rich and the poor; we would rather, if possible, harmonize the conflicting forces, and ward off the evil day that seems fast approaching. We have little faith in the judgment of the masses of the people in their present state of intelligence and morality. The people must be educated. Here lies their strength, and until better informed, any forcible resistance to the evils which oppress them will be like the struggles of a blind man—one who fights wildly against an artful enemy who can see him, but whom he cannot see. It is the duty of the rich to educate the children of the poor; to help them to honest employment; to use surplus wealth for the public good; to relieve the struggling workman from taxation, direct and indirect, and to seek to unite all, rich and poor, in a combined effort for the benefit of humanity. Even self preservation dictates this course. Help the wretched, or in the end, they will destroy you!

Ralston and other bankers who paid money to Rosener, the Assessor, and received in return a heavy reduction of their assessments, "did n't pay to save," oh no! but as Ralston says, they contributed towards Rosener's election expenses. In consideration of the fact that Rosener was elected on the Democratic ticket, and most of the contributors are Republicans, it is altogether probable that such was the case! And as the contributions were made months after the election, and just as taxes were being assessed, it is quite certain that they were for election expenses, and not for reduction of assessment!

A man may conceal his name, his age, the circumstances of his life, but not his character. That is his moral atmosphere, and is as inseparable from him as the fragrance of the rose from the rose itself. In the glance of the eye, in the tones of his voice, in mien and gesture, character discloses itself.

Belief, theological or otherwise, is not elective with any individual, but inevitably follows those outworkings of life which come before our cognizance, and concerning which reason, sooner or later as unavoidably ultimates its formulas as the new born infant breathes.—Brinton.

TO SPIRITUALISTS AND FREETHINKERS.

It is now one year since the first issue of this paper. There has been a gradual increase in the subscription list, but the income is not sufficient, as yet, to pay the expense of publication. If liberal ideas on religious subjects could find expression in our daily press; if reports of lectures and discussions by Free Thinkers received as much attention as is accorded to the sermons of the "orthodox," there would be less occasion for a journal of this kind: but every reader knows that it is the interest of the secular press to ignore or misrepresent Spiritualism and what is called Infidelity. The advocates of Rational Religion can find no hearing except from their own platforms, and through their own press; therefore we earnestly request our friends to aid us, not for our sakes, but for the sake of the cause we represent. Buy stock in the Company, even if it is no more than five dollars, and send us the names of new subscribers wherever they can be obtained. We cannot afford to send agents all over the State, and if we could they would not be as serviceable as local agents. One active friend in each county would assure speedy success; and our readers may rely upon this that just as soon as the income of the paper will warrant additional expense, COMMON SENSE will be enlarged and otherwise improved.

MEETING OF WORKINGMEN.

There was a fair audience at Dashaway Hall, on Sunday afternoon, to listen to an address by Hon. John M. Days. He spoke mainly on the necessity of paying some regard to men, as well as measures, in political contests, showing that some politicians consider platforms merely as means to catch votes, and that if the people are to protect their interests they must be careful in the selection of instruments. He spoke of our enormous taxes for governmental purposes, and of the extra taxes imposed by monopolies—gas taxes, water taxes, etc. Brief remarks were made by Mr. McMann, Judge Heslep, Mr. O'Farrell and Dr. Swain. We regret that we have no space this week for a report. At the close of the meeting, in view of the fact that Sunday is the workingman's holiday, and that a larger audience can be had on a week-day evening, it was determined to change the time of holding the meetings, and a committee was appointed to take charge of all matters connected with them, such as securing hall, raising funds, distributing tracts, etc. The committee consists of J. D. Pearson, J. M. Days, Joseph Swain, Mr. Hentz, E. Dieren, Mrs. Dieren, G. Hardcastle, B. F. French, Thomas Watson, Mr. Phillips and Pat J. Healy. There will be no meeting on Sunday afternoon, on account of the picnic at Sausalito, but the next Sunday afternoon, the 16th, the last day meeting will be held. After that the meetings will be held on Tuesday evenings.

Walter Hyde, of New York, will lecture, with panoramic views, in Liberty Hall, near Market street depot, Oakland, every Sunday morning at 10 o'clock.

LYCEUM PICNIC.

The Children's Lyceum, the members of the Lyceum for Self Culture, the "Friends of Progress," and all other Liberals are invited to visit Saucelito on Sunday, the 9th, to have a run over the hills, and a good time generally. The first boat leaves Vallejo street wharf at 8 o'clock; the second at 10 o'clock. There is another boat at 12, but as the early morning is by far the most pleasant, those will have the best time who take the morning boat. Members of the Lyceum for Self Culture can return at 1 o'clock, so as to attend the afternoon meeting, if they desire. There will be no charge for the younger children of the Lyceum. Only the two larger groups are expected to purchase tickets. Friends can be furnished with tickets at the Sociable, on Thursday evening; also at the wharf on the morning of the excursion. The price of tickets is fifty cents for the round trip. As this is merely the actual cost, it is not designed to furnish music; consequently there will be no dancing. In fact, Saucelito is not the place to go for a dance. It is one of the choice spots for those who love nature. There are beautifully graded and shaded walks, pleasant groves, innumerable little nooks, where small parties can rest, and bright, sparkling water almost everywhere. There are fine views from the headlands; and beautiful glimpses of the bay, the city and the surrounding country can be obtained through the openings in the trees as one climbs the somewhat rugged hills. Far back from the landing there are canyons, where beautiful mosses and wild flowers can be gathered. If the day is windy it will not be pleasant; but the mornings are almost always calm, and at this season of the year the atmosphere in such woody retreats is balmy and delightful, fragrant with growing herbage, and inspiring to those who have just left the dust of the city. It is expected that each party will take its own lunch, though meals can be purchased at Saucelito by those who prefer. To save the trouble of carrying lunch over the hills, a place will be selected where baskets can be left, and at noon some signal will be given, that all who desire may gather in the same locality. Without such arrangement there will be no fraternization, as Saucelito, with all its varied attractions, is anything but a promoter of union. It is the custom of visitors to separate into groups, each more or less congenial with itself, and wander apart, wherever inclination may prompt. This is almost a necessity, from the nature of the grounds, divided, as they are by hills into secluded nooks and shady retreats. Now that our readers know what to expect, we trust none will be disappointed at Saucelito when they fail to find music and dancing, and learn by experience that there is nothing there to promote unity of action and general sociability. It is not an inclosed garden, compelling close companionship—a little 7 by 9 heaven, such as so many delight in—but it is "all outdoors," inviting to individual freedom and enjoyment. Let all Freethinkers who love nature be there.

Next year will be the centennial. The Japanese have already celebrated their 2535th anniversary.

THE TWO PROFESSORS.

Prof. Chaney, on Sunday evening, had a large audience, attracted in part by the notice that Mrs. Mary O. Hanks would speak on Physiognomy. Being disappointed in obtaining the drawings she expected to illustrate her lecture, Mrs. Hanks preferred to have the professor speak, which he did in an interesting manner on "Occult law," the hidden forces in nature. Mrs. Hanks then spent a half hour in delineating character, the subjects being chosen from the audience.

Professor Lavendar, at Charter Oak Hall, also had a crowded house, and his discourse on "The Coming Man and the Millennium" was warmly applauded. He assumed that the "coming man" is every man who is inspired to speak and act the truth—every illuminated soul on earth, and there are many of them, though often unrecognized. The millennium is every period of awakening; it may last a thousand years and be unobserved by all except the few seers whose interior senses are unfolded to perceive spiritual things. There have been many millenniums on this earth, and will be many more. We are living in the midst of one now. It is fraught with great changes for the people, which few as yet realize. The lecture was listened to with deep attention and decided marks of approval. Mr. Lavendar speaks again in the same hall Sunday evening, May 8th.

BROTHER YORK'S LECTURE.—Union Hall was well filled on Sunday evening, and Mr. York, after a brief overhauling of Rev. Rexford, gave a radical lecture on Superstition. We have no space this week for an extended report. He first stated his conversation with Mr. Rexford prior to his appearance before the Freethinkers, in which he fully explained the object of the meetings—that it was an effort to counteract the Hammond revival movement, and as Mr. Rexford in his own church had severely condemned Hammond's "method," he had every reason to expect his cordial co-operation, and did not hesitate to accept the terms laid down, because he had no reason to anticipate any abuse of privilege on Mr. Rexford's part. The result showed that Mr. York had given Rexford credit for more manliness and honesty than he possessed. After making this statement, Mr. York proceeded to review Rexford's discourse, giving him a very severe handling. This, with the closing portion of the lecture, on Superstition, occupied nearly two hours, and must have been interesting, or the audience would not have sat under it so patiently. It was received with applause. Mr. York goes this week to Modesto, and soon after to Oregon. He has engagements for six months ahead.

It is reported that the spirit of Vasquez has been several times seen recently in the San Jose jail. Levia, towards whom Vasquez had not a very kind feeling, is consequently very anxious to be transferred to other quarters.

DRESS REFORM.

Roberts Brothers, Boston, have published a valuable volume on this subject, consisting of lectures given in Boston by Mary J. Safford-Blake, M. D., Caroline E. Hastings, M. D., Mercy B. Jackson, M. D., Arvilla B. Haynes, M. D., and Abba Goold Woolson, with an introduction and extensive appendix by Mrs. Woolson, who is the author of that excellent work, "Woman in American Society." It is by far the best book on Dress Reform yet published, treating the subject especially in its relations to physical laws, the writers (except Mrs. Woolson) being female physicians of ability and experience. The close study which they have given to the hygienic and æsthetic principles to which a proper dress must conform convinced them that the essential features of the fashionable lady's apparel are opposed to health, beauty and convenience, and that the remedy must embrace not merely the external costume, but the undergarments, as well. Yet the improvements recommended are such as conform, as far as possible, to the conventional standard, not because a radical change is not desirable, but for the simple reason that to make it acceptable, it must, in a great measure, conform to established usages. Previous attempts at dress reform have been failures mainly because of their disregard of conventionalities. The mental discomfort of wearing a radically reform costume was so much greater than the physical comfort attending its use, that sensitive women shrank from making themselves conspicuous, and the result has been the utter failure of every radical movement in that direction. This book does not assail Fashion, but it teaches hygiene. It gives instruction that every woman should have and should heed. The book is handsomely printed on excellent paper, and is finely illustrated. To be found at any of the book stores; or will be sent by mail. Address, Roberts Brothers, Boston, inclosing postal order for one dollar and fifty cents.

THE NEW DISPENSATION.

A pamphlet of fifty pages has just been published by Moses Hull & Co., Boston, entitled "The New Dispensation, or The Heavenly Kingdom," an argument showing that the prophecies supposed to refer to the millennium meet their accomplishment in modern spiritualism. The writer is D. W. Hull, author of "The Hereafter," "Origin, Nature and Tendency of Christianity," etc., etc. While the writer does not accept the Bible as the supreme source of knowledge on the expected millennium, he yet believes that some of its inspired seers, guided by the spirits, were able to point out the grand events that are now about to culminate. He looks upon the scriptures as a book of messages from the spirit world, some of which are reliable, others not. The writer anticipates a bloody war, and says "The most fearful struggle that ever crimsoned the face of the earth is about to decide the future fate of the world." He also looks for a blending of the world of spirits with our world. The following is an extract:

The world of spirits will be brought so near that we shall not only see and feel their presence at any time, but we shall have the liberty of going into the spirit world at times, and visiting the homes of the loved ones gone before. Nothing so develops the intellectual faculties and thus brings us so near God, as communication between the two worlds. Whenever the moment comes that we become the constant companion of angels, we have so far outgrown all our prejudices that we are ready to investigate and receive any truth that may be offered to us—thus developing continually more and more of God within us, as we evince greater life forces with our increase of knowledge.

* * * * *

When the world shall have lived up to those high conditions now taught by advanced spirits, they shall attract the Spirit-world so close to them that the power for materialization will be wonderfully increased, and the fabled resurrection of the physical body will seem almost to be accomplished. I understand that this social reform, as advocated by all the angel-inspired lecturers of our day, will so develop us beyond our selfish natures that if we do not attract heaven to earth, we shall be able to develop heaven upon earth, and thus make it a fit abode for our risen friends, and by this means they will become so positive to the conditions of our earth that they will be enabled to materialize themselves at will.

THE SPIRITUAL PLAN OF SALVATION.

"The Two Ways of Salvation,—The Theological and The Rational," is the title of a pamphlet recently published by Dr. Dean Clark, whose trenchant and logical writings are well known to those who have read the spiritual papers for the last decade.

Brother Clark's occasional articles in the Banner of Light have given him a merited popularity as a writer, and while associate editor of the Present Age, in Michigan, his racy and cogent editorials gave that paper character and influence. His arduous itinerant labors in the lecture field have undermined his health so that he is compelled to retire for a while, but his zeal in the cause of human progress has prompted him to use his potent pen in place of his now silent tongue, and the above named pamphlet is his first attempt at authorship. Its production was prompted by the recent revival mania, in which the notorious Hammond has played so conspicuous a part. Seeing how hundreds of children are being deluded by clerical cant and theological clap-trap, and how thousands of adults are clinging to a great theological delusion regarding salvation, Dr. Clark resolved to expose the untenable theories of evangelical religion, and especially the fallacy of the Christian "plan of salvation," and competent judges who have read his brochure pronounce it an unanswerable argument, overthrowing the very foundation on which orthodoxy rests. He first demolishes the Mosaic cosmogony, showing that the story of creation and the "fall of man" is a mythological fable; that God never cursed the race through Adam, hence, there were no grounds for an atonement of any kind. Secondly, the scheme of vicarious atonement is shown to be wholly illogical in its premises and conclusions, totally at variance with mental and physical laws, contrary to all human experience, and to the united testimony of millions of "the people of the other world" who have revealed the future life. The climax to the argument is made by showing through numerous quotations from the represented sayings and teachings of Jesus, that he never taught that dogma, but quite the contrary. After demolishing the theological "plan of salvation," the writer, in a terse, comprehensive and logical manner, presents the "rational" method of outgrowing the imperfections of human nature, giving, "in a nut-shell," the gist of the Harmonial philosophy, which is based on science and natural religion. The work closes with a satirical poem—the first poetical effort of the doctor—which is dedicated to Elder Hammond, and was read at the recent Anniversary Convention, and received with great éclat.

This pamphlet is one of the best missionary tracts ever written, and we cheerfully commend it to all our readers, and suggest that, for their benefit, and that of their orthodox friends, as well as for that of Brother Clark, who needs the pay for his arduous labors, they send to 124 Eddy St., San Francisco, his present address, and obtain one, or several copies for distribution. Price, 25 cents, or $2 for ten copies.

LYCEUM FOR SELF CULTURE.—The speakers on Sunday last were Mrs. Carr, Geo. W. Lewis, Mrs. Parrish, Prof. Chaney, Rev. Mr. Simonds and Dr. Matthews. Mr. Hollister presided for the first time, and ruled more stringently than has heretofore been the custom, concerning liberties of speech. As there is some difference of opinion among members as to the proper degree of latitude that should be allowed speakers, of course there was some dissatisfaction. It is hoped, however, that the debates will proceed harmoniously. The subject for the next debate is "Our Public School System."

Popular Science Monthly, for May, contains interesting articles by Huxley, Mueller, Dean Stanly and others. There is a very interesting article on sea anemones, by Rev. S. Lockwood; one on the Harmonies of Science and Religion, one on Evolution, etc. The editor reminds readers that the May number is the first of a new volume, and says that although the Monthly has, for three years, been called the most valuable and instructive magazine in the country, yet the subscription list is far behind that boasted by periodicals which leave science out. The work was started not to make money, but to do good, and it should be sustained.

Through the kindness of Mr. Hentz we have examined a well-conducted magazine for workingmen, The Coopers' Monthly Journal, Robert Schilling, editor, published in Cleveland, Ohio.

Mrs. Tilton asks leave to testify, and in a written letter to the Judge denounces her husband as a liar and hypocrite.

CALIFORNIA SOCIETY OF FREETHOUGHT.

A meeting of the Committee appointed by the late Freethought Convention "to devise a plan for a State organization of the Freethinkers of California" was held in Charter Oak Hall on Saturday, May 1st, James Battersby, President, in the chair. On calling the roll the following responded to their names: Jas. Battersby, H. L. Knight, Pat J. Healy, Joseph Swain, Mrs. Mary Hanks, C. B. Smith, Mrs. Augusta Perkins, A. C. Stowe, Mrs. O. M. Dawson Washburn, Wm. R. Joscelyn, W. H. Chaney, Madame Clara Antonia, J. H. Butler, and W. N. Slocum, of San Francisco; H. A. Manchester, of San Joaquin; J. L. York, of San Jose; J. W. Mackey, of Alameda, and the following proxies: J. L. York representing P. H. Trask, of San Diego; R. H. Allen for A. F. Blood, of Butte. W. N. Slocum, acting as secretary, presented a letter from Mrs. Helen W. Baker, of Lake county, as follows;

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS:—From the green hills beside the tranquil waters of Clear Lake, I send you greeting. I can hardly express my disappointment at not being able to meet you in friendly talk upon a subject that I have, from time to time, given much thought. That "union is strength," is an aphorism as old as the hills. That in union is also bigotry, intolerance and narrowness, let us not forget. If looking around we have everywhere examples of this last fact. See the organized bodies of Christianity. They have drafted creeds to which they have subscribed their names and faith. What are they now but the symbolic images of the time that gave them birth? The world of advanced thought has swept past them, leaving them petrified monstrosities and hideous blots standing erect in the broad light of a new era. But having these huge pyramids, each with its broad base planted firmly in the soil, to mark the dangers in the experiment we are making, let us build something that, instead of narrowing as it uprises, shall be the reverse of all precedent, and have its apex only upon this earth, while it continually broadens and expands as it ascends in the purer air of our more spiritual heaven. And this plan, utterly impossible to dogmatic creeds, is precisely the thing that any one having a just comprehension of a Freethought society would reasonably expect.

Our organization must be a sort of invisible bond, a soul brotherhood, holding paramount to every other consideration the individual liberty of each member, ignoring all prejudices, willingly following wherever truth may lead, and having in view continually the elevation of the human race.

Let no side issues nor private "isms" come into your meeting to mar its harmony and weaken its force. To those among you who wish to graft your own pet ideas upon this body please I would say "wait." With more than mathematical precision Time is working the problem at whose conclusion you have already jumped, and we will soon know whether you are right or not. Truth always comes safely home, while error dies by the wayside; and when we see things as you see them we will hail them with acclamation and crown you as the prophet of a new truth. But for the present let individual concession be the order of the day. Let your frame of mind be marked by the grandest magnanimity, and put yourselves in a position of comparative passivity, remembering that this is not your meeting exclusively, but that countless intelligences of the highest order, though invisible to you, now fill this room, listening eagerly to all you have to say, seeking in every way to prompt you to words and deeds whose wisdom shall be approved both of men and angels.

With the truest love and sympathy, I subscribe myself, your sister,
HELEN WILKINS BAKER.

The Chairman offered the following, received by him from F. Woodward, of Sacramento:

Mr. James Battersby, Chairman of Freethought Committee:
DEAR SIR:—Circumstances will prevent me meeting with the Freethought Committee on the first of May. Permit me therefore to say I entertain great hopes that you may be able to adopt some plan that will bring together all the freethinkers on government and religion in one rallied body for mutual protection, if nothing else. The signs of the times forbode a conflict of no trifling character. The revivals and re-organization of our inveterate enemies—the church and two old political parties,—warn us to be up and doing. But what can we do? is the question. Is there any point that Freethinkers can all agree on long enough even to meet in council together? For my own part, I think our greatest danger and present troubles are coming from political movements backed up by superstition and a designing priesthood. For self-protection and the good of mankind it behooves us to fall in line upon these questions, and at the same time carry with us each of our household gods, to be set up at our leisure, after the smoke of battle has cleared away. Half the people of the world will soon go hungry or beg for bread unless Freethinkers come to the front and take the government from the hands of the money-sharks and persecutors of free-thought.

Hoping your Committee may adopt some plan by which we may come and reason together at least, I bid you God speed in your noble efforts. Respectfully yours,

F. WOODWARD.

Sacramento, April 29.

The Sub-Committee selected to draw a plan for the consideration of the Committee, submitted the following :

James Battersby, Chairman of Freethought Committee :

SIR :—We, the undersigned, members of the Sub-Committee appointed to present a plan of organization, respectfully recommend the adoption of the following constitution, with such amendments as you see fit to make :

[Here followed the constitution as published in COMMON SENSE last week. The report of the Committee then proceeded as follows :]

In presenting this document for your consideration we beg leave to suggest great care in the adoption of amendments, that nothing may be added which will not harmonize with the provisions already incorporated.

As the question may arise whether the temporary officers of the organization shall be selected by this Committee, we beg leave to suggest that it would be better to leave the selection of officers to the first State Convention to be held under the constitution. It seems to us an undue assumption of authority in this Committee to elect such officers ; and there is really no necessity for an immediate election, as all the preparations for the first Convention can be made by this Committee.

There are certain matters which could not properly be embodied in the constitution, but which, in our opinion, are important to act upon. We deem it essential that the constitution which you may adopt be printed, together with a brief address, and sent to every Freethought Society, and to prominent Freethinkers in every part of the State where no Society exists. Members of Freethought Societies should be invited to subscribe to the constitution of the State Society, and signatures should also be procured of others who do not belong to any organized society. In this manner the name and residence of every reliable Freethinker in the State could be ascertained. These names should be entered in a book kept by the Secretary, and arranged according to localities, so that the friends in any part of the State might be readily found by reference to the record ; then, if any Freethinker desires employment, or information of a business nature, application can be made to the persons whose names are enrolled, and the requisite aid or information can be speedily obtained. Notwithstanding the individualism of Freethinkers, we believe great sympathy exists among them, and that this sympathy can be utilized and made a bond of union of great practical benefit to all. We are also convinced that without some effort to utilize the fraternal spirit of the members of the Society, many of the legitimate uses of the organization will fail to be realized.

ALMAIN B. PAUL,
W. N. SLOCUM,

MARY OLNSTED HANKS,
JOSEPH H. SWAIN.

The Committee accepted the report, and proceeded to consider the proposed constitution by sections. A number of amendments were made, and the document was re-committed with instructions to report again at the next meeting of the Committee. The discussion was mainly on the choice of a name, and the time for holding the first convention, but no amendment was made in either particular. The second section of article 1st was changed by striking out the words "superstitions, and prejudices of a hurtful nature," and inserting in their place the word error. The last clause of the same section was stricken out, and the Committee were directed to prepare a brief declaration of principles. A proposition was also adopted providing for the representation of Local Societies in the Executive Committee. The Committee then adjourned to meet at the same place Sunday morning, May 16th, at 10 o'clock.

SOUL CULTURE.

So many works to do, so many things to think about, so many exigencies to avoid, no wonder that the soul becomes heavy with its clayey accretions, and must struggle to pull itself up and loose from the material. It needs the calm and assurance of spiritual heights to establish its strength, and reaffirm its promised joys. It is capable of the largest and gladdest activities, and feels circumscribed and restless on any low plane of action or development where these are abridged.

Consequently, all exercises which tend to spiritualize men's lives without interrupting their legitimate work will be advantageous, and a movement in the direction of a broader and healthier soul-culture. Blending the spiritual meaning with the material expression,—evolving the higher from the lower use,—this is an achievement which seems to indicate the Divine ordering. The snatch of a hymn caught between the pauses of labor; the silent influence of eloquent surroundings to arrest and woo the thoughts when the mind may unbend itself for a moment from care,—the suggested graces of a spray of flowers, or a beautiful picture, for instance; the instant obedience of the divine impulsions; these, and a thousand more things might realize for the soul a higher and more satisfactory development. Are we understood? More spiritual insight to the uses and possibilities of life, with its labor and its rest, its sorrow and its joy, its happenings and its hopes,—this is what we mean.—Methodist Recorder.

When the first large company of colonists came to the Massachusetts colony, it is reported that, as they left England, the clergyman who was the leader of them looked back over the stern of the vessel, and said, alluding to the earlier Pilgrims who had settled Plymouth, and who had called themselves Separatists, "We will not say, as the Separatists did, 'Farewell, Babylon! Farewell, Rome!' But we will say, 'Farewell, dear England! Farewell, the Church of God in England, and all the Christian friends there!'" And as we look back upon the Christian church, if we leave it, I see no reason why we should not echo the loving words of that farewell.—T. W. Higginson.

ANNIE DENTON CRIDGE.

On Saturday evening, March, 27 at eight o'clock, Mrs. ANNIE DENTON CRIDGE passed to the other life, from Riverside, San Bernardino county, California, aged 49 years and 8 months. Knowing that our readers would be glad to learn something of the life and character of one so nobly endowed by nature as was Mrs. Cridge, we requested her friends to furnish us for publication a sketch of her history, and in response have received the following from her husband :

Mrs. Cridge was born in England, and raised in the Methodist church, which she joined at the age of fourteen; but undertaking to obtain arguments to convince a free thinking relative, she reasoned herself out of all forms of orthodoxy at about the age of eighteen. Some years afterwards she came to the United States, and in 1854 united with me in all the relations of life, forming a voluntary union, which was in every respect complete. Together we thought and worked. In 1857 we commenced the publication of a radical paper—The Vanguard—in advocacy of Spiritualism, free thought and co-operative life, which we continued until 1860. Meanwhile she was also engaged in psychometric experiments and researches, which resulted in not only establishing a bridge between the present and the future life, but in making it all present, proving that we are, in the form, spirits, having spiritual senses corresponding to the corporeal senses. Her experiments go even beyond ordinary spiritual phenomena, proving not merely that we do, but that we must necessarily, survive the mortal.

These experiments, and the resultant philosophy, have been partially embodied in a novel entitled "Is it Possible?" contributed to the Present Age, and in the "Soul of Things"; but the full bearings of the subject would have been more explicitly stated by her in another form had not the change of state prematurely occurred.

She had a peculiar faculty for reaching children, both orally and in print. For twelve months in 1859-60 she published a child's paper. She realized most intensely the need of progressive literature for children, which should not only negatively, but positively, embody the principles of free thought, Spiritualism and the methods of science. For this purpose she prepared in manuscript four volumes, embodying suitable incidents and conversations from life. At the point of death, apparently, in 1867, she rallied because she felt that these volumes should be prepared and published. In December, 1870, partly to raise money for this purpose, and partly to demonstrate that self-salvation for women lies in the culture of the soil, she left Washington for California to engage in orange culture, I remaining to furnish such means as my salary would permit. But "hope deferred," the separation from much that was dear to her, the suspension of work in the fields of reform, "the misery of the isolated household" which she so detested, (being an ardent believer in the co-operative household) overwork and exposure finally caused a termination of her earthly life twenty years too soon.

With the body emaciated to a skeleton, her mind was clear to the last, and firm as adamant in the faith of a continued existence. Her last words to me, as I kissed her lips on which Death had set his icy seal, were, "Love is stronger than death."

Since she came to California her mediumship assumed an additional phase. She saw spirits as usual, but has been latterly controlled by them to speak in private.

Eloquent addresses at her funeral were delivered by Dr. J. P. Greves and J. S. Loveland. I was also enabled to relate some incidents in her experience as a medium, and to outline the purposes of her life to those attending her funeral, many of whom were orthodox. At this time my son saw her making passes over me that I might be calm. He and my daughter have subsequently seen her and heard her speak.

Thus has passed to the spirit life, twenty years too soon, a mind second to none, capable, with proper conditions, of unravelling some of the most intricate problems in psychology, over which mere scientists vainly puzzle for generations, and fill volumes with conjecture where she had knowledge. She united the intuitional with the scientific to an extent which I believe to be almost unequalled at present, and I fear, left no one capable, at once, of filling her place in the peculiar field of thought and action which she occupied.

But both her children are thoroughly grounded in Spiritualism and free thought, and of rare promise for future work. These are my only earthly consolations for the separation from that life which was so completely one with mine.

Other progressive papers will oblige by copying so much of this notice as they may see fit. Her change of state has thrown on me such labor and responsibility in business matters as preclude me from doing full justice to her memory by writing separate obituaries for the Banner of Light, the Spiritual Scientist, the Investigator, and others.

A. CRIDGE.

Riverside, San Bernardino Co., April 20, 1875.

If laws were enacted that every section of land should be fenced and properly enclosed, and highways opened and improved through the great estates; that trees should be planted at every fence-post on either side of the roads; that for the purposes of health, swamps should be reclaimed; that bridges should be built over every stream and gulch; and schoolhouses should be constructed; that the traveler across these plains, made lonely by extended ownership, should be protected from Chavez and his gang by a patrol of mounted police, and all this at the expense of the land owners, by assessing their lands at the value they would possess if properly cultivated, the monopolists would very soon see the propriety of subdividing their estates. Such a course of legislation would be just and equitable. Our landed lords now enjoy their possessions at the expense of others; they do not pay their just proportion of taxes nor bear their just burdens in a community; they shirk their obligations, and are in fact pensioners and paupers in their relation to society.—S. F. Chronicle.

The philosophers seem to know that work never unsexes a woman. Only wages can do this, and so long as women are not unsexed, so long as sex is supposed never to be absent from their minds, or that of any man who speaks of or to them, the philosophers are suited. When one grubs and plows for a master who is entitled to "all she can acquire by her labor, service or act," she is not likely to forget her sex, and consequent inferiority; but if she goes to writing briefs or prescriptions and taking fees! Whew! How are the philosophers to keep her in sufficient consciousness of her sex?—Jane G. Swisshelm.

The church has banked for eighteen hundred years on the vicarious salvation of Christ, and has issued millions of certificates of deposit in this bank, not one of which can ever be redeemed, or is worth a cent to the holder, either in this world or the next.—Earlville Transcript.

A PRISONER.

BY GRACE MORVEN.

A captive bird with broken wing,
I strive to soar, I strive to sing;
Unheard my feeble warblings die,
Repeating oft one eager cry:
"Better one hour of liberty
Than ages of captivity!"

I watch the flight of upward wings;
From azure heights the rapture rings
Through morning's sunny hours, while I,
Imprisoned, only gaze and sigh,
And beat my bars and watch and wait,
Unhoping freedom soon or late.

I mind me of those earlier days
When life was filled with tuneful lays.
The shady wildwood's green retreat,
Where just to be alive was sweet;
While fair the future stretched serene,
Lost in a haze of heavenly sheen.

When this brief life is overpast,
A heap of ashes at the last,
Shall I return to mother earth,
And never know another birth?
What matter whether free or chained,
If naught beyond this life be gained?

Nay! I am sure that God doth keep,
Beyond Death's pale, mysterious sleep,
Some recompense for such as I;
He will not mock me with a lie!
He gave my soul's unquenched desire
For something nobler, purer, higher.

And fairer regions now unknown
Will be my spirit's final home,
While each high longing here repressed
Will find its utmost aim expressed:
A life of endless growth will be
The sweetest joy of being free!

A TRUE LIFE.

BY MARY B. DODGE.

A rock of softened beauty stands serenely
Among the hills that rise above the shore.
And upward lifts luxuriant foliage greenly,
Of nature's fadeless store;
Turning no pallor to the threatening blast,
Nor blooming richer that the storm is past.

But brave alike beneath the sunny sparkles
Of smiling day that tips with gold each crest,
Or, when a cold, gray cloud of winter darkles
Its outlook to the west,
Ever spice-laden, planted firm and still,
Unmoved to break with the eternal Will.

So, even as in this laureled rock, whose glory
It is to look aloft with steadfast brow,
I read, strong soul, within thy life, the story
Of faith no storm can bow:
Nor soft and liquid wooings turn aside
From truth, on which thy patient feet abide.

And if the stone beneath the verdure seemeth
To fret the wave, which cannot but caress,
(The wave which, fonder growing, idly dreameth
The rock may some day bless,
By bending low a kingly crown to heed
The homage which is but its royal meed.)

Be sure, brave heart, a blessedness unfailing
The sea knows in the rock's resisting grace,
Diviner far than if, soft songs availing,
Could lure it from high place,
To lose in mists of earth a heavenward view,
Nor longer stand, as thou, divinely true.

SPIRIT-HELP.

Do spirits guide our life? I sometimes ask;
Will they descend to such a servile task?
They had so much of care in their life here,
It cannot be, now they from earth are clear,
That they again within our sphere would bask,
For sad to them must seem each false-worn mask,
And sin and sorrow must as sad appear,
And in our life their life would needs be drear!
I cannot tell but love might make it plain,
Extract the ill, and all that we call pain,
And they from their high state might wish to guide,
And help our bark to peace through stormy tide.
Oh if 'tis true, may they their wisdom lend,
And guide us onward to life's purest end!

—William Brewster

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

Another form of cruelty that deserves special attention is the children's revival. It is a modern species of torture. It is designed to do for heart and soul what the school does for the brain. It aims to force religion a dozen years before its time; to work on the fancies and fears and hopes of the young, till they are thrown into a fever which they are told is a religious experience; to catch them in a whirl of excitement, when their minds are plastic as wax, and stamp the dogmas of a sect, ineffably on their minds, and give their natures a twist from which they will never recover. This is what Hammond is doing in California, and what Varley has attempted here. It is a species of spiritual infanticide which is worse than child-murder. And the society which would prevent cruelty to the young should arrest every revivalist who undertakes to practice his arts on innocent and unsuspecting children, as a child-stealer, if not a child-killer. The thing is a caricature of christianity, a travesty of religion, a curse against human nature. All the sunshine and moral nurture for the young that are possible; but whoever puts a child into a spiritual hot-house ought to sweat for it. Wholesome instruction, better examples, sweeter influences, ample encouragements and helps, so that every child shall naturally grow to the highest and ripest excellence; but whoever shall scare these little ones into the hopper of a church, and grind them over so that they will come out all moulded on one pattern, with a creed wrought into their constitution, and a clamp, worse than any Chinese shoe, fastened on brain and heart, should be treated as a moral maniac.—The Golden Age.

THE WONDERFUL HEALER AND CLAIRVOYANT
MRS. C. M. MORRISON.

This celebrated Medium is the instrument or organism used by the invisibles for the benefit of humanity. The placing of her name before the public is by request of her Controlling Band. They, through her organism, treat all diseases and cure in every instance where the vital organs necessary to continue life are not destroyed. Mrs. Morrison is an

UNCONSCIOUS TRANCE MEDIUM, CLAIRVOYANT AND CLAIRAUDIENT.

From the very beginning, hers is marked as a most remarkable career of success, such as has seldom if ever fallen to the lot of any person. No disease seems too insidious to remove, nor patient too far gone to be restored.

Mrs. Morrison, becoming entranced, the lock of hair is submitted to her control. The diagnosis is given through her lips by the Band, and taken down by her Secretary. The original manuscript is sent to the Correspondent.

When Medicines are ordered, the case is submitted to Mrs. Morrison's Medical Band, who give a prescription suited to the case. Her Medical Band use vegetable remedies, (which they magnetize) combined with a scientific application of the magnetic healing power.

Diagnosing disease by lock of hair, $1.00. (Give age and sex.)

Signs of the Times.

A Methodist conference in Indiana has decided that women cannot properly be licensed to preach.

Miss Nellie Forman, of Lynn, has been employed by the Mercantile Savings Institution of Boston for the past two years, and is filling a position as one of the Receiving Tellers of that institution to the entire satisfaction of its officers.

The Golden Age says many Protestants make a fetish of their sect, and give it an adoration as superstitious and belittling as any Hindoo renders to his idol. * * The best side of every sect of Christendom to-day is the outside. Any church excludes ten times more than it takes in.

George Smith, the English mechanic and man of the people, who made the recent important discoveries in Assyria, is lecturing in England. He says the region is not half explored yet, and is confident that Assyrian history extends back more than four thousand years before the Christian era.

Among the most encouraging signs of the times is the more liberal sentiment that seems to prevail among Chicago merchants toward the Grange, the Sovereigns of Industry and other labor organizations. Every week some new house announces its readiness to sell to members of these organizations at trade prices.

The President's refusal to disavow the third-term project, when it is evident that such refusal is dividing and weakening the party, shows that he cares more for Mr. Grant than he does for the friends who placed him where he is. He evidently thinks, and perhaps he is right, that the Grant party is about all there is of the Republican party.

A discovery of a curious nature has been made in Egypt by a savant who has found and deciphered an inscription in honor of Toutmosis the Third, containing more than four hundred geographic names, very precise and recognizable concerning Arabia, Armenia, Nubia, and the coasts of the Mediterranean. The inscription is thirty-five centuries old.

Rev. O. B. Frothingham's society was organized as the Third Unitarian Society of New York. Recently it has changed its name to the Independent Liberal Church. For several years the society has had little sympathy with the general drift of the Unitarian Church, which under Dr. Bellows and others, is becoming conservative. Its radical days are over, and like the Universalist Church it is becoming crystalized.

The progress of the orthodox churches towards rationalism is quite plainly indicated by the change of sentiment in relation to the doctrine of the resurrection of the body. When Prof. Bush published his work against this doctrine thirty years ago he was denounced as an apostate, and his denial of the truth of the doctrine was considered as equivalent to denying the Bible itself. Now, not one in ten of the orthodox church believe the doctrine, and its clergy very seldom preach it.

It is stated that three hundred thousand immigrants have settled in Texas during the last six months.

The Rev. J. S. Glendenning is engaged in writing a series of moral essays. Would it not be better for him to write the "true story" of Mary Pomeroy.

The argument of Matthew Arnold against the personality of deity has created consternation in the orthodox circles of England. What will these people do without a man-god to worship?

In the sixteenth century the duration of life in Geneva was 21.21 years, between 1814 and 1833 it was 48.68 years, and at the present time as many people live to 70 years of age as 300 years ago lived to the age of 43.

The Industrial Age, Chicago, says the weakest spot in our present civilization is the too prevalent habit of people to lie, cheat, swindle and steal. Sharp practice is altogether too popular, and frankness and honesty is at too great a discount.

The Golden Age says that to rationalize orthodoxy is quite as important as to crystalize rationalism, and that it is being done faster than most people imagine. The forces that are to reform orthodoxy are at work within as well as without the orthodox fortress.

The white Republicans of Louisiana, with their colored allies, have robbed the State year after year, until it has become a good place for honest men to emigrate from. The worst of it is these thieves could not have accomplished the ruin they have without the aid of the Federal Government.

The Christian Register admits that the "inspection of consulates" by Rev. Dr. Newman was a pious fraud. Newman received $10,500 salary, and his wife $3,000 more as his private secretary. No good whatever was accomplished excepting to give Newman a pleasure trip at the public expense.

Bismarck of Prussia and Gortschakoff of Russia, prime ministers of their respective countries, are having a friendly consultation in Berlin, and the London papers say that on the result depends the question of peace or war in Europe. It is admitted that these two men have power to plunge an entire continent into a bloody war, while the people, who are to do all the fighting, are not even asked if they consent to butcher one another. Yet this is the 19th century.

The action of railroad monopolists, like Cornelius Vanderbilt, has convinced the people that it is only by organized effort in opposition that reforms can be wrought; and now city corporations are going into the railroad business for self protection. Baltimore controls one road already, and has made it exceedingly serviceable. Now Boston is moving. In this case it is proposed to build roads by a combination of capitalists, so there is danger that in a few years after their construction, a few men will control them all. But such is the tendency of the times to centralization, that combinations must be made, or the people will continue to be victims of monopolists.

MY PRIEST.

For Common Sense.

BY J. W. MACKIE.

A kernel of wheat was found in the hand of an Egyptian mummy. It was planted, and the germinal life which had lain dormant for thousands of years was awakened and became the progenitor of future harvests. The planter of that kernel was its Priest. Whoever or whatever arouses into activity any dormant principle of my nature, he, she or it is My Priest. The only true priesthood is that which ministers to the wants of others; which assists the growth and development of the best that is in us. In science, Tyndall, Huxley, Spencer, etc., are looked up to as Priests, awakening in thousands new ideas, or ideas more fully matured, and so completely changing the plans and purposes of life that they may be said to be "born again." In Theology, Theodore Parker, Henry Ward Beecher, O. B. Frothingham and many more have been helping the world along; but in domestic life, in the every day hum-drum affairs of life, there are Priests, nameless Priests, who move about like motes floating in the air, never seen or known only as they are occasionally caught in the sunbeams of overflowing gratitude. These are Ministering Angels, Priests of the Most High. Everywhere they make their presence felt for good, listening to no evil reports, and speaking of all the best that they can; inspiring the despondent with hope and faith; cheering the disconsolate; are found by the sick-bed, the couch of the dying and wherever there are sorrow and suffering to assuage, or a wearied soul wrestling with one or more of the many perplexing problems of practical life. These are Nature's ordained Priests. You and I love to meet these priests; when our hearts are surcharged with sorrow, when our lamps have gone out, and all is dark, how naturally we confess to them, and they somehow just as naturally listen to the beatings of our hearts, in which they have no curiosity to satisfy; they intuitively know what is wanted of them, and reach our heart and head ailments, speak peace to our souls, and, unconscious of the process, we find ourselves absolved, walking in the sunlight of hope and faith, with a new and a higher life before us.

These Priests are born, not made. All the colleges and universities in the world could not make one such Priest; nor is there power in this world to ordain one. A little prattling child often possesses more of genuine Priesthood than a D. D. or a Cardinal. The sham priests have cursed the world and have made the work of the genuine priest an arduous task indeed. Nature's priesthood has been exchanged for a priestcraft, a something which aims at converting the world's tears into coin; the aspirations of humanity for something higher and better into parsonages and churches; a something which claims to be a pensioner on the purses of the people for benefits and services which should have been rendered, but have only been talked about. It is well versed in dogma and doctrine, but ignorant or careless about the difficulties which surround the poor man in his struggle for existence; it cares more for the support of a system and itself than it does for the growth and development of a thinking man or woman; more for conversion to their formulas than for social, intellectual and spiritual freedom.

The Catholic church does not monopolize all this priestcraft, this sham priesthood, nor does the Heathen, nor the Protestant; in the Liberal ranks they are to be found. Spiritualism and Materialism are almost taxed to death with false priests, who, entering with the password "liberty" upon their tongues, crucify liberty between the two thieves, personal interest and narrow-minded bigotry.

Let an association be formed for the protection of liberty, in which each will assist the other to think, to speak and to do, the only school proper for the education and discovery of the true priest, there the sham priest will be seen lifting him or herself high like the brazen serpent—which they generally are—before all the people; if they cannot rule they will ruin; if their ideas do not prevail they will industriously try to prevent the acceptance of all others. Like the locusts of Egypt, all the quacks and adventurers of the world seem to drift toward liberal societies, and they cannot be driven away while anything edible remains; pretenders, who blaspheme the holy name of humanity by using it when they only mean themselves and their hobbies. Pass the word along that we mean to earn our own spiritual living, and hurl defiance at our would-be spiritual and mental masters, who should be compelled to earn an honest livelihood. We seek not to know what to think, but to think and learn how to think by exercise of the faculty, and when we need a priest the priest will be brought to us by natural law. Spiritualism especially must learn to cut itself adrift from the priestcraft to which it has attached itself, or else live to curse the world like the spiritual systems which have preceded it: a priestcraft which ignores personal application and study; which values revelations from heaven more than discoveries on earth; which insists upon your listening to the pretender, who speaks with closed eyes, and utters sweet-sounding nothings in which periods and paragraphs are superfluous; which directs its whole influence against the man or woman who dares to expose fraud in their sham priests and mediums; which cries out "Stop my paper" if the editor be a careful, bold and conscientious man. All these things are leading to a state of priestcraft as pernicious as any the world has ever seen, and it is time that every honest Spiritualist repudiated the thousand and one pretenders who are making Spiritualism a "hiss and a by-word" among those who detest humbug and those who know no better. The true Priest is only known by his services, his ministrations rendered without thought of self.

"Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant."—Jesus.

Poor men are indispensable to supply some of the ordinary wants of society, and are useful in the performance of certain drudgery which would be distasteful to the rich.—Chronicle.

CAPITAL AND LABOR—NO CONFLICT.

A friend of COMMON SENSE, writing from Carson, comments on this declaration of a political convention :

"We do not admit or recognize a conflict between capital and labor; but hold each alike dependent on the other, and both the proper subjects of legislative protection."

Our friend says : There was no conflict between the Cornell watch-makers and the owners of the factory; no conflict in the East where the weavers are on strike because their wages are so low they cannot obtain the necessities of life. The factory owners say they do not object to the demands of the workmen, but they will not be conquered. Of what use is the vote of the factory hands, when it is here demonstrated that Capital has power to starve its slaves into submission? And why? Because of the ignorance of the masses, and their disunion. Capitalists have the power of life or death over the white slaves. What a mighty power to be invested in the few over the many! If there is no conflict, what are trade societies organized for? They say they are organized to protect the members against capital. If there is no conflict, no protection is needed; they are wasting time and money—they had better use the money to improve their miserable homes. This stuff will not do for enlightened workingmen. There is a terrible conflict, an irrepressible conflict between Capital and Labor, extending all over the civilized world, the force of which is increasing so rapidly that it alarms the usurer, landlord and profit-monger. This antagonism is the result of a false system of society, a system established in barbaric times, by men of the worst passions; a system that gives the cunning and the avaricious the power to rob the industrial classes of the fruits of their hard-earned physical and mental toil. This conflict will continue while this system lasts. What a power this hydra-headed monster, Capital, possesses! Its power is above law and constitutions. It commands the servility of men of the brightest intellects. Men of science and erudition bow before its magic wand. It can call to its aid millions of mercenaries. It can stop when needed the blood that must circulate through the body politic, and destroy millions of human beings. That is frequently done to satisfy the love of greed and power. Capitalists enter the gladiatorial arenas called exchanges, and periodically, by their power and skill, so affect the price of money and stocks and bills of exchange, that millions of human beings are destroyed. The producer, after he has obtained the small wage grudgingly doled out to him by his master in exchange for his labor, anticipating his food and rent will cost only a certain amount, finds that in a few days they have doubled in price. Combinations of capitalists are formed to buy up even the staff of life, and hold it at a price that starves not only the mechanic, but the men who produced the grain. And yet, "there is no conflict between Capital and Labor." The men who teach their fellow man error for truth, rob him of his reason, knowing he must then be the slave to the cunning ones. That is what this party is doing; Capital will sooner see every city, town and hamlet destroyed than see the laboring class succeed in establishing a permanent organization based upon the principles of political and social justice. Not one word do these schemers say about the rights of laborers; not one word about private property in land, or a just system of exchange. They state that Capital and Labor are both proper subjects of legislative protection. I would like them to explain how legislation can protect two antagonistic classes. What kind of legislation can be performed between the plunderer and his victim? Such is the relation between Capital and Labor. I defy them to find any law in nature, based upon morality or justice, that gives the right to one man to become a millionaire or landlord by robbing his fellow man (who produces all the wealth in existence) of the fruits of his hard-earned mental and physical toil.

All the wealth in existence is the work of the laborer, the mechanic and the man of science. They should not starve in the midst of abundance. Our system enables the non-producer to unjustly obtain possession of this wealth. The producers are the only rightful owners, and they have not received an equivalent for their labor; if they had, they would not now be houseless, homeless, and starving. The clothes rotting in the warehouses would be covering their nakedness, and they would not be begging for rags to cover them, or asking for the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table.

THE SCIENTIFIC MAN A THEIST.

But, if, on the one hand, the study of Nature be one part of the study of God, is it not true, on the other, that he who believes only in Nature is a theist, and has a theology? Men slide easily from the most momentous controversies into the most contemptible logomachies. If we will look into things, not merely at words, we shall soon see that the scientific man has a theology and a God, a most impressive theology, a most awful and glorious God. That man believes in a God who feels himself in the presence of a Power apart from and immeasurably above his own, a Power in which he is absorbed, in the knowledge of which he finds safety and happiness. And such now is Nature to the scientific man. I do not now say that it is good or satisfying to worship such a God, but I say that no class of men since the world began have ever more truly believed in a God, or more ardently, or with more conviction, worshiped him. Comparing their religion in its fresh youth to the present confused forms of Christianity, I think a by-stander would say that though Christianity had in it something far higher and deeper and more ennobling, yet the average scientific man worships just at present a more awful, and, as it were, a greater Deity than the average Christian. In so many Christians the idea of God has been degraded by childish and little-minded teaching; the Eternal and the Infinite and the All-Embracing has been represented as the head of the clerical interest, as a sort of clergyman, as a sort of schoolmaster, as a sort of philanthropist. But the scientific man knows him to be eternal; in astronomy, in geology, he becomes familiar with the countless millenniums of his lifetime. The scientific man strains his mind actually to realize God's infinity. In the fixed stars he traces him, a "distance inexpressible by numbers that have name." Meanwhile, to the theologian, infinity and eternity are very much of empty words when applied to the object of his worship. He does not realize them in actual facts and definite computations.—From "Science and Religion," in Popular Science Monthly for May.

For Common Sense.
SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

BY JOHN BALL.

Just as science has finished the dissection of the human body, without success in its search for the vital element in man, modern Spiritualism steps in and demonstrates the living principle to be something distinct from the physical organism. The spirit is the life; the body, a medium through which the spirit acts. Not only is this true of man, but it is equally true of all grades of life, from the lowest to the highest. The form and size of the brain is a true gauge of the intelligence of the spirit animating the organism to which that brain belongs.

Evolution will be found to be the law of spiritual development, as it is the law of all things else. Man has reached his present position through gradations from the lower forms of life. The theory of natural selection confirms this; for the living principle, or the spirit of the weakest forms of any species, is that which has just advanced from the species or form of life next below it in the scale of development. The same spirit will appear again and again in the same form, but more highly developed each time, till it has gained the highest form of development in that species, and will then pass on to the lowest form of the next higher species.

It will be objected—If the theory of evolution is true, where are the missing links of the different species? If the law of evolution was ever in force it is in force to-day, and the same process must be going on around us. If we take the brain as the indicator of intelligence, and intelligence as the indicator of development, we shall find less difficulty in the way of accepting the theory of evolution than if we confine ourselves to the form of bodily structure merely. There will be found but little difference between the size and form of the brain of the highest individuals in one species and the lowest in the next above. At least, this should be so, for it forms but one step in the scale of development, whereas, in the same species the one spirit may appear several times, and so make several steps in its march of progress.

Re-incarnation, if true, would help to confirm the evolution theory; and some of the brightest intellects amongst our scientists are possibly now turning over their own prehistoric bones! [This is no joke.] If the mere forms of life have been such a vast number of ages in reaching the human type, surely the living spirit has not attained its present eminence in a few short years. Where did the spirit of man originate if not in the inconceivable past?

"The mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small."

The potentialities of man's being lie back in an eternity of the past, and the unfolding of his full capabilities lie in an eternity of the future. The same process that has reared the peak of the loftiest mountain, and scooped out the ocean's bed, has made man what he is; and if we had but the intelligence we could pick up a stone and read the past and future history of the universe, so unchanging are its laws, and so unerring its movements.

For Common Sense.
THEOLOGY VERSUS SPIRITUALISM.

BY C. BRINTON, JR.

Theology teaches that the original pair, perfect by creation, were tempted by a personal devil to commit an act of disobedience, through which not only physical death resulted to them and their descendants, but eternal anguish befell that subtle principle of life which is not subject to dissolution. From the horrible consequences ensuing to this combination of Satanic power and female perfection, a partial deliverance is promised to that portion of the human family who hear of and accept Christ as a Redeemer—partial because though exemption from the torment of hell is expected for the psychical body, the redemption does not exempt Adam's posterity from present physical dissolution.

Spiritualism teaches that life is an eternal progression, ever advancing from lower to higher conditions; that the first pair would necessarily have occupied a less elevated place in the scale of existence than that now held after ages of elevation. Certainly it is difficult to perceive the perfection of our original progenitors, when their first recorded act was a failure. If impeccability implies peccability, language ceases to be a medium to convey ideas. Nor does a personal devil appear more reasonable. God, as the All-Wise, could not bring forth that which would be injurious to the highest welfare of his created. To abandon this cosmos to an incarnation of evil—to one who would not only rule it unto destruction, but carry off its people (for "the saved are the few") to another kingdom, and there, for limitless time, hold them in a lake of molten brimstone—is an absurdity, for it would wrest from the Almighty His supremacy, and take away those attributes which render Him the Benificent.

Death is the result of imperfection. Eras before the earth was fitted to sustain human life, death reigned over the myriad previous forms of being. No combination of atoms has ever yet maintained its integrity. The rock crumbles, the vegetable decays, the animal dies; but every disintegration prepares these monads for higher recombinations. Death did not enter with Adam, nor cease with Christ; its way has been uninterrupted and shall continue so long as imperfection exists, for death is birth into higher conditions.

Of the penalties ascribed to the Fall, physical death and eternal torment, the former was the portion of Christ as of all others; but the latter was not endured by Him, for the present is a portion of eternity, and the Redeemer is not now in hell. If a perpetual residence in everlasting fire inevitably results from Adam's transgression, so far as deliverance through the endurance of its penal retribution by the Savior is concerned, no way of escape, as yet, can be offered to mortals. Those who have sought for truth in the scriptural letter; who, through philological criticisms of its various readings have desired to know the mind of God, have almost always been led into erroneous views. The clerical doctors of Salamanca used the Biblical text to demonstrate to Columbus the heterodoxy of his assertion that the cosmos was a sphere. The Franciscan monks employed the letter of scripture to force Galileo "to abjure, curse and detest" his heretical, heliocentric system. Even now theologians, resting in the letter and unheeding the revelations of science, believe that the world was created in six days, while few of their number are conscious that no universal deluge, as recorded by Moses, could have overwhelmed this earth so late as he affirmed.

The Bible, adapted to the time of its bestowal, is a portion of God's outwork in the evolution of the ages, but requires for its true comprehension the same spiritual illumination which inspired its writers; and until angels unfold its mysteries, the literal text, now as of old, will kill blind worshippers.

When we are able to realize that God is sovereign in reality as well as in name; when the myriad forms of life everywhere manifest reveal to us His outworks—it matters not whether inspired directly or by germs implanted in eons gone by; when "of law no less can be acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God and her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and on earth do her homage, the least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power," then no discovery of science, no exhibition of life, no terror of human thought, will be without its significance, for then wisdom will have taught that to walk in harmonious accord with the Great Ruler, it is necessary to direct the footsteps by the light of His rule.

NERVE-AURA.

For Common Sense.

BY DR. J. M. MATTHEWS.

WHAT A CLAIRVOYANT SEES—EMANATIONS FROM THE BRAIN.

The convolutions of the brain are distinct organs of separate faculties of the mind. The convolutions radiate their own peculiar aura. This is a fact of great importance, both physiologically and psychologically, and one of which the medical world is almost entirely ignorant. That which they cannot see, handle, weigh, or put through the crucible, they consider of but small importance, as visionary or unknowable. All the grandest forces of the universe are invisible, while at the same time they are the most potent, safest, gentlest and most easily wielded, when understood. Therefore different convolutions emit different styles of force. In the animal kingdom we find that caloric and electricity are evolved by the action of living forms. The galvanic and magnetic forces, also, I believe to be evolved by the vital organs. The action of the brain and nerves upon the muscular system is effected by an agency strikingly similar to the galvanic. This agency, or fluid, which is evolved by the basilar portion of the brain, the spinal cord and the ganglionic system, is one of the lower species of nervous fluids.

The nervous fluid or emanation, (which may be most appropriately styled Nerve-aura) is essentially different in different organs or convolutions. While the nerve-aura, or influence, of the basilar portion of the brain directly and powerfully stimulates the muscular system, the nerve-aura of the basilar part of the middle lobe (front of the ear) excites the digestive organs, and that of the part adjacent to firmness diminishes the gastric activity. Thus every portion of the brain originates a distinct nerve-aura, producing different and peculiar physiological effects, and producing also peculiar psychological results upon others.

COLORS OF THE NERVE-AURA.

The influence of the basilar and occipital organs is chiefly expended upon the constitution of the individual; that of the anterior organs is more diffusive. Different convolutions, or organs of the brain, radiate different colors, by which both the psychical and physical condition can be determined. In the base of the brain the colors are a dark red, (and in persons of a very low nature, almost black) while in the upper convolutions of the brain the colors assume a yellowish tint, and in a person of a pure moral nature, who is well balanced, the colors are almost dazzling, with the yellow tint nearly merged into white, and far more exquisite than sunlight. In the higher front brain, in the region of the reasoning faculties, blue is the predominating color, and is lighter as it approaches the top brain, and a darker blue as it comes down to the perceptive, with a little touch of the violet in its outer edges. Benevolence emits a soft, light green, of indescribable beauty. Over firmness the color is scarlet, and over self-esteem, purple. As you move down the sides of the head from the moral powers towards the lower loves, it becomes orange, then red, and dark red. When a person laughs or sends forth happy thoughts it causes a dancing play of bright colors; but when in violent passion, a snapping and sparkling red is emitted. Every part of a person emits a special aura of its own, which appeals to the same part of another person, on the principle of analogical harmony. Persons of noble character radiate a more refined and penetrating aura than coarse and undeveloped natures. The greatest power and perfection come from a person of well balanced, active brain and powerful physique. If one part holds the other in check, no matter how great the activity or power, the result is harmony. When people are rightly born, of rightly matched parents, and harmoniously developed, they will become almost Jupiters and Minervas of power, and in character far more beautiful than they.

PROGRESSION.

For Common Sense.

Infancy, childhood, adolescence, manhood. As of an individual and the family, so of Nations and the Race. Infancy is a state of ignorance, imbecility and fear. Thus, individuals and the race grow from ignorance to knowledge, from helplessness to power, and thus advancing from a state of fear to an intelligent trust in nature's economy and the constitution of things. Hence, by these laws of progression we know that all those evils, resulting from an infantile condition, must, of necessity, be outgrown in time.

Prominent among these evils are such as come from CASTE, which is an element in human thought and conduct that depreciates and ignores the fraternal in manhood. It is an assumption by which one imagines himself a medium between the infinite and his equal brother. Caste is the germ of all historical religions, the principle of slavery, injustice, bigotry and persecution. But these evils must in the future be outgrown by the Religion of Humanity, as they have yielded to the riper attributes of manhood in ages that have gone before. Instruction from the Past, gratitude for the Present, and hope for the Future.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM H. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAY. 15, 1875.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.—The first year of the publication of COMMON SENSE closed last week, but as one number was dropped during the holidays, the fifty-two numbers could not be given within the actual year. Subscriptions for the second Volume are now due, and we hope all our friends will pay promptly. The paper is not profitable, and it is only by continued effort on the part of good friends, and continued sacrifice on our own part that we are able to continue.

BOUND VOLUMES OF COMMON SENSE.—Subscribers who have preserved files of this paper are notified that by sending them to this office, with one dollar to pay the expense, they will be bound in a plain, substantial manner, with an index for the year. We do not print the index with the paper, because comparatively few have use for it. Any one desiring a copy of the index, for binding, can have one free of cost. We have preserved a number of files of the paper, and will soon be prepared to furnish the bound volume, price four dollars.

The Word, a monthly journal of reform, published in Princeton, Mass., says of COMMON SENSE:

"Both the paper and its readers would be gainers, were it to employ one-half, even, of the time and space which it now devotes to the interpretation of that common nonsense known as Astrology, in an intelligent discussion of the Labor Question."

We must admit that more space has heretofore been devoted to the subject of Astrology in COMMON SENSE than was advisable, and more than ever will be admitted to its columns again; but if the editor of the Word had read the articles instead of allowing his prejudices to prevent his seeing anything more than the head-lines, he would have found scathing criticisms on a science the absurdities connected with which have led many spiritualists into error. We think "Vox Stellarum" performed a good work in exposing the weak points in Astrology, and his articles were always interesting. We expected to give offence to Prof. Chaney by their publication, and are not disappointed that such has been the result; but we did not anticipate such a criticism from one who considers Astrology nonsense. We have had several of Prof. Chaney's articles on hand for months, and because we have not published them in preference to articles against Astrology, the Professor threatens to start an organ of his own.

To be physically well one must, in general, be happy. The reverse is not always true; one may be happy and cheerful, and yet be a constant sufferer in body.

THE PICNIC.

The sun smiled propitiously on our Lyceum picnic, last Sunday, and old Boreas kept at a respectful distance, so those who attended had a very good time. There was a lack of arrangement, but as no Committee had been appointed for that work, no one is to be blamed for it. If some one had been authorized to go over on the early boat and select a convenient place where lunch baskets could be left in charge of one of the party, with the understanding that all should meet at that place at 12 o'clock, and if the spot selected had been one on nearly level ground, accessible to water, and commanding a pleasant outlook, the day might have been more agreeably spent, and much less trouble would have occurred by friends losing one another, or following a "blind leader," over hills and through canyons, to a "leafy bower" not large enough for all, and redolent with something else besides the sweet scents of wild flowers, the freshness of the wood and the odor of the laurel. After lunch there was a pleasant dance, quiet walks and happy talks, and though it did happen that some who were most anxious to meet, failed through that very cause to find each other, (neither waiting for the other to come along,) yet the day was to most of the party, one of unalloyed enjoyment.

PSYCHOMETRY.—A score or so of persons met at 124 Eddy street one evening last week to witness "experiments in psychometry" by Charles N. Steen, who, we believe, does not yet call himself "Professor." The experiments differed entirely from those generally called psychometrical. He did not take any unknown substance in his hand and give his impressions of its character and history, but persons in the room touched certain cards, while Steen was blindfolded, and in another room, and on his return he selected the card and the person who touched it. Some of the experiments were of the character of mind-reading, such as telling what figure a person wrote on a piece of paper, what one he multiplied by, and the result. Names were written on slips of paper by each person in the company, and deposited in a hat. Steen then took the slips, one by one, and handed them to the person who wrote the name. The mistakes were comparatively few. If it is the intention of Mr. Steen to give public exhibitions, we think the experiment will result in a failure financially. The experiments have too much the appearance of trickery to be of any service, and they are not of a nature calculated to attract large audiences.

A distinguished revivalist recently attempted to convert the New York reporters; but he gave the job up in disgust after a few days of persistent effort. The Industrial Age says "When a man makes a business of reporting everything—from a sensation sermon to a horse-race, or a hanging-bee—he soon becomes hardened to a degree which is an everlasting mystery to sentimental preachers." Hammond tried his powers on the Chronicle reporter, but failed utterly. The reporter then tried to convert Hammond to a love of truth, but he failed also.

THE FREETHOUGHT MOVEMENT.

The Committee appointed to devise a plan for a Free-thought organization in this State has not yet decided upon any course, and it is probable that the matter will be left to the discretion of the Convention to be held in October. Meantime it is desirable that Local Societies be formed in every town in the State, and as names are of less account than ideas and principles, they may be called by any name which the majority prefer. The Liberal League, started by F. E. Abbott, is an excellent organization, and the form proposed may be as good as any that could be devised here. It states in brief language the demands of Liberalism: the equal taxation of church property; the abolition of chaplains in public institutions, and in the army and navy; the abolition of all forms of religious services now sustained by the government, especially in the schools; the adoption of a simple affirmation in courts of justice under the penalties of perjury, in place of the judicial oath; the abolition of Sunday laws; that no privilege shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion, and that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis.

The form of organization adopted by the League is very simple, being merely articles of agreement to be signed by members, pledging them to assist in carrying out the reforms in view. The means employed in working for these objects are regular local meetings, free discourses, lectures, conversations, the public press, etc. The mode of raising funds for current expenses is left wholly with the local organizations.

The plan is perhaps as simple as any that can be devised, and although the objects set forth do not embrace all that the Freethinkers of California contend for, neither do they forbid the extension of this platform to any desired limit. It is certainly time that something were done in this State towards an organization of the Liberal forces. We have heretofore published the "Demands of Liberalism," as published in the Index, and will copy it again next week.

The San Francisco Spiritualist Society which formerly held meetings at Charter Oak Hall, held its annual meeting for the election of officers last week, but adjourned until Friday evening of this week, without an election. The trustees elected last year were Ada Foye, J. F. Miller, Mrs. Wiggin, D. D. Cooke, Mrs. E. S. Sleeper, Geo. W. Lewis and Jesse H. Butler. Mrs. Foye resigned, but no one was chosen in her place, and there seems to be some difference of opinion among members of the Society concerning their future action. It is a pity that both Societies cannot disunite and form one good one. The Charter Oak Society has some money in its Treasury, but undoubtedly this could be balanced by an equal sum from the other Society. A little money should not be permitted to stand in the way of harmony; and if nothing else can be done to remove the obstacle the publishers of COMMON SENSE will generously consent to take charge of it.

"MESSAGE DEPARTMENT."—We have frequently been asked why COMMON SENSE gives no space for communications from the Spirit World, on the plan of the Banner of Light. The paper has always been open to communications of this kind, and mediums have repeatedly been solicited to contribute them. A proposition was made for Mrs. Kerns' assistance some months ago, but her repeated absences from the city have prevented the carrying out of any plan. Such a department would, without doubt, aid the paper in its circulation, and as we publish the paper for the people and not for ourselves, we have always been willing to disregard our own feelings, (which are not favorable to the publication of much that usually appears in the Banner under this head) and give readers what they demand. The great trouble is that to avoid giving offence to the medium by erasing portions of the messages, we would be compelled to publish with the good matter much trash. For proof of this let any one read the Message Department in the Banner. There is no portion of the paper that needs more careful pruning than that, and none that receives it less. We must overcome the idea that people out of the form are to be treated with any more deference than those in it. A shallow person is none the less shallow when he throws off his old clothes, and a shallow spirit is no wiser immediately after, than just before, throwing off the covering of flesh. Yet this is a lesson which it seems almost impossible for some Spiritualists to learn.

MEETINGS OF WORKINGMEN.—A meeting was held at Charter Oak Hall on Tuesday evening, which was addressed by Capt. C. B. Smith, mainly on the question of Chinese labor, which the speaker opposed. He was followed by Pat J. Healey in favor of equal rights for all, the Chinese included. He expressed the opinion that the strong and intelligent will rule, and that we need not anticipate any great evil from the influx of Chinese. What we need to fear is the ignorance and inefficiency of our own people, and more than all, the monopolists among us who grab the land and extort interest for the use of money. He is opposed to the private ownership of land, opposed to all laws for the collection of debt, and in favor of the Government loaning its money to the people on the pledge of property, without interest. Remarks were made by Mr. Hardcastle, and a Mr. Bowen, of Alameda, the latter in favor of a more careful selection of men for office. This meeting had no connection with those held in Dashaway Hall, one of which is announced for Sunday (to-morrow) afternoon. After that they are to be held at the same place every Tuesday evening.

A committee of the Dashaway Hall organization will, on Sunday, make a report, proposing to call it "The Society for the Promotion of Political and Social Reform." Good speakers will be provided each week, and the expenses for use of hall will be defrayed by voluntary contribution.

BORN.—At 34 Glen Park Avenue, San Francisco, Thursday, May 6, 1875, 7:20 A. M., LUISKA DAWN, daughter of Jonas and Laura Justina Winchester.

NEW BOOKS.

THE WORLD'S SIXTEEN CRUCIFIED SAVIORS, or Christianity Before Christ; containing new revelations in Religious history, which disclose the Oriental origin of all the Doctrines, Principles, Precepts and Miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its mysteries, besides comprising the history of sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods: By Kersey Graves, author of "The Biography of Satan" and "The Bible of Bibles." Colby & Rich, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

We have been unable as yet to give this book a careful reading; but from a cursory examination, we believe it calculated to do very much toward loosening the bonds of superstition that now hold the Christian church together. The author believes that the portion of the Jewish nation which became known as Essenes were educated in the Buddhist school of Pythagoras, in the second or third century before Christ, and thus became a sect of Jewish Buddhists calling themselves Essenes. Neither Christ nor his disciples made any changes in the Essenian religion, when they changed its name to Christianity, except to engraft a few unimportant tenets borrowed from the principle Buddhist sect; consequently Christianity is essentially Buddhism. The moral and religious teachings of no bible reach a higher altitude than the intelligence and mental development of the age and country which produced it. The Christian bible is superior to some others only to the extent to which the age in which it was written was superior. Christ taught no new doctrine, and he differs so little in his character, preaching and practical life from some of the oriental Gods, that no person whose mind is not warped by early training can call one divine while he considers the other human. If Christ was a God, then all were God.

The author believes that the doctrines of Christianity tend to retard the moral and intellectual growth of all christian people, and for this reason he is impelled to put forth this work, making known facts in history which prove the unsatisfactory foundation for such a belief. Science has poured a flood of light upon our system of religion, exposing its errors, revealing its absurdities, and proving the groundlessness of its claims to supermundane origin. No man of science can properly be termed a Christian, though many, not anxious to be martyrs, refrain from any open denial of Christian dogmas.

The declaration that "there is no other name given under heaven whereby men can be saved than that of Jesus Christ and him crucified," is proved in this book (by facts derived from Sir Godfrey Higgins' "Anacalypsis") to be false, for it gives the history of nearly a score of crucified Gods and sin-atoners Saviors.

The author seeks to banish the wide-spread delusion that religion is of supernatural or divine origin, believing that if this can be done the many ruinous errors, senseless dogmas and soul-crushing superstitions inwrought into the Christian system will vanish like fog before the morning sun, and be replaced by a religion which sensible, intelligent and scientific men and women can accept, and will delight to honor and practice.

The book conclusively proves that there are many historical cases of the miraculous birth of Gods prior to the birth of Jesus; that many were claimed to be born of virgin mothers; that a number of them were reputedly born on the 25th of December; that their advent was fostered by "inspired prophets;" that stars, angels, shepherds and wise men were mentioned in connection with their birth; that their lives were threatened in infancy by the ruler of the country; that several of them gave the same early proof of divinity claimed for Jesus; that they declared, "My kingdom is not of this world"; that they preached a spiritual religion, were anointed with oil, were crucified, "rose from the dead" and "ascended into heaven." They were nearly all called the Savior, Son of God, Messiah, Redeemer, Lord, etc., and each one was the second person in a trinity consisting of Father, Son and Holy Ghost. The doctrines of Original Sin, the Fall of Man, the Atonement, Forgiveness of Sin, Future Endless Punishment, etc., are all set forth in Oriental bibles and holy books, written anterior to the New Testament. These facts the author satisfactorily proves, and though they are not new, the book is valuable as containing them in a compact form, and accessible to the public at a reasonable price. The book is a large 12mo, contains 380 pages, and is printed on fine paper, well bound; price $2, postage 20 cents. Address, Colby & Rich, 9 Montgomery Place, Boston. Orders may also be sent through this office.

HOW TO WRITE CLEARLY: Rules and exercises on English Composition, by the Rev. Edwin A. Abbott, M. A. Roberts Bros., Boston.

Mr. Abbott is one of the authors of that excellent work, "English Lessons for English People," published by the same house, Roberts Bros. That valuable book, designed originally for the use of school-boys, has been found of much advantage to adults, and has had an extensive circulation. This volume is smaller, containing only eighty pages, but is full of good, practical suggestions. The book, like its predecessor, presupposes some knowledge of English grammar. It gives fifty-six rules by which to secure clearness and force of expression, by the use of proper words properly arranged. Then follows a large number of exercises illustrative of the rules, and finally selections from old English authors, with a version by the author, showing how the meaning may be more clearly expressed in modern English. It is a valuable little work. Address Roberts Bros., Boston.

THE LYCEUM STAGE: A collection of Recitations, Dialogues and Fairy Plays, adapted for the Children's Progressive Lyceum and School Exhibitions. Bateson & Kates, Publishers, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The title of this little book expresses with sufficient clearness its object. It was compiled to answer the increasing demand for recitations, dialogues and short plays suitable for school exhibitions. It contains 120 pages, which are issued as an announcement of the second part, which is now in course of preparation. Part first contains recitations and dialogues mainly, and fairy plays, the characters to be taken by children. Part second will contain plays alone, arranged principally for adult characters. Contributions and orders for second part are solicited. Address, G. W. Kates, box 2719, Cincinnati, Ohio.

UNITED STATES MINING LAWS, and Instructions of General Land Office: Dewey & Co., San Francisco.

This pamphlet contains the U. S. Mining Laws and Regulations together with the official forms required under the Act relating to locations, etc., as adopted by the land office. All the information most needful to the miner will be found in its pages. Price, 50 cents, postage free. Address, Dewey & Co., Publishers Mining and Scientific Press, 224 Sansome street, San Francisco.

GRACE GREENWOOD.

HER OPINIONS OF MEDIUMS AND OF SPIRITUALISTS.

Writing to the New York Herald, Grace Greenwood says, "In a late Sunday's issue I noticed an ably written article on 'Modern Spiritualism,' in which appears the following challenge:—

'If Mr. Slade will permit me to take an ordinary double slate to his house, place a piece of pencil in it, and put it on the table—he may put his fingers on it for the sake of the magnetism, or do anything except put it under the table where I can't see it—and will then cause to be made thereon a single mark three inches long, or to be written a single word, I will take back every aspersion I have cast on him, and publicly acknowledge my error. So sure am I that this can't be done, that I will make him a present of $50 to accomplish such a result, and acknowledge that I have been mistaken in him.'

Now, I have no special interest in the matter in dispute, but I like to see justice done, and Christian charity extended even to ministers and mediums, and so am moved to state that during a sitting at Dr. Slade's last spring, I had this very test several times repeated. In fact, there was no writing for me "under the table." All was done on the table, in broad daylight, under my eye, and under my hand. At one time I placed in the double slate two closely folded notes sent to me to be used as tests, of the contents of which I knew nothing; nor did I know the names of the persons or intelligences to whom they were addressed. These two notes were immediately and correctly answered on the slate with the right signatures, as I ascertained on unfolding and reading them. The medium, by the way, had not even touched these notes; his hand during the mysterious writing had rested lightly on the slate, which I grasped tightly while listening intently to the scratching of the tiny bit of pencil within.

As for the other famous mediums, Messrs. Foster and Mansfield, I will not say that they never cheat in their business, after the manner of business men; but I will say that they have not cheated me; perhaps because, though wary and watchful, I did not set out to cheat them. Test questions carefully prepared beforehand and not written on thin paper, and not unfolded, have been satisfactorily answered by or through them; and such facts are of more account to me than the startling phenomena of raps, furniture moving, and the grasp of invisible hands. I do not pretend to be an investigator of Spiritualism. I have given to the matter very little time. Almost all the opportunities I have had for witnessing its strange manifestations have been accidental; but I know what I have seen, and heard and felt. I have here given a little of my own experience, and, as grand old Horace Greeley once said, "I propose to stand by it."

In the desire which "Inquirer" expresses to believe in Spiritualism, he is, doubtless, honest, but he is perhaps unfortunate in a peculiar physical organization, which renders it impossible for him to obtain the results which he has sought, but despairs of, and so doubts that such things can be.

Of a large household in this city only one member is so charged with electricity this severe weather, that he can light the gas with the tip of his finger. All the others have tried in vain, but they do not doubt his exceptional and "matchless" power of ignition. "Seeing is believing." We must accept most of the marvels of science—countless geographical discoveries, the very vital truths of our religion, on the testimony of others. And in spite of your correspondent's earnest assertion, his "faith" is in a thousand matters founded on some "other man's statement."

THE ARGUMENT FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

If Justice demands the extension of the elective franchise to Woman, no "policy" can be allowed to set it aside; and so long as the demand of Justice is urged as an argument, no other argument or consideration should be allowed to enter the discussion. That Justice does peremptorily require the enfranchisement of Woman, we believe, for the following reasons:

1. Equity of rights, privileges and duties. Whether voting be a right, privilege, duty, or something else, whatever it be, it belongs to Woman as well as man, for the same reasons. We have seen no good reason assigned for man's voting which does not apply with equal force to Woman.

2. Government derives all its just powers from the consent of the governed, formally obtained from a majority of all the responsible persons.

3. Taxation implies protection, and protection of responsible persons implies their consent formally obtained, —in a Democratic government the majority ruling. This has to be done constantly by voting.

4. In a representative government there is no perfect representation, strictly speaking, except by vote of all the people—all the people who are before the law supposed to have good judgment.

5. We have ever promised the women of this country a government by the people. This must be by voting, to make it legal. Implied consent, guessing at it, silence of women, silence of men, custom, women's influence, virtual representation, virtual voting, taking it for granted, petitioning, and all that will not answer in abstract law or principle.

6. Although "our fathers" in this government may not have designed all the details and comprehended all the consequences of a pure democracy, the language they used and the principles they laid down plainly imply the equal rights of men and women, formally adjusted. This must be done by voting,—of women as well as men.

Although the men who drafted the last two amendments to our Federal Constitution did not mean Woman Suffrage, the most emphatic principle the amendments inculcate necessarily involves such extension of the franchise. Hear what they say:

'All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'

"The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

7. Class legislation must not be allowed or connived at. Whether women have as many rights as men have, or more, or fewer, is not the question. They must have the same rights before the law. If they have not the same rights, then they are made a class, by law or custom, and must therefore be represented by direct voting—the more direct the better.

SPIRITUALISM AND ASTROLOGY.

Our friend, B. Shrafl, writing in commendation of the series of articles on the Philosophy of Astrology, by "Vox Stellarum," recently published in COMMON SENSE, admits that there is much of truth mixed with the errors of Astrology, and quotes from the articles the opinion that "if the practical study of Astrology and Spiritualism were united much of the incongruous, the repulsive and the absurd would be eliminated from both," and that "Spiritualists should acquaint themselves with the subtle but powerful influences of the stars, upon which probably, even mediumship depends." Mr. Shrafl cordially approves of the suggestion, and adds:

Having been an investigator in Spiritualism for eighteen years myself, and in Astrology for a few years, I know it is the truth. I have no doubt many of the most enlightened Spiritualists, who have outgrown the physical phase of spiritualism, agree with me. We know—not merely believe—that we are related to every atom in the universe, and, therefore, also to the stars. But I also know that mediumship is very greatly affected by physical, as well as ante-natal, conditions, and diverse causes. I feel to rejoice that I live in this age of free thought and inquiry; when every one who has a mind to investigate all things in search after truth, has the privilege of doing so. The Materialists, Atheists, Spiritualists and scientists of all descriptions are each contributing their share to this grand temple of truth, which has its foundation on earth, and its culmination in the other world or worlds, although eons of ages may run down the stream of time; when we shall no longer count time by years, but live in the eternal now. I could not embody my ideas in more fit language than "Vox Stellarum" has expressed it:

I base my entire hope and faith on the idea that what I am essentially is eternal and perfect, and will outlive eternally the transient and organic. The organic must perish with all its hopes, affections and desires, when they have subverted the purposes of the eternal and essential.

What volumes of thought these few sentences contain! They deserve to be written in letters of gold, or imprinted upon the tablets of our souls, where they never will fade away. B. SHRAFL.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR.—This good old stand-by has entered upon its forty-fifth volume, and it makes use of the event to assume a new head and an improved quality of paper, printed on new type. Of course the old Investigator shines again. A fine engraving of the Paine Memorial Building graces its frontispiece, and altogether it is a handsome sheet. It is somewhat behind the times in the treatment of some questions, but on the whole it is entertaining and instructive. It might however be still more useful if it would give a portion of the space now devoted to Spiritualism to a candid consideration of Spiritual phenomena as revealed by scientific investigation. Here is a wide field for usefulness; one which the Investigator's neighbor, the Spiritual Scientist, has no desire to monopolize even if it could.

Give a man money and everything goes with it; he becomes a gentleman, a leader in society; his opinions are sought for; the venal portion of the press defers to him; society takes off its hat and bows before him.—Chronicle.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

A little girl had been presented with a new book. We asked her how she liked it.

"It would be a real good book," she replied, "if it did not tell so much about God."

The reply was not only amusing in its simplicity, but contained, in our opinion, a good deal of common sense. It is a prevailing fault with what are designed as good books for children—they moralize and preach too much. Nearly all the issues of the Sabbath School and Tract Societies are encumbered with theology. It seems to be the general conviction that a book, to be a good one, must be a dead one. Nothing must be permitted in its pages that is not serious. A little real live fun, it is thought, unfits it for the Sunday School library.

We all like a good story or picture. Appeal to the imagination or sympathies, and almost any heart or mind can be reached—even the little child's. We remember a book which we once, in our boyhood, took out of the Sunday School library. It was called "The Freethinker." We chose it for the frontispiece. This was a picture of a young man stepping upon a precipice, and looking around, with a wild air, at a respectable middle-aged gentleman, with a cane, who held him by the shoulder. We wished to learn whether the young man really jumped off; what his motives were, and whether he was much hurt. We attempted to read the book, but found it dry. We then looked it through, to find what was said of the precipice, and the jumping off. But it was all about a young person who had got some incomprehensibly bad notions into his head—we could not ascertain what; and some friends who talked to him a good deal in a tiresome way, to convince him that he was a very wretched young man. There was nothing about the picture. We had been cheated into reading the meanest book in the world. We considered it a regular swindle. In vain our friends assured us that it was a very good book indeed, and very interesting. In vain they explained to us that the precipice signified the young man's infidelity, from which the respectable middle-aged gentleman with the cane was trying to save him. We did not care a straw for the Infidelity—what we wanted was a genuine precipice, with somebody jumping off!

We see many children's books that remind us of "The Freethinker" and that swindling frontispiece. Some of them, like the one mentioned at the beginning of this article, would be very good books "if they did not tell so much about God." Children's books, above all others, should be simple and life-like and entertaining. They should be entirely free from cant.—Investigator.

Mrs. LYDIA F. HYDE, a test and business medium residing in Chicago, intends to visit California this summer, and will spend next winter in the State, probably in San Francisco or Santa Barbara. She is well known in Boston and New York as a medium of remarkable powers. She comes here mainly on account of her health. She is very favorably mentioned in Dr. Wolfe's book, "Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism."

As the Beecher trial progresses it becomes a question whether the perjuries that have been committed do not immeasurably overshadow the original offence, (whatever that may be) which placed Mr. Beecher "on the ragged edge." Some of the witnesses have evidently done a great deal of deliberate lying, and they are "most respectable people" too, all members of or graduates from the Christian church.

PENNSYLVANIA WOMEN.

It is well known that the peasant women of Germany, and even those of the middle classes do the drudgery of the house and farm. This custom is brought with them to this country, and in Pennsylvania, where German colonies settled many years ago, the customs of the old country are still retained, so far as the work is concerned. Mrs. Jane G. Swisshelm, in a letter to the Woman's Journal, says:

Here, in Pennsylvania, we have women in "woman's sphere," no mistake! No nonsense about them! No wrongs of which to complain; no rights for which to struggle! As a rule, they marry at from sixteen to eighteen, and at once begin to add to the population. From that age until forty-five, they average a baby every two years and a half—that is if they live so long. They seldom trouble a doctor about so small a matter as a birth, but some one of their number, who never saw a medical college but has furnished her quota, attends to mother and child, and death or serious mishap at such times is a rare occurrence.

There is generally a girl provided for a week or two, to take the mother's place in doing the house work for the family, and to take care of her and baby. This girl is often in the earliest of her teens, and sometimes not so old, as those above sixteen are apt to be engaged in the other branch of the business. In addition to keeping up the supply of doctors, soldiers and sailors, these women raise flax, and manufacture it into cloth with old-style spinning-wheels or hand looms. They raise sheep, and shear them, spin, color and weave the wool; raise calves, pigs and poultry; make garden; while their husbands and sons pitch quoits for exercise, they split kindlings, make pies, milk cows, and make butter. They make soap, candles, hay, sausages, pickles, preserves, coats, trousers, shirts, dresses, jackets, carpets, counterpanes, quilts, blankets &c., and some of them roll logs, make brush heaps and burn them, pick stones off the fields and pile them out of the way, reap, rake and bind in the harvest field, and then cook while the men are resting, carry a baby afield, and have an older child to watch it while they hoe corn or potatoes, perhaps carry it a mile or two, work all day, carry it back in the evening, and milk and churn for recreation.

Some of them will carry a child weighing twenty pounds two miles and a two gallon bucket, pick the bucket full of berries and carry it and the child home. They will carry butter, eggs and chickens miles to market, and a load of merchandise home. Many of them do the work of a man, boy, woman, and donkey; and, for this service, they are entitled to just so much shelter, food and clothing as the legal owner of their labor may please to provide. Many of them, whose husbands own farms, implements, stock and money at interest, would be sadly puzzled to get a postage stamp, envelope, and paper to write to the excellent father who helped to make the laws under which they have reached this pinnacle of earthly glory, a woman's sphere.

In Pittsburgh, my native city, women have always been in the habit of making fires and feeding them, taking out ashes, cleaning hearths, floors, windows, paint, yards and pavements, going errands, carrying home marketing, doing all the work of the family; while the sons and brothers, until they "go into business," go to school, and run the streets. It is not uncommon, now, for a delicate woman to carry a half bushel basket full of meat and vegetables, a mile or more, to feed one or more half grown sons, who are at that time taking lessons in street vagabondism. As a direct consequence, there is not a city in the Union, today, whose industrial interests are so disorganized, not one in which so many women are racking their brains and straining every nerve and muscle, doing anything and everything to support men who positively refuse to work and who openly proclaim their purpose to steal in preference.

Pennsylvania men have from infancy been so largely accustomed to live by the unpaid labor of women, that her workmen are not ashamed to loaf, in support of some real or fancied right, and send their wives out to wash, scrub, and beg cold victuals. Stout fellows lie around loose while delicate women get up entertainments and soup houses for their benefit! Pennsylvania has a standard of manhood peculiar to herself, and her women, bless their lives, how they do enjoy an opportunity of supporting masculine loafers! They have pretty nearly ruined Pittsburg by the avidity with which they rush to the relief of men on a strike, and save them from any little anxiety they might feel lest they themselves, their wives and children might starve!

A SPELLING LESSON.

The most skillful gauger I ever knew was a maligned cobbler, armed with a poniard and a ferule, who drove a peddler's wagon, using a mullein-stalk as an instrument of coercion, to tyrannize over his pony, shod with calks. He was a Galilean Sadducee, and he had a phthisicky catarrh, diphtheria, and the bilious intermittent erysipelas. A certain sibyl, with the sobriquet of "Gypsy," went into ecstasies of cachinnation at seeing him measure out a bushel of pease taking up two peas at a time, and try to separate saccharine tomatoes from a heap of peeled potatoes, without dyeing or singeing the ignitable queue which he wore, or becoming paralyzed with a hemorrhage. Lifting her eyes to the ceiling of the capitol to conceal her unparalleled embarrassment, making an awkward courtesy and not harassing him with mystifying, rarefying and stupefying innuendoes, she gave him a conch, a bouquet of lilies, mignonnette and fuchsias, a treatise on mnemonics, a copy of the apocrypha in hieroglyphics, daguerreotypes of Goethe, Mendelssohn and Kosciuszko, taken by a daguerrean named Eleutheros Smitzer, a kaleidoscope, a dram-phia of ipecacuanha, a tablespoonful of naphtha, for deleble purposes, a ferule for a cane, a clarinet, some licorice, a surcingle, a carnelian of symmetrical proportions, a chronometer with a moveable balance-wheel, a box of dominos and a catechism. The gauger, who was also a trafficking rectifier and a parishioner of mine, preferring a woollen surtout (his choice was referable to a vacillating, occasionally-recurring idiosyncrasy,) wofully uttered this apothegm: "Life is checkered; but schism, apostasy, heresy and villiany shall be punished." The sibyl apologizingly answered: "There is a ratable and alleageable difference between a coniferable ellipsis and a trisyllabic diareasis." We replied in trochees, not impugning her suspicion, nor haranguing the audience. Thus "Gypsy" remained in the ascendant. Her ascendancy can never again be queried by any queasy, vulgar quean.

Almighty Mammon: Thou who reigneth here on earth, hallowed be thy name; may thy kingdom be fulfilled and thy will be all potent here, as in heaven. Grant us this day our most sanguine wish, and forgive us, our wives and our children, if we have trespassed against thee, as we freely forgive those who have trespassed against us; lead us not into temptation to rebel against thee, but deliver us from all cares, (to think for ourselves) and to glorify thy shrine we will gladly sacrifice our lives to gradual starvation—for thine is all the glory, the power and praise, forever and ever, amen.—German Paper.

THE UNTILLED LAND.

ALTERED FROM DUGANNE.

* * * * *

The water hath fish and the land hath flesh,
And the air hath many a bird;
And the soil is teeming o'er the earth,
And fruits grow fair in many lands,
Yet millions of hands want acres
And millions of acres want hands.

Sunlight and breeze and glad some flowers
Are o'er the earth spread wide,
And Nature gave these gifts to men,
To all who on earth abide.
The soil lies fallow, the woods grow rank,
Yet idle the poor man stands!
Ah! millions of hands want acres
And millions of acres want hands.

'Tis writ that we "should not muzzle the ox
That treadeth out the corn!"
Yet, behold, ye shackle the poor man's limbs
That all earth's burdens have borne.
The land is the gift of Nature to man,
And labor is Nature's command,
Yet millions of hands want acres
And millions of acres want hands.

Who hath ordained that the few should hoard
Their millions of useless gold,
And rob the earth of its fruits and flowers,
While profitless soil they hold?
Who hath ordained that a parchment scroll
Shall fence round miles of lands,
When millions of hands want acres,
And millions of acres want hands?

'Tis a glaring lie on the face of day—
This robbery of men's rights!
'Tis a lie that the face of Nature disowns!
'Tis a curse that burns and blights!
And 'twill burn and blight till the people rise,
And swear—while they burst their bands—
That hands henceforth shall have the acres,
And the acres henceforth have hands!

LABOR.

Toll swings the axe, and forests bow;
The seeds break out in radiant bloom,
Rich harvests smile behind the plow,
And cities cluster round the loom,
Where towering domes and tapering spires
Adorn the vale and crown the hill,
Stout Labor lights its beacon fires,
And plumes with smoke the forge and mill.

The monarch oak, the woodland's pride,
Whose trunk is seamed with lightning scars,
Toll launches on the restless tide,
And there unrolls the flag of stars:
The engine with his lungs of flame,
And ribs of brass and joints of steel,
From Labor's plastic fingers came,
With sobbing valve and whirling wheel.

'Tis Labor works the magic press,
And turns the crank in hives of toil,
And beckons angels down to bless
Industrious hands on sea and soil.
Here sun-browned toil, with shining spade
Links lake to lake with silver ties,
Strung thick with palaces of trade,
And temples towering to the skies.

Send Austin Kent one dollar for his pamphlets on Free Love and Marriage, etc. He has been seventeen years physically helpless, confined to his bed and chair, is poor and needs the money. He sends four or five well-written essays for one dollar. His address is AUSTIN K. Stockholm, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., Box 44.

AN EARLY DEATH BETTER THAN A VICIOUS LIFE.

The grief of a mother whose child dies in the innocence of youth is joy in comparison with the agony of her who mourns the evil courses of a living son. Remembering the happy days of his innocent childhood, she weeps over his baby clothes and boy's playthings as one without hope. No tears can bring back her boy's lost innocence.

If, sitting with his little worn out shoe
And scarlet stocking lying on my knee,
I knew the little feet had pattered through
The pearl-lit gates that lie 'twixt Heaven and me
I could be reconciled, and happy too,
And look with glad eyes toward the Jasper Sea.

If, in the morning, when the song of birds
Reminds me of a music far more sweet,
I listen for his pretty broken words
And for the music of his dimpled feet,
I could be almost happy, though I heard
No answer, and but saw his vacant seat.

I could be glad, if, when the day is done,
And all its cares and heart aches laid away,
I could look westward to the hidden sun,
And with a heart full of sweet yearnings say,
"To-night I am nearer to my little one
By just the travel of one earthly day."

If I could know those little feet were clad
In sandals wrought of light in better lands,
And that the foot-prints bright the angels made
Shone side by side with his in golden sands,
I cheerfully could bow, and e'en be glad
To know my boy in wiser, safer hands.

If he were dead I would not sit to-day
And stain with tears the wee socks on my knee;
I would not kiss the tiny shoe, and say,
"Bring back again my little boy to me!"
I would in patience wait to go the way
To him at last o'er death's dark, silent sea.

But, Oh! to know the feet, once pure and white,
The haunts of vice have boldly ventured in!
The hands that should have battled for the right
Have turned to crimson in the path of sin!
Leaves me no hope to find my boy again;
He's left his mother's arms beyond reclaim.

THE WONDERFUL HEALER AND CLAIRVOYANT

MRS. C. M. MORRISON.

This celebrated Medium is the instrument or organism used by the invisibles for the benefit of humanity. The placing of her name before the public is by request of her Controlling Band. They, through her organism, treat all diseases and cure in every instance where the vital organs necessary to continue life are not destroyed. Mrs. Morrison is an

UNCONSCIOUS TRANCE MEDIUM, CLAIRVOYANT AND CLAIRAUDIENT.

From the very beginning, hers is marked as a most remarkable career of success, such as has seldom if ever fallen to the lot of any person. No disease seems too insidious to remove, nor patient too far gone to be restored.

Mrs. Morrison, becoming entranced, the lock of hair is submitted to her control. The diagnosis is given through her lips by the Band, and taken down by her Secretary. The original manuscript is sent to the Correspondent.

When Medicines are ordered, the case is submitted to Mrs. Morrison's Medical Band, who give a prescription suited to the case. Her Medical Band use vegetable remedies, (which they magnetize) combined with a scientific application of the magnetic healing power.

Diagnosing disease by lock of hair, $1.00. (Give age and sex.)

SPECIFIC FOR EPILEPSY AND NEURALGIA.

Address MRS. C. M. MORRISON, Boston, Mass., Box 2519.

For the very best Photographs go to Bradley & Bulofson's Gallery, with an elevator, 429 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

SPIRITUALISM, ITS PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY, SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE, ETC.

VOL. II.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1875.

No. 1.

Signs of the Times.

Rio Janeiro has a Spiritual journal, printed in the Spanish language.

The works of Prof. Crookes and Mr. Wallace on Spiritualism are having a large sale.

Mary L. Shaw, of Boston, recently left a bequest of $2,000 to provide for the distribution of fruits and flowers among the patients of the City Hospital.

The Sovereigns of Industry of New Haven have chartered a barge and sent for a load of coal to Elizabethport. Coal there is $10 50 a ton (2,000 pounds.)

The cotton cloth exported by England last year, if stretched out would measure over two millions of miles in length, or enough to go eighty times around the earth.

It only costs the newspapers of England 25cts for one hundred words sent by telegraph. The result is that many of the provincial papers publish daily several columns of telegraphic news.

On the first of September next there will be held at the Hague, Netherlands, a conference of the "Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations." David Dudley Field is President.

The New York Tribune mentions as an interesting feature of the laborers' strike in Brooklyn the fact that many of the striking laborers have been sheltered and fed at the public expense during the winter, when there was no work to be had.

A "Miracle Club" has been organized in New York City, by some of the best citizens, at which all phases of spiritual manifestations occur, including the materialization of spirit forms without a cabinet, and in the light. Col. Olcott will in due time give an account in the Graphic.

Senator J. P. Jones will be in San Francisco next week, and it is expected that he will press forward the work on the projected railroad from Independence, (connecting with Los Angeles) through Pioche, Nevada, to Southern Utah, where it will connect with Brigham Young's road to Ogden. This will bring two lines in connection with the Union Pacific.

Prof. Crookes has made a most important discovery tending to show the cause of the revolution of planets on their axis. He has demonstrated by experiment that a number of discs, arranged in a certain manner in vacuo can be made to revolve by throwing upon them a pencil of light, and the rapidity of revolution is in proportion to the intensity of the light.

The alterations made by James Lick in the mode of distributing his estate meets with general approval. The only gift withdrawn is that of $250,000 for statuary at Sacramento. The former deed was so drawn as to prevent the distribution of the property until after Mr. Lick's death. He is now able to oversee the disposition of his benefactions himself, and the result will of course be much more satisfactory to all concerned.

Monasteries have been abolished in Germany by edict of the government.

Archbishop Manning went to Rome to receive a cardinal's hat; took cold on the trip, and now lies at the point of death.

Several patients in the St. Louis hospital have recently been successfully treated by the transfusion of healthy blood into their veins.

The Government management of the Telegraph in England has proved a perfect success. The business has greatly increased, and the expense is much less.

The enamelled brick invented by a Chicago man, is coming rapidly into use. Only one edge is enamelled, so as to expose a hard impervious surface to the atmosphere.

Dr. E. P. Miller, Home of Health, New York, writes: "I have become convinced of the truth of Spiritualism by personal examination at the home of the Eddy family, Chittenden, Vt."

The wastefulness of our navy management is well illustrated by the construction and sale of the ship California, which cost $1,500,000, was used about two years, and on Saturday last was sold for $23,650. Perhaps that is all the vessel is worth, but seven years were spent in her construction.

An Eastern paper calls attention to a result of the reckless extravagance in buildings, since the war, in the large number of empty stores and lofts on Broadway and other streets in New York. It says it is almost saddening to see so many elegant stores unoccupied, and adds, that there are hundreds of costly and ornamental warehouses which no legitimate mercantile business can ever pay the rent upon in these days.

Any three of the great Powers of the world could by combination force all other nations to abandon war, and submit all matters of difference to peaceful arbitration. This will yet be done. An International Conference is to be held at the Hague, in September, which it is hoped will result in something tending to this result. It is probable, however, that the world will have to become surfeited with blood first by one great conflict.

The attempt of the Mexican Government to establish the supremacy of the civil over the ecclesiastic power in that country has resulted in a "religious" furore, and the fanatics, headed by the priests, are committing outrages in the name of Religion. Two hundred catholics recently attacked the village of Lancitaro, in Guerrero, shouting Viva la Religion! and forty houses were demolished and the government archives destroyed by them.

Although indisputable evidence has been given of the fact of materialization, very few newspapers will print the accounts. They all eagerly printed the exaggerated reports of the Katie King fraud at Philadelphia, but refuse place to later and incontestable evidence in favor of the materialization of spirits. Meantime, this phase of Spiritualism is becoming so common that thousands of witnesses are becoming convinced of the existence of life after death.

THE GREAT REFORMER.

BY JOHN BALL.

Jesus, of Nazareth, was a remarkable man. He had fine intuitive faculties, and could see the laws of nature working with unerring effect, where inferior and less comprehensive minds could see nothing but confusion. He saw that the same laws are applicable to all human life; that one man is just as good as another, and that God is no respecter of persons. But in his time, as is the case to this day, the ignorance and selfishness of mankind were thwarting the beneficent purposes of natural law. To him all mankind formed one common brotherhood; but the vast majority of men looked upon each other with enmity and distrust. A bigoted and unscrupulous priesthood held them in the thralldom of superstition, and the exactions of corrupt and tyrannical governments kept them in a state of chronic destitution. How is this state of things to be amended? was the question the Nazarene asked himself. He saw that the tyrant and his victim were both alike violating the laws of nature, and till these laws were obeyed he saw no hope for mankind. He felt that his mission was to proclaim the universal brotherhood of man, wherein men were to "love one another," and be free to think and act out their own lives on this principle: "Who art thou that judgest another? I judge no man."

Jesus had wrought out the intricate problems in connection with human life before he began his public teachings, and I think it was evident his plan was to form a community of those who were willing to accept his teachings. The one great distinguishing element in the community was love; the man or woman who did most for their fellow men and women were to be the most praiseworthy and honored amongst them. Of course this movement found greatest favor amongst that class of the people who, in modern times, have been styled the Great Unwashed. For then, as now, there were very few of those having the lion's share of the earth's bounties who were willing to give it up for the cause of humanity. After the death of Jesus the leaders of this movement collected their followers into communities or churches in the various places to which they went preaching this new doctrine.

I am inclined to think that the Apostles did not understand the significance of the spirit-manifestations which they received, and rated them as infallible, whereas they came from finite and erring intelligences. The danger arising from a belief in the supernatural was not so great to such strong-minded men as most of these Apostles were; because, however much their theories might be at variance with the truth, there would still be enough common sense left in them to make their lives for the most part grand and noble. But the effect would be altogether different on the ignorant and weak-minded. With Jesus, faith meant something which we know and feel to be true. With most people it means a mere belief.

The Apostles were earnest and honest men, but they were carried away by their admiration for the character of Jesus, and by their imperfect knowledge of the source of the spiritual manifestations which they received. The people had always been taught to look to some power outside of themselves for guidance and protection. After the founders of the church had gone the way of all flesh their descendants and followers began to look upon them with awe-stricken wonder and reverence; and instead of relying, as the Apostles did, upon the spirit-world as the source of their power and inspiration, they weakened and finally destroyed the connection between the two worlds by pinning their faith to the words of the Apostles, and evolving theories and doctrines as to what they taught. This winnowing and narrowing process has been going on ever since, till, to-day, the theologies of christendom are nothing more than empty husks and lifeless creeds.

The truths enunciated by Jesus have borne their fruits throughout the last nineteen centuries of the world's history; but the church of to-day knows little or nothing of the spirit of Truth as it was in its founder. The searching and fearless spirit of modern science is of the same sort as that which Jesus manifested. He came not to bring peace, but the sword. "He that putteth his hand to the plough and turneth back is not worthy of the Kingdom of God." We must follow truth wherever it leads, though it estrange us from parents, wife and children, position and influence, and from those pet schemes, children of our own imaginations, by which we had fondly hoped to regenerate the world. We must leave all these if necessary, and walk on, fearless and alone, regardless of contempt, persecution and scorn, if we would be worthy followers of that noble reformer, Jesus, of Nazareth, in the pursuit and proclamation of truth.

At any given period in the history of Woman, she has adopted man's whim as the measure of her rights; has claimed nothing; has sweetly accepted anything. At any given moment, so well was this interpretation received, that it stood for absolute right. In Rome, a woman, married or single, could not testify in court;—in the Middle Ages and down to quite modern times, she could not own real estate;—ten years ago, she could not, in New England, obtain a collegiate education;—even now she cannot vote. Indeed, we are about to hold a Centennial Celebration, to sound forth our gratitude for all our precious blessings; and when women ask us "Has the time come to say that two and two make four?" we answer, "Yes, for men." What a carnival of patriotic talk is to be heard throughout our land. What constant announcement and re-announcement will be made of the few plain principles on which the republic rests! We shall hear "self-evident truths" announced, and "We the people" glorified, and the "times that tried men's souls" will be transferred to new times and only try the endurance of men's ears. The first principles of republican government will be so rehearsed that they will become "as plain as that two and two make four." But we shall find, throughout, as Mr. Emerson said of a different class of reasoners, "Their two is not the real two; their four is not the real four." We shall find different numerals and diverse arithmetical rules for the two sexes; as, in some oriental countries, men and women speak different dialects of the same language.—T. W. Higginson.

OUR CURRENCY.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—Our Political Debating Club has come to about the following conclusions upon the money question, to-wit:

A currency, to be a suitable and proper representative of property and labor, should never go out of the nation where it is issued.

Should never be redeemed or lessened in volume so as to make it necessary to do any business on credit.

Should never draw more nor less than a fixed interest, and that below natural production with light degree of labor.

Should be in sufficient volume to be had readily in all parts of the country.

Should be owned by the whole people, and issued by their servants, the government only.

Should be made of paper, or the cheapest material possible, having in view convenience, durability and mobility.

Should be the only legal tender, to the people or government.

If more should be issued than necessary to carry on the business on a cash basis, the people, through their government, should be ready to receive and pay the legal interest upon such surplus as might be deposited with them, and for such length of time as individuals might see fit to leave it, and should issue bonds for this purpose.

With such a currency any nation must be prosperous in time of peace, and well prepared in time of war. Every citizen would have an interest in his country and an interest in sustaining its government. There would not be that inducement for Chinamen and other foreigners to come to hoard up its gold currency to carry away with them as fast as the mints can coin it here, to be recoined abroad, leaving us without a circulating medium, and without any improvement as a compensation for the exported gold. If we want anything from other nations which we cannot produce, our stimulated productions will pay for it. We want no mints, no bankers, no brokers and no money sharks.

Searching through the ruins of past ages, the remains show the same sad condition that marks the present generation: the rule of gold and the consequent degradation of the masses. Fine palaces and massive structures for useless purposes ever mark an enslaved people. Every fine church is surrounded by hundreds of miniature dwellings. For every palace there are a hundred hovels. For every rich man there are a hundred slaves. If any are very rich, many must be very poor.

The only argument produced against a national paper currency and in favor of gold is that in the event the government and country is overrun and destroyed by a foreign foe those who happen to have gold in their pockets might run away with it; that some of the New York sharks have already seen the hand-writing on the wall and are sending their gold to Europe and soon will be ready to go themselves. The sooner they all go, the better.

Again, with this system of currency we will effectually settle the Chinese question, for the advantage in coming will be to the citizen, and not to the alien vulture. The inflation bug-a-boo will be shown a humbug, gotten up for the occasion by designing knaves. The volume of currency has nothing to do with inflating prices.

All prices will be regulated under a proper currency by the proportionate cost of production in our own country. Foreign articles, if they come, must seek for exchange in our production and not in our circulating medium. So it matters not what we fix our scale of prices at so we make them uniform among ourselves. Neither is it essential that we use the word "dollar" at all (except in paying old debt created in the name of dollars). So many units and so many ciphers would answer the same purpose as long as our money stays at home, as we want it to. It is only foreign enemies who want us to fix our currency on the swindling monarchical plan, so they can control our country as they do their own subjects. Our gold and silver bars are just as valuable in foreign markets as our coined money, without the enormous expense of coining, and as long as the people are fools enough to pay two dollars to dig out one, they can find a market for it. But when they become half as wise as monkeys the deeper it is buried in earth or sea, the better for man.

In view of the fact that the American people have to be driven into every advancement for the good of the majority, the debt created by the abolition of African slavery is a National blessing, for it gives the people an opportunity of forcing the new currency in place of the old, or leave their foreign debt for ever unpaid, which they cannot afford to do, and if they attempt it much farther the people will invite them to take a back seat, for their last effort at resumption has given their measure, and shown what an unfortunate net of little fish we have sent to Washington.

If the government can pay that debt by a national currency which we are so much in need of, and which the ignorance of our rulers would not allow them to adopt without it, the debt will prove the greatest blessing the American people have ever experienced. F. W.

Sacramento, May 11th.

Mr. T. W. Higginson does not believe in club-life and secret societies and other arrangements which take a man away from home, and separate husband and wife. He says, "I honestly believe that this melancholy desertion of the home is largely due to the traditional separation between the alleged spheres of the sexes. The theory still prevails that home is the particular province of the woman, that she has next to no duties out of it; and hence, naturally enough, that the husband has next to no duties in it. If he is amused there let him stay there, but as it is not his recognized sphere of duty, he is not actually violating any duty by absenting himself. This theory even pervades our manuals of morals, of metaphysics, and of popular science."

The Woman's Journal asks these questions: "Is it not as much a crime and sin to trample on the rights of 15,000,000 of women now, as it was to do the same thing to a much smaller number of men a century ago? Was it worse to tax men without their consent then, than it is to tax women now? Was it worse to govern men without their consent then, than it is to do the same to women now?"

HIGHER OR LOWER.

When we analyze the condition of affairs as they exist on this coast, and the relation of the laboring classes—especially the female part—thereto, misgivings come up as to the continued prosperity of the majority, through fear that they will prove unequal to the foreshadowing dangers. These dangers are two-fold: First, Asiatic labor, and second, the rapid accumulation of capital in the hands of the few.

The laboring class we may say have three evils to contend against, viz: Chinese cheap labor, the power of combined wealth, and the general corruption of the times. The Asiatics are now in such numbers as, in a degree, to change the status of labor, and are increasing at a ratio certainly not for the best interests of our people. White laborers must raise themselves higher by association, and thus turn what is now an evil to a good. This important fact calls for thought and earnest action by every man and woman who labors. They must decide whether they will elevate themselves by co-operative effort, or fall beneath the surging tide of Asiatic labor and combined capital. There is no middle ground in the future outlook. It is higher or lower than the present. This being the fact, the question of Capital vs. Labor becomes an important one for Capital as well as Labor, for laboring men, under pressure, might get unruly and exercise their latent power; and then, what?

We need not scout at the Chinaman, nor entertain the idea that he can be driven from our shores or hindered from immigrating hither. This is a free country "for the oppressed of all nations;" besides, his coming is in accord with Nature's unalterable law, while our laws entitle him to protection and reward for his economy and industry. Can you blame the Chinaman? Certainly not; then what must white labor do? I will answer—make a new departure. As capital consolidates and thus forms a power, and is governed by men of marked executive ability, so must labor consolidate, form a power, and be governed by their best executive heads, and not only that, but be equally as reliant on their officers as capital is on its leaders. Some may say, "Oh, there need be no apprehension from an overstock of this cheap labor element;" and so say I, provided white labor will awaken to the fact that it cannot rest as in the past, but must take one step higher.

To realize what I mean, note the occupations now filled by Chinese which were formerly filled by women and girls, not only in the laundry and as house servants, but in running sewing machines. What has been done to supplement white industry can only be realized by investigation, and in efforts to supply the wants of those deprived of labor by such means.

It may be asked again, What course do you mark out for these poor working women and girls, who must earn their own living? Why, open new avenues of industry; make labor in calico more honorable than idleness in silk.

Is it any wonder woman is striving for her individual rights, and ought she not to have them? Does not suffrage to her mean something, and is it not her elevation, and why not grant it? The laboring man and the laboring woman are equally interested in the power of the ballot, and they must look to it for their own advancement. Laboring men must grant equal rights to women, and be hoodwinked by neither priest, prophet nor politician. Let all have faith and honesty enough in political times to stand by their principles and not be bought by favor nor cowed by fears.

Associated with this question is one point labor wants to observe, and that is, to not be jealous and lose its temper and time in traducing those above it in worldly goods simply because they are rich. This envy of the capitalists is often a source of much misunderstanding, and often widens the gap between capital and labor. Rich men sometimes do more for labor than labor is willing to concede. They are not all devoid of human kindness. I could name a single man—I will: John P. Jones—who has done more at a single dash to advance the interest of labor on this coast than any five hundred poor laborers in San Francisco. See what Stanford, Crocker, Ralston and others I could name have done in giving employment and good wages to thousands. The workingmen of this coast have had no better friends, and yet they are too often found traducing them. These men don't spend their time growling at Vanderbilt, Astor and Stewart because they may possess more wealth.

The workingman or woman may say, "But they don't work!" Don't they? Brains filled to overflowing. No work? There's not a single one but envies the laborer's sweet repose, for the hardest of all labor is brain labor. But enough of this. There is an even and intelligent ground for both capital and labor which only wants wisdom and good feeling to move for the good of both.

Viewing the various elements and condition of things on this coast, it seems to me instead of capital and labor only, there will be three classes, thus: 1st, capital resting upon itself; 2d, capital and white labor (co-operation); 3d, cheap labor (mainly Asiatic). The first and second classes will become more united, and this is the future outlook and higher step I would have white labor take, while the third class will have to fight the battle of life that white labor has heretofore had to fight. The Pacific coast, and California especially, is now opening into an era of great prosperity, such as no State in the American Union has equalled; for with all our home products of an agricultural and manufacturing character we will have within the next three years not less than $250,000,000 of gold and silver! And now is the time for the laboring man and woman to rouse their energies, and devise some scheme of co-operative labor in every department whereby they can lift themselves higher and in time become the peer of capital. THE DIFFERENCE.—No matter what "revelations" may or may not be made through modern mediumship, as no penal authority attaches to them. But not so with the Bible. You must believe that or be damned. And yet how many, or whether there was one invisible, which suggested anything in getting up that old book, no one knows. The different names of "God," "Son," "Ghost," "Devil," are human inventions, and the invisibles they are meant for are the creations of "faith." One made the world and another destroys it; and both working through "mediums;" one through a snake, and the other through a "Son" which he had begotten by a human woman. And this mediumship of Jesus, thus generated, is the basic foundation of Christianity. And the Bible assures us that there is now, as there has been, and always will be, an eternal hate and rivalry between these four invisibles!—LaRoy Swonderland.

MODERN THOUGHT.

ED. COMMON SENSE:—The philosophers of the present age are gradually undermining the theories of the past, upon which our false social systems are founded. John Stuart Mill, Sir Henry Sumner Paine and others, men eminent in the field of social science, have broached the doctrine that "the land shall not be sold." Mill has proved that the unearned increment (a word he has coined) does not belong to the possessor, but to the community by whom the land is made valuable. This, if carried out, puts an end to the speculations in lands. Paine says that as the lands were wrested from community by fraud or violence they may be resumed by the community whenever it becomes necessary for the public good. Even Sir George Campbell, in a paper read before the Belfast Society, defending the law of primogeniture, admits that the land, having been created by God for the use of his creatures, can only be intrusted to the care of individuals to secure the public good.

The scientists of England are far ahead of those of our country, not one of whom has yet earned a reputation by vindicating the rights of all men to share equally in the bounties provided by nature. In fact, most of our scientists are like Amasa Walker, whose article in the International Review on the "Money Problem" proves him to be the humble servant of grasping monopolists. Now comes W. T. Thornton, in the Fortnightly Review, and takes issue with Adam Smith, so long venerated as the father of Political Economy, on a question which, when pursued to the logical sequence, will involve the right of brains (that have ruled since cunning overthrew force) to take precedence of labor. Smith says that "on the absence or presence of exchangeabilities shall depend the absence or presence of economic wealth." "If this is true," says Thornton, "not simply the beauty of Mr. Yellowplush's calves, but also his display of them behind his mistress' carriage

* * * and even Lord Kingsale's right to wear his hat in his sovereign's presence, * * * or whatever right or privilege it be which other people covet, and the transfer of which is permitted by law, is, to all intents and purposes, economic wealth by virtue of its convertibility." This theory Mr. Thornton sets aside in the following logical arguments: "To these immediate owners indeed the privileges are as completely wealth as any of the material things for which they are exchangeable. The owners cannot however exercise them except at the expense of other people. What the owners gain by them other people lose. In the same proportion in which those are enriched by them, these are impoverished." Now, the upshot of this kind of reasoning is that as labor creates all the wealth upon which the prosperity of society depends, labor, (which has so long been crushed beneath the iron heel of monopoly) as the benefactor of the human race, deserves the first place in the estimation of mankind.

SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY.

We stand by the telegraphic battery and presently the clicking of the machine conveys to us intelligently the occurrences of some distant station. We find at the distant station a machine so constructed as to generate an invisible something called "electricity." At our station is a machine constructed like the one from whence the news came, and the two are connected by a wire, which transmits the electricity.

The human body is a battery; the nerves correspond to the wire. The magnetic current of the body is of so fine a quality that it does not need, like the electric fluid of a common battery, a wire upon which to travel. It is this animal magnetism that causes the magnetic healer to give vitality to the invalid by the laying on of hands. It was this that caused the man Jesus to perform his miracles of healing the sick, which were no more miraculous than the rising of the sun. This magnetism assumes different forms. It may act as a healing medium, and as a carrier of intelligence. It is in the latter capacity that we are enabled to hold communion with departed spirits.

The machine of the operator may wear out, and the electric current become extinguished. So may the human battery become worn out; but the soul behind it never dies, and when its own machine is worn out it may use that of others. Death, which has heretofore been looked upon as so hideous, is merely the suspension of a worn out or deranged battery, while the real person, the soul which once animated the worn-out instrument, goes—

"Where jarring discord ne'er comes,
And harmony universal reigns."

We know absolutely nothing of a future state except through communications received from the departed. x.

TO SPIRITUALISTS AND FREETHINKERS.

It is now one year since the first issue of this paper. There has been a gradual increase in the subscription list, but the income is not sufficient, as yet, to pay the expense of publication. If liberal ideas on religious subjects could find expression in our daily press; if reports of lectures and discussions by Free Thinkers received as much attention as is accorded to the sermons of the "orthodox," there would be less occasion for a journal of this kind: but every reader knows that it is the interest of the secular press to ignore or misrepresent Spiritualism and what is called Infidelity. The advocates of Rational Religion can find no hearing except from their own platforms, and through their own press; therefore we earnestly request our friends to aid by sending names of new subscribers. We cannot afford to send agents all over the State, and if we could they would not be as serviceable as local agents. One active friend in each county would assure speedy success; and our readers may rely upon this that just as soon as the income of the paper will warrant additional expense, COMMON SENSE will be enlarged and otherwise improved.

COMMON SENSE.

WILLIAM N. SLOOUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOOUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAY. 22, 1875.

The second edition of Dr. Wolfe's remarkable work, "Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism," is about to be issued from the press of the Religio Philosophical Publishing House, Chicago, and will be sold at $2.

Mrs. M. J. Upham Hendee, formerly of San Francisco, can now be addressed at Dixon, Cal., care Dr. F. F. Upham, by parties desiring her services either as lecturer or medium. She was, at last advices, speaking and giving seances at Sutter Creek, Cal.

Mrs. Marion Todd, formerly of California, is at present lecturing with success in Springfield, Mass., on Spiritualism and Social Reform. It is her intention to accompany her husband to California in September next. Mr. Todd is at present speaking in Western cities. They will receive a cordial welcome in California.

The spiritual meetings in Liberty Hall, Bush street, Oakland, Sabbath morning and evening, increase in interest. Walter Hyde gives "metaphysical lectures" in the morning, and in the evening there is a discourse by Mr. Curtis. A circle is held in the same place each Thursday evening.

A letter from a friend in Sacramento says Mrs. French (from Washington, D. C.) lectured recently before the Freethought society there, and was well liked. The letter says: "She does not claim superior talent as a lecturer, but she has other gifts, such as delineating character and prescribing for the sick. Her modest appearance at once wins the kindly feelings of those she meets."

The Freethought Committee had another meeting on Sunday last, and made considerable progress in laying the foundation for a permanent organization. A sub-committee was directed to prepare an Address to the people, to be printed in connection with the Constitution. A meeting of the Committee, at which the Address and the Constitution will be considered, is to be held at the office of Dr. Joseph Swain, room No. 155, New Montgomery street.

SPIRITUALISTS' UNION.—The Annual meetings of this society have heretofore been held on the fourth Sunday of May. Last Sunday Mr. Ryder gave notice that he will to-morrow move to amend the Constitution so that the annual meetings hereafter may be held on Saturday instead of Sunday, the object being to comply with the law, which requires such elections to be made on a week day.

CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY.

An association, the object of which is to save expense in the purchase of articles for household use, has been organized in this city, and bids fair to become successful. It was started by ladies, but not with the design to make it a woman's society, as will be seen by the following statement:

The objects of the Co-operative Society shall be:—

1. To buy all provisions and goods at wholesale, and to furnish them to every member at the lowest possible rates.
2. The members of this Society shall benefit each other by giving employment as much as possible to each other.
3. Any individual can become a member of this Society, without regard to sex, religion or nationality, by paying to the fund the sum of —.

The next meeting will be held on Tuesday, May 28th, at half past seven in the evening, at the house of Mr. Dieren, 512 Bush street, above Dupont.

MRS. ADDIE L. BALLOU.—Mrs. Ballou commenced an engagement with the Spiritualists' Union on Sunday last. She read the poem commencing "Out of the old house, Nancy." She seemed to think some of us have got out of the old house—the church, into the new structure of spiritualism before we are fully prepared to fill its roomy chambers. The new house is undeniably better than the old; it admits of greater freedom of thought and action, but it is questionable if all who have taken up quarters in it are capable of appreciating anything better than the cosy little place they left. There was a charm about the old house which we cannot forget. There was earnestness there; kind feeling, harmony and quiet, which we do not have now. We have a new house, and a grand one, but it is almost empty, and many of our old friends still remain in the old shell. This was merely introductory to a very pleasant discourse, during which Mrs. Ballou expressed herself as opposed to the itinerant system of lecturing, and in favor of regular speakers. She gave notice that the meetings will be free—or at least that no charge will be made at the door during her engagement.

SOCIETY FOR SELF CULTURE.—The school question was discussed last Sunday, the speakers being Mr. Johnson, Mrs. Hyde, Mr. Thurston, Mr. Martin, Dr. Allyn, Mrs. Addie Ballou and J. L. Hatch. Some thought our public schools could be improved, but none opposed the system. To-morrow the subject is "Resolved that our present marriage system is a fruitful source of crime." Mrs. Addie L. Ballou will open the debate in the affirmative.

The money power is trying to delude the people with the idea that a currency of 800,000,000 of paper can rest safely on a basis of 200 millions of gold. We must save the people from this delusion, and change the laws, so as to expand the basis of our currency—make it the whole wealth and credit of the combined people.

REFORM MOVEMENT.

On the 8th page of this issue will be found a report of a meeting held at Dashaway Hall on Sunday last, for the purpose of organizing a new reform society. The objects as set forth in the report of a special committee, which was adopted, are worthy the consideration of all practical reformers.

Little progress will be made in Labor Reform until there is more thorough organization. Spiritualists and Social Reformers, when earnest in their work, can do a great deal individually; but individuals are powerless in the matter of Labor Reform until the majority of workingmen are induced to sustain them. The working classes are their own worst enemies because they will not unite, and capitalists, who are generally shrewd men, take advantage of their disunion. A capitalist cares little for a fellow-capitalist, but they unite for a common purpose. People who depend upon their daily labor for a living must unite, not from a feeling of revenge against capitalists, but simply to secure justice.

The only real solution of the labor problem will be found in some of the many phases of co-operation. In the old countries co-operation has passed through the stage of experiment, and is a complete success. In England alone there are 400,000 co-operatives, whose yearly profits are represented by the respectable sum of $7,000,000. They are engaged in the wholesale and retail provision trade, in manufacturing and milling. They have building associations, clothing stores, club and coffee-houses, libraries and reading rooms, and in some places they have their own schools. There are six co-operative cotton mills, with a nominal capital of $18,000,000, and one flour mill which does a yearly trade of $1,500,000. The co-operative building associations of Oldham have erected three hundred cottages and sold them to the workingmen at cost price.

The Sacramento Record, in an article from which these figures are taken, says:

The artisan finds that because he is poor he has to live expensively, since there is no way of living so costly as purchasing supplies in dribblets. The profits of the corner grocery are probably thirty per cent. more than those of wholesale houses for this reason, and all these heavy profits come, as a rule, out of the pockets of workingmen. Besides this, the pernicious credit system, which yearly hangs milestones around the necks of thousands of industrious men, is born of this method of obtaining supplies. * * The demand for economy exists here as there, (in England) and our workingmen suffer quite as much from the present clumsy and costly system. A thorough co-operative system would diminish the cost of living from one-fourth to one-third, and afford a proportionately large margin for savings. When the store had been established it would be in order to start building associations; but if that is done it will be necessary to adopt a safer and better plan than that of the Homestead Associations, or the Real Estate Associates of San Francisco.

In another column is a brief item concerning a co-operative society recently organized here. It is a movement in the right direction, and the reform should be extended to other matters. The poor man must give up a little of his fancied independence in order to secure real independence. He must be conciliatory, and endeavor to work harmoniously with his fellow if he wishes to permanently improve his condition. He must come down to a solid basis of facts, and unite in measures that will insure a just remuneration for his labor, and protect him in all his material interests. He can have his own banks, instead of furnishing capital to those who oppress him. He can establish workshops, stores and business of all kinds, and conduct them so as to have a fair division of profits, and force the present too-large class of middle-men into the laborer's ranks. Of course it is necessary to have a class of dealers between the producer and consumer, but these should work for the interests of both, instead, as now, robbing both for his own enrichment. Success to intelligent co-operation!

THE DIVINING ROD.

William Christie, of Dunedin, New Zealand, writes COMMON SENSE concerning this "old superstition," and refers to an article in the London Medium on the same subject. It appears that Mr. Christie, after many experiments, has ascertained that a rod (a common walking stick) when held at one end by two persons, one of whom must be a medium, will point out the letters of the alphabet so as to spell messages more rapidly than by the usual mode of calling over the letters. The persons must stand facing each other holding the stick with both hands, the hands clasping the stick alternately. Mr. Christie says: "Planchette, if lifted, will exhibit the latent force and intelligence more determinedly than if sitting. Again, any other small article will do as well as, or better than Planchette. A pointed article will point to letters and spell out sentences in the first personal pronoun in the name of deceased persons." Mr. Christie is evidently a pious man. He has communications from Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Doddridge, Rev. Dr. Guthrie and other divines. He calls the bible "God's holy book," and sends us what he calls "a beautiful prayer" received by means of a rod.

Our friend and correspondent, J. W. Mackie, closes a letter to the Boston Investigator as follows:

And before I close, let me commend your action regarding free speech. I detest the principles and avowed practices of Moses Hull, but I detest hypocrisy more. If the worst actions of the worst men can have even a shadow of defence, let it be heard; truth can afford freedom to falsehood, and virtue has nothing to fear in being put in comparison with vice, for—

"Ever the truth comes uppermost,
And ever is Justice done."

The little clique of tax-payers (tax-avoiders) in Chicago, styled The Citizens Association, has disrupted. The experiment, which was simply one to rule an entire city in the interests of a few, signally failed. The tax-payers party of San Francisco has worked more in the interest of the people, but even that is ruled by a small number, comparatively, of the citizens.

A spiritual seance will be given to-morrow (Sunday) at 11 o'clock A. M. and 7½ P. M., at Charter Oak Hall, by Dr. Wm. R. Joscelyn and others.

MEETING OF REFORMERS.

The Society for the Promotion of Political and Social Reform held a meeting in Dashaway Hall on Sunday afternoon last. Joseph Swain was called to the chair. After a brief address he announced that the first business in order would be a report from the committee appointed two weeks previous. The report was read by the President, as follows:

The Committee appointed at a public meeting held at Dashaway Hall Sunday, May 2, to take steps toward organizing a society for the advancement of social and political reform, report that they have had several meetings, and offer the following declarations as the result of their deliberations, which they hope this meeting will carefully consider and adopt as a basis of future operations:

The name of the organization shall be The Society for the Promotion of Political and Social Reform.

Political Reform is here meant to signify a change in our policy of allowing a small clique, by corruption or other means, to control our entire body politic.

Social Reform is here meant to signify each man's right to live in society and enjoy his share of the raw material which a wise and beneficent God has supplied to all mankind, but which unjust laws on land and exchange have deprived the many of and conferred upon the few.

This Association is not meant to be a "piece" society, having simply a transient effect on a local election by selling out to the highest bidder and then disbanding till the next election; but is proposed to be permanent, and each member to use his own free will, and vote as his conscience shall dictate, the object being to disseminate as far as possible correct principles of government by means of public meetings lectures, discussions, essays, tracts, etc.

This Society will demand a thorough and radical reform in our law-making power that will make it impossible for Representatives to barter away the rights and interests of the people.

It will seek a reform in our judiciary that will prevent the same judges delivering decisions diametrically opposed to each other upon the same law and facts, and that will prevent them incarcerating persons charged with no crime, merely because they are poor, and keeping them in jail as long as their whim and fancy may dictate.

It will demand strict accountability of all officers, national, State and municipal, and that a severe punishment be inflicted upon all public plunderers who have violated the trust reposed in them by the people; and upon their aiders and abettors, even though they be our wealthiest citizens.

The objects of the Society will be to encourage the producers in organizing co-operative societies so as to retain the profits of their own industry, and thereby make themselves independent of the middle-men whose object is to get the greatest amount of labor for the least amount of remuneration.

To encourage them to use all honorable means toward reducing the hours of labor so as to give them time to enjoy the society of their families, and cultivate their minds, to the end that they shall be something more than mere "hewers of wood and drawers of water."

And to favor a system of education that shall not allow one child to grow up in ignorance; but where, through the death or misfortune of the parents, the child is cast upon the charities of a cold world, it shall be provided for and properly educated, so that it may have a fair start in the race of life.

To further the foregoing objects we make the following declaration of principles and rights:

All governments which are established for any other purpose than the benefit and protection of the people are unjust and tyrannical, and should not be tolerated for one moment by a wise and intelligent community which desires its people to act justly with one another. All laws conflicting with natural justice tend to make the government despotic.

A wise people will scrutinize every law before it is put on the statute books.

If all the laws were made for the benefit of the majority of the people there would not be one poor man in the commonwealth where there are a hundred; and there would not be more than one law upon our statute book where we now have a hundred.

We ask particular attention to the following self-evident fundamental law of our being.

The land is not only a gift of the Creator to all the inhabitants of the earth; but it is an imperative law of nature that all must sustain life by its produce, thereby showing conclusively that every man has an inherent right to occupy and cultivate as much land as is necessary for the maintenance of himself and family; and his right to occupy to-day gives him no right to say who shall occupy it when he ceases to do so. For if it were otherwise the Creator would be unjust, making one portion of mankind to be the slaves of the other portion, and giving the lie to the Declaration of Independence, which says "All are created equal." And the legitimate function of a government is to reserve the land intact for actual settlers, in quantities as above. And all lands conveyed as subsidies to railroad companies, to scrip speculators, or to any other than the actual settler, is subversive of the most vital interest of the people, and can only tend to injustice, inequality, anarchy confusion and death.

Water, like land, being an imperative necessity of our being, should, in the abstract, be as free as air, and in the concrete, cost only the labor of supplying it. And the allowing for one moment of a private corporation to hold the inhabitants of San Francisco, or any other city, in their power for water, charging enormous rates and threatening to stop the supply of any individual that is not able and willing to put up with their dictatorial usurpation, is at once unjust on the part of the government which allows it, and simple on the part of the people who suffer it. And the just principle is that not only water, but gas, railroads, canals, etc., should be owned and controlled by the nation, State, or municipality, as the case may be, and should be furnished to the people at first cost.

The rascalities unearthed, not only in our municipality, but throughout the State and nation; the license frauds; the poll-tax robberies; the self-confessed bribery of numbers of our wealthiest and most prominent citizens; the taxing of small householders and small farmers to the full value of all their property, and allowing the rich to hold immense tracts of land uncultivated, and taxed at less than one-tenth its value, show that our entire system of taxation is one seething cauldron of corruption, and calls loudly for reform. And to say that all the reform required is honest men to administer the law is to throw dust in the eyes of the people; for the entire system of taxation seems to the minds of honest thinkers to have been concocted to give position to placemen and to allow them to plunder with impunity. We therefore demand some simple mode of taxation that will cost little in the collection, tax the rich in full proportion to the poor, and of such a character that any inhabitant of the community may see at a glance whether any other inhabitant has paid his full tax or not.

J. D. PINNOR, Chairman.

PAT J. HEALY, Secretary.

After the reading of the address the audience were invited to discuss the question at issue. Mr. Healy quoted Horace Mann to show the utter uselessness of written law when the public mind becomes corrupt, and argued that our present social condition will not bear investigation; that our respectable citizens are above the law; they stand self-confessed criminals before the community, and yet the people seem to be powerless to bring them to justice. The system under which we live prevents the possibility of any honest administration of public affairs, and when public money is handled with recklessness, private honor and integrity are at stake. When a people discover that their social system is not in harmony with the progress of the age, when they find that their growth in the knowledge of social science has not been met by a corresponding growth and expansion of the social system; that while art has advanced our civil affairs remain unchanged, or changed only for the worse; that what was once a fit and appropriate system is now unfit and hurtful, it is the right and duty of such people to discard the old and seek for new. The right of reformation is a sacred, a natural right, which, whenever resisted, is instantly transformed into the right of revolution, and is as perfect as the right of government itself. It rests on the same basis. It relates to human duty, and therefore to God; it relates to human happiness, therefore to life eternal; it is only bloody when necessity arms the hand of common honesty and warms the soul of patriotic virtue in its cause.

Mr. Ferral, Sr., reverted to our early history to prove that we never have had freedom, and quoted Hamilton to show that people have always been governed by force or fraud. It must be our endeavor to change the current of public opinion. The diffusion of knowledge is our only remedy.

Mr. Days asserted that three-fourths of our people live in misery, that one-fourth may riot in wealth and luxury. He quoted largely from official records to prove that the majority of our prostitutes are compelled to pursue their wretched calling by the stern mandates of hunger. How can we change this state of affairs? Neither the pulpit nor the press, to any extent, will advocate radical reform in this direction. It is our duty when we recognize these evils to cry out against them, and to associate ourselves together for the dissemination of reformatory ideas to the masses.

At this stage the meeting proceeded to elect officers. The following are the names of those elected: President, Dr. Swain; first Vice President, B. F. French; second Vice President, Dr. George Hardeastle; third Vice President, J. H. Phillips; Treasurer, J. D. Pierson; Recording and Corresponding Secretary, Pat J. Healy; Executive Committee, J. McMahon, Mr. and Mrs. Dieren, Thomas Watson, J. M. Days, Fred. Entz, Phil Libberstein.

The following rules were adopted for the government of the Society:

The government of this Society shall be composed of a President, three Vice Presidents, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, a Treasurer and an Executive Committee of eleven, who shall have supervision of the affairs of the Association.

The President shall hold office for one month, and shall be succeeded by the Vice Presidents in the order of their election.

The third Vice President shall be elected monthly by the Executive Committee.

The Secretary, Treasurer and elective members of the Executive Committee shall hold office for six months.

The Executive Committee shall include the President, first Vice President, Recording Secretary and Treasurer.

Any person agreeing to the objects of this Association may become a member by being enrolled and paying monthly the sum of twenty-five cents.

At the first meeting of each month the Treasurer shall make a statement of the financial condition of the Society.

The list of membership was then supplemented by the addition of several names, and with the utmost good feeling the Society adjourned to meet again at the call of the President.

HOW TO BE SAVED.

John Benedict, in an address before the Sacramento Educational Society, spoke, in substance, as follows:

Sin is ignorance; nothing more; a want of capacity to comprehend cause and effect, and want of strength to overcome the inherited tendency to misuse the passions and faculties of the human mind and body. The multitude live merely to gratify the baser desires, instead of cultivating the higher; but they act in accord with their gross organism, and we cannot well expect anything better. Improvement is a child of slow growth, and the most effectual way to improve the human race is to commence with generation itself. No one desires to bring into the world children of evil tendencies, but few know how to prevent it. Neither our medical nor our spiritual advisers give us any instruction on this subject—the former because it is not for their pecuniary interest, and the latter because they are too busy talking about the bugbear they call sin to say anything of the cause of sin; and without knowing the cause how can we effect a cure? Children must be properly begotten, properly gestated, and properly reared. If the two former are attended to the latter will be an easy task. If the mother (with the kind and considerate aid of the father) during the period of gestation could keep her mind on subjects of a refining and elevating tendency, could have beautiful and agreeable surroundings, and live in an atmosphere of peace and justice, her children would be of a higher type than herself, and the race would gradually improve—thus, in fact, it is improving in spite of all untoward circumstances in which the majority of children are born. If parents could be made to realize the importance of living aright themselves, and of endeavoring to lay the foundation of all that is good, as an inheritance for their children, it would not take long to reform the world. Even without any radical reform of parents, but merely a reform in the conditions preceding birth, we might have in a few generations a greatly improved race; and eventually there would be no need for prisons, jails, asylums for the insane, etc., for there would be neither criminals nor crazy people. We would want no physicians for soul or body; no lawyers, no courts; but man would be just to himself and to his fellow-man. This is the true road to salvation.

At a late meeting of the State Executive Committee of Iowa, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

Resolved, That we, the Executive Committee of the Iowa Women Suffrage Society, have heard with profound regret that the Hon. John P. West, of the eleventh Senatorial district, has resigned his office of State Senator, and that he intends removing from this State to Santa Barbara, California. Our most earnest thanks are hereby tendered him for his zealous advocacy of woman's franchise, and for the high position he has taken on all the vital questions of the day; and we hope that prosperity and happiness, and an undiminished influence for good, may attend him in his new home, and that the place he vacated here may be worthily filled by his successor.

PROF. CROOKES' EVIDENCE.

Although much has been published concerning the experience of William Crookes, F. R. S., the following will be new to many of our readers. We copy from Prof. Crookes' account as given by him in part third, of his "Researches in the Phenomena of Spiritualism." Speaking of a seance at Hackney, he says:

"Katie never appeared to greater perfection, and for nearly two hours she walked about the room conversing familiarly with those present. On several occasions she took my arm while walking, and the impression conveyed to my mind that it was a living woman by my side, instead of a visitor from the other world, was so strong that the temptation to repeat a recent celebrated experiment became almost irresistible. Feeling, however, that if I had not a spirit, I had at all events a lady close to me, I asked her permission to clasp her in my arms, so as to be able to verify the interesting observations which a bold experimentalist has recently somewhat verbosely recorded. Permission was graciously given, and I accordingly did—well as gentleman would do under the circumstances. Mr. Volckman will be pleased to know that I can corroborate his statement that the "ghost" (not "struggling," however,) was as material a being as Miss Cook herself. But the sequel shows how wrong it is for an experimentalist, however accurate his observations may be, to venture to draw an important conclusion from an insufficient amount of evidence.

Katie now said she thought she should be able this time to show herself and Miss Cook together. I was to turn the gas out and then come with my phosphorus lamp into the room now used as a cabinet. This I did, having previously asked a friend who was skillful at shorthand to take down any statement I might make when in the cabinet, knowing the importance attaching to first impressions, and not wishing to leave more to memory than necessary. His notes are now before me.

I went cautiously into the room, it being dark, and felt about for Miss Cook. I found her crouching on the floor. Kneeling down, I let air enter the lamp, and by its light I saw the young lady dressed in black velvet, as she had been in the early part of the evening, and to all appearance perfectly senseless; she did not move when I took her hand and held the light quite close to her face, but continued quietly breathing. Raising the lamp, I looked around and saw Katie standing close behind Miss Cook. She was robed in flowing white drapery as we had seen her previously during the seance. Holding one of Miss Cook's hands in mine, and still kneeling, I passed the lamp up and down so as to illumine Katie's whole figure and satisfy myself thoroughly that I was really looking at the veritable Katie whom I had clasped in my arms a few minutes before, and not at the phantasm of a disordered brain. She did not speak, but moved her head and smiled in recognition. Three separate times did I carefully examine Miss Cook crouching before me, to be sure that the hand I held was that of a living woman; and three separate times did I turn the lamp to Katie and examine her with steadfast scrutiny until I had no doubt whatever of her objective reality. At last Miss Cook moved slightly, and Katie instantly motioned me to go away. I went to another part of the cabinet and then ceased to see Katie, but did not leave the room till Miss Cook woke up, and two of the visitors came in with a light.

Before concluding this article I wish to give some of the points of difference which I have observed between Miss Cook and Katie. Katie's height varies; in my house I have seen her six inches taller than Miss Cook. Last night, with bare feet and not "tip-toeing," she was four and a half inches taller than Miss Cook. Katie's neck was bare last night; the skin was perfectly smooth both to touch and sight, whilst on Miss Cook's neck is a large blister, which under similar circumstances is distinctly visible and rough to the touch. Katie's ears are unpierced, whilst Miss Cook habitually wears earrings. Katie's complexion is very fair, while that of Miss Cook is very dark. Katie's fingers are much longer than Miss Cook's, and her face is also larger. In manners and ways of expression there are also many decided differences.

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.

A writer in the Boston Globe, in view of the recent convention at Columbus, Ohio, in favor of inserting a recognition of God in the Federal Constitution, says:—

"Much stress is laid upon the fact that most of the State Constitutions contain a clause recognizing Deity, that our people are a Christian people, and that to be consistent therewith the National Constitution should contain a like clause. We cannot deny that most of the States, perhaps all, have such provisions. What then? Has the practice under these provisions been worthy of imitation? Look at the examples in the Massachusetts Colonies. Their charters, whether by James, William and Mary, George, or whoever else, were always 'By the grace of God,' and as 'Defenders of the Faith.' The renowned 'compact' was signed on board the Mayflower, 'In the name of God, amen!' It acknowledged 'King James by the grace of God,' and was signed 'In the presence of God and one another, for the glory of God and advancement of the Christian faith.' Both of these colonies were abundantly provided with fundamental recognitions of Deity. They came and found 'what they sought, freedom to worship God.' In less than forty years from that time, both of these passed laws for whipping, fining, and otherwise persecuting the entire sect to which the world renowned poet Whittier belongs as 'a cursed set of heretics.' The 'Massachusetts statue' provided that they—

"Be stripped naked from the middle upwards, and tied to a cart's tail, and whipped through the town, and from thence immediately conveyed to the constable of the next town, and so from constable to constable till they be conveyed through any of the outwardmost towns of our jurisdiction."

In the Massachusetts colony, provision was made for punishing Atheists, "by imprisonment, by whipping, or boring through the tongue with a red hot iron," carrying out with a vengeance the idea of Dr. Cummings to treat them as a scourge and a curse.

Prof. Proctor writes that the sale of the American Cyclopædia, which has now reached 30,000, "is simply amazing. I wonder when anything like a sale will be obtained for a work of that kind in England. That is the aspect on which the matter strikes me most. There must be in America at least three times as great a proportion of reading and thinking men to the entire population as there is in England."

DR. R. P. FELLOW, THE GREAT HEALER.—This distinguished Magnetic Physician has been before the public for many years, during which time he has performed the most astonishing cures recorded in the history of healing. He is now permanently located at Vineland, N. J., where he is devoting himself to healing the sick in every State in the Union by his Magnetized Powders. The cures that are being performed by the powder speak volumes in its favor. It can be procured of the Doctor at $1 per box, or $5 for six boxes.

HOW TO MAKE MARRIAGE BEAUTIFUL.—In the first place, let people defer to laws of health, of sanity, of hereditary soundness; let them obey restrictions, consult wholesome seasons, respect the limits which have been set up by the common sense of nature. Mutual ignorance on these points is filling marriage with unnecessary evils; they not only spoil the physical well-being of a family, but spoil its disposition. Let the work in every house be reduced by a reduction of its ambitions, till all the parlors, all the tables, all the clothes, exactly represent the current condition of every family; not a bracket nor a ribbon for exaggeration; not a single room for parade; neither sewing, washing, eating, scouring, company-giving, beyond actual needs, and all done by the least elaborate methods. Then, in the second place, reduce to the lowest possible point the disturbances which arise from ignorance and vanity, from artificial training; you simply liberate marriage for the more effective discharge of its spiritual purpose. The men and women might still suspect that they were all mated till life itself pronounced the bans. Teach children that marriage only prolongs their school hours into the dignity of sterner discipline and less perishable attainments. Warn them against the physical errors which so sap the will that it is humbled and enslaved by annoyances which health and freshness laugh at. And teach them simplicity; make vulgar habits and ambitions appear odious to them, ply their imaginations with austere and spiritual beauty, whose service makes them truly free. Then they will be better prepared to discover that marriage withholds felicity until it has been learned.—John Weiss in Old and New.

Poor men are excellent people to purchase stocks; in fact, they are a necessity to the stock-gambler, for without them stock-swindling would be at an end and our mining millionaires would be compelled to pay their own assessments for the working of their own mines; poor men, as patrons of the brokers, are like cows—easy to drive and easy to milk, and content to labor industriously in order that they may give down when corralled by a stock corner.—Chronicle.

We can ascribe the introduction of bronze manufacture into Europe to a great race immigrant from Asia some 6,000 years ago, called Aryas or Aryans. And this Bronze Age reaches to and overlaps the beginning of the historic period in some countries, and so includes the great epochs of the Assyrian and Egyptian Empires (a. c. circa 1500), and the earlier eras of the next succeeding Age of Iron.—PROF. A. MUELLER, in Popular Science Monthly for May.

A TRIBUTE TO BRET HARTE.

BY WILLIAM BRUFON.

We bring thee flowers from vale and hill,
 Tho' wild and void of garden care,
 Pacific flowers thou lovest still,
 In Eastern clime for thee to wear.
 The Miners rough thy heart did see,
 With Christ-like force and loving ken,
 Their praise so sweet thy praise shall be,
 And write thy love for fellow-men!

No nobler task was ope to thee
 Than praising long neglected ore,
 Hoath trodden sand thy eye could see,
 The gold for which we all explore.
 'Tis time the poet saw like God,
 That knows for none the least disdain;
 And loves as doth the verdant sod,
 That Rose and Thistle will maintain!

Go East or come to us once more,
 We care not so thy Seal is true,
 Be here or list the Atlantic roar,
 We never now can say "Adieu!"
 Or Truthful James or poet speak,
 Yet still we own the voice as ours,
 And with pure love for thee we seek,
 And twine for thee these garland flowers.

"THERE'S ROOM IN THE WORLD FOR ALL THAT IS IN IT."

BY H. CLAY FERRIS.

Men build up their worlds like poor, blinded moles,
 With just room enough for their own narrow souls.
 'Tis plain to their minds that black is not white,
 And there's only one line 'twixt the wrong and the right.
 Firmly believing their creeds to be true,
 They wonder that others don't think as they do.
 In the ages ago, they tortured each other,
 And forced down their creeds in the throat of a brother.
 They forgot, in mechanics, no two clocks will strike
 Throughout all the hours precisely alike;
 That our species, like clocks, are of different kinds,
 And mankind are fashioned with various minds.
 Ah! 'tis a great truth to learn—a prize, if you win it,—
 "There's room in the world for all that is in it."

This life is a play, where each human heart,
 To make the denouement, must act out its part.
 If all men, like sheep, should follow one way,
 Then life would, indeed, be a very poor play.
 'Tis the law of our being most pointedly shown,
 That each man must live out a life of his own.
 Ah! be not too rash to judge of another,
 But ever remember that man is your brother.
 God made the owl see, where man's sight is dim,
 And the light that guides you, may be darkness too to us.
 'Tis a great truth to learn—a prize if you win it,—
 "There's room in the world for all that is in it."

Our mission on earth is well understood:
 To root out the evil and cultivate good.
 Down, deep in the innermost depths of the soul,
 A voice ever sings of a far distant goal;
 And it whispers so soft, like a faint, muffled breath,
 There's something within us that's stronger than death!
 That souls are but sown in this hard, earthy clod,
 To blossom and bloom in the garden of God.
 Oh, brothers! there's only one God for us all,
 But his voice unto each makes a different call.
 Some see him in rags, as JESUS of old;
 Some mitred, and blessing in purple and gold.
 Ah! let us not proudly monopolize right,
 Nor demand of a brother to see with our sight.
 'Tis a great truth to learn—a prize if you win it,—
 "There's room in this world for all that is in it."

MAN AND WOMAN.—As a mother, a woman goes through the tragedy of giving birth to her son, watches over and cares for his helpless infancy, brings him through all the diseases incident to childhood, is his nurse, physician, seamstress, washerwoman, teacher, friend, and guide, spending the cream of her days to bring him up to be a voter with no provision in law for her own support in the meantime, with not so much as "I thank you." Then he leaves home and marries a wife, whom it took some other mother twenty-one years to raise, educate, and teach to cook his meals, to make and wash his clothes, to furnish him with a bed, and to fill the house with comforts, of which he has the larger share, at her own expense. And all this done for him up to this period of his life without any cost to himself. Then he votes to help make a law to disfranchise his wife and these two mothers, who have unitedly spent forty-two years of the prime of their days for his benefit, without any compensation. And then he makes another law to compel his wife to do all the same kind of drudgery which his mother had done, with the addition of giving birth to as many children as in his good pleasure he sees fit to force upon her. And all her earnings and the fruit of her labor are his, his wife being the third woman who spends her life to support him. It takes three, and sometimes four women to get a man through from the cradle to the grave, and sometimes a pretty busy time they have of it, too.—Woman's Journal.

Poor men make excellent voters; they swell the ranks of party processions and fill public halls on political occasions. They make good depositors at our savings banks, and their aggregate accumulations swell into millions, which, when properly handled, make the managers rich.—Chronicle.

THE WONDERFUL HEALER AND CLAIRVOYANT
MRS. C. M. MORRISON.

This celebrated Medium is the instrument or organism used by the invisibles for the benefit of humanity. The placing of her name before the public is by request of her Controlling Band. They, through her organism, treat all diseases and cure in every instance where the vital organs necessary to continue life are not destroyed. Mrs. Morrison is an

UNCONSCIOUS TRANCE MEDIUM, CLAIRVOYANT AND CLAIRAUDIENT.

From the very beginning, hers is marked as a most remarkable career of success, such as has seldom if ever fallen to the lot of any person. No disease seems too insidious to remove, nor patient too far gone to be restored.

Mrs. Morrison, becoming entranced, the lock of hair is submitted to her control. The diagnosis is given through her lips by the Band, and taken down by her Secretary. The original manuscript is sent to the Correspondent.

When Medicines are ordered, the case is submitted to Mrs. Morrison's Medical Band, who give a prescription suited to the case. Her Medical Band use vegetable remedies, (which they magnetize) combined with a scientific application of the magnetic healing power.

Diagnosing disease by lock of hair, $1.00. (Give age and sex.)

Signs of the Times.

It is proposed to hold a delegate convention of all the Liberal Leagues of the country at Philadelphia in 1876.

A bill has been introduced in the Tennessee Legislature to tax bachelors ten dollars a year, the money thus collected to become a part of the county school fund.

It is the opinion of The Newark Register that good mental habits, rather than the mere amount of instruction crammed into children's heads, are what is needed in our schools.

A Kentuckian has invented a street car, the motive power of which is compressed air, acting the same as steam upon an ordinary engine. The seats of the car are the air reservoirs.

The Chicago Tribune thinks things are serious, and that something ought to be done about it. "This is no time to hedge, and protest that we are not alarmists! We ought to be alarmists."

John Bright says it is ludicrous for the United States to invite foreign manufacturers to compete at the Centennial exhibition, when a protective tariff prevents them from competing in American markets.

Large standing armies are a direct cause of war. Europe is now in a state of peace, but there are over three millions of men under arms,—a standing menace to the lives, the property and the highest interests of the entire people.

The Truth Seeker states that the circulation of Beecher's paper, the Christian Union, has fallen from 125,000 to 24,000. It is not long since it was reported that the circulation had gone up to 200,000. Some difference in the two stories—nearly as much as in the testimony in the Tilton case.

A late official decree of a magistrate in Austria reads as follows: "Considering that the schoolmaster, N., applying for permission to marry, is possessed of no private fortune, and enjoys an income of only 431 florins a year, which would not suffice to sustain a family; and that his affianced bride has no more than 400 florins of private fortune, the legal license to marry can not be granted to said schoolmaster."

The Banner mentions as one of the cheering signs of the times the fact that numerous instances have recently occurred all over the country of the continuation of the husband's business by the widow. It shows that women is making material advance toward an independent position in society. The latest case is that of Mrs. C. F. Wells, widow of S. R. Wells, the phrenological and reform publisher.

Theodore Tilton waived all legal and personal objection to the testimony of Mrs. Tilton in the Beecher case, but Mr. Beecher's lawyers prevented the judge passing on the question of admitting her testimony, as they refused to offer her as a witness. Beecher, before the Committee and on the stand, charged her with thrusting her love on him—the cowardly wretch—and he was fearful she might say something that would show how it was that she had been "misled by the love of a good man."

In Massachusetts male teachers receive an average of $34 per month: female teachers $34.

The Boston News thinks that Massachusetts, which could not bury Charles Sumner nor repair the State House without extravagance, and corruption, would look well trying to run a thirty million railroad!

Poor men are obliged to pay interest on borrowed money, even though they never borrow a dollar! Interest forms a part of the present price of everything that is sold in stores, shops, groceries and markets.

Male convicts in our jails and prisons constantly receive letters and visits from their wives, but when a female convict receives a letter from her husband, the circumstance is mentioned as remarkable, it is so rare.

Fifty-five per cent of the total number of prisoners in our penitentiaries are under thirty years of age; less than 25 per cent. are married; the habit of intemperance is confessed by 75 per cent, and less than ten per cent are women.

Sixteen thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine persons were banished from Russia to Siberia between May and October last; 1,080 women and children over 15 years of age, with 1,269 young children, voluntarily accompanied the exiles.

The authorities of the city of Buffalo, N. Y., rejected the Catholic parochial school project on the ground that "common schools ought to be sustained exclusively for the tuition of children in the studies which are recognized as essential to a good business education."

At Mr. Bastian's seances in England recently the materialized spirit and the medium have several times walked out of the cabinet, hand in hand, the medium in a trance. Spirits have also repeatedly disappeared—"melted into thin air" in presence of the audience, and have reformed again, all in a good light.

A Baltimore lady, rich and pious, remained single until the age of forty, refusing many offers, because she had resolved to marry no man except a clergyman. Recently she married a poor but devout pastor of a little church, and the honey-moon was hardly over before he resigned his charge and set up as a broker with her money.

The workers are the ones who in the end pay all the interest on borrowed capital, and provide all the security. Let them borrow of and lend to each other, through a workingman's association; they would thereby save all the interest until the time comes when the absurd, wasteful and vicious system which compels the payment of interest is abolished.

John Jones, a man with an immortal soul, is practically a cog on the wheel of Mr. Shylock Money-bags. Jones is of no account to society or to himself, except so far as he helps to grind out Shylock's grist. Jones is a part of our system, and the system was established by the strong for the strong. Jones is not strong, and he never will be until he knows enough to combine with Smith and Brown.

RE-INCARNATION AND BUDDHISM.

BY DON FULANO.

It is the habit of too many of us to regard the Buddhists as ignorant and degraded heathens and idolators. We have for the most part acquired this vicious habit in early youth from heeding the accounts of missionaries, who are, as a class, the most ignorant and indolent of christian priests. It may be interesting to San Francisco Spiritualists to learn in what relation the most advanced beliefs of Spiritualism stand to the tenets of their Mongolian fellow-citizens, whom the hoodlums of their species are encouraged to stone and revile on every favorable opportunity.

The Spiritualists of the Continent of Europe, at whose head stood Allen Kardec, and, following in their steps, those of the Eastern States, tell us that they have received from exalted spirits a doctrine quite new to Christendom, but as old as the hills to old Oriental Nations, which, as far as the evidently yet imperfect teachings have gone, seems to be this: That some of those now living on earth have passed through this earth-life, with all its vicissitudes and sorrows, before—sometimes more than once; that those persons who are most successful and happy in their conditions and relations here, are those whose spirits are now incarnated for the first time, having therefore no sins committed in a past existence to be atoned for; whilst less fortunate and successful individuals are for the most part those who are thus atoning by their present sufferings for the crimes of a former life. Those who hold this faith believe that at death the spirit will either pass into a world of greater sorrow, pain and punishment than this, will be born into one of the heavens or happy spheres, or may, after a shorter or longer stay in a disembodied condition, be re-incarnated or born again into this earth-life, its destination being in every case determined by its relative moral excellence. This is how I understand the statements of the most intelligent Re-incarnationists, whose numbers are, I would say in passing, very rapidly on the increase. Whether these statements of the spirits are true or false, it is undoubted that they are daily obtaining a more extended credence.

If the direct evidence of Prince Emile Wittgenstein, who is considered by those who know him to be the soul of honor—evidence obtained in a most remarkable manner through his cousin, the Countess of —, and published sometime since in COMMON SENSE—is of any value, then there are only two tenable theories as to its nature; and these apply equally to all the present remarkable phenomena of Spiritualism: Either the facts are as the spirits state them, or else these and all the other wonders of modern Spiritualism are, as the Catholics declare, of Satanic origin.

The difficulty about accepting the Catholic solution would seem to be the old difficulty, started by Christ, of Beelzebub being divided against himself, for either we have no faculty capable of judging between right and wrong at all, or we can hardly conceive anything more Satanic, i. e. more utterly evil, than the character and the attributes of the God of the Jews and Christians, or the histories of the religions which have sprung from a belief in him. So long then as we are constituted thus, unless our whole moral nature—the voice within each of us—is a cheat, a delusion and a snare, the balance of evidence would seem to lie in favor of the spirits.

Now the Re-incarnationists, with Allen Kardec and the Banner of Light at their head, have given us this information about the conditions of human existence as something altogether new and strange and excellent, a distillation of the highest knowledge from the highest spheres. Alas, alas, there is nothing new under the sun! More than five hundred years before the birth of Christ Buddha preached just this doctrine of Re-incarnation to his disciples, with this difference: He taught that everything that exists is born from, or exists because of, something that existed previously; but that we can have no knowledge of the starting point of any thing. Trees are produced from seeds, birds from eggs; but the origin of this sequence is involved in obscurity. Again, Buddha taught that the being that is born into another state in consequence of the death of any living creature is not that same being, any more than the flame of a lamp, transferred to another wick, is the same flame as the first; but it exists because of it, and is endowed with its qualities of good or evil. Buddha was fond of illustrating this idea by the analogy of seeds sown, much as the Apostle Paul did. Buddha would have said of a man on earth that he might regard himself as a sentient being, now existent in the world of men; but that he has existed in a similar manner in many myriads of previous births, and may have passed through all possible states of being, from the highest to the lowest, and some of them repeatedly; that he is now under the influence of all that he has ever done in all these ages. This is his karma, the arbiter of his destiny. Until he attain nirwana he must still continue to pass through these sequences of existence; but the states of being—animal, devil, ghost, angel or man—into which he may pass as duration rolls on, he cannot conjecture. All the future is shrouded in impenetrable darkness. Only through the stern practice of virtue—the rules of which he prescribes with a minuteness of ethical discrimination utterly unknown to any other religious teacher—can he at length free himself from the influence of karma, or acquired destiny, by attaining nirwana, where his spirit, its selfhood forever utterly extinguished, shall rest eternally in a state of peaceful and conscious bliss.

The Buddhists now-a-days are themselves divided as to the exact condition of souls in nirwana, and all missionaries and opponents of Buddhism delight to charge Buddha with having preached absolute and utter extinction as the only and best reward for the highest attainable virtue.

M. St. Hilaire, one of the most intelligent of the Christian writers on the religion of Buddha, actually bases one of his heaviest attacks upon the system on this: That Buddha taught the practice of virtue for a reward, and although, as he states, that reward is nothing, the principle is no less vicious. I should like to ask M. St. Hilaire what other inducement Christ offered for the practice of virtue but the hope of "treasure laid up in heaven," whatever that may be. What Buddha, in point of fact, offered to the virtuous man was, it is true, a reward which probably would not much tempt the average Christian. No promises of bliss unutterable accompany his descriptions of nirwana; for when that goal of all the saint's brightest hopes; that high reward of all his self-denial is at length reached, the purified spirit is forever dead to concupiscence and desire of every kind; the selfhood is extinct. Absolute rest and peace, and that state of mind which feels a good or an evil to another to be as great a good or as great an evil as if to itself, is all that it offers.

Those minds which cannot perceive the blessedness of the extinction of the selfhood in a state of conscious existence, naturally fail to understand Buddha's language about nirwana. But is it conceivable that Buddha, whose ethics and ontology are "throughout wonderfully wise and consistent, after describing twenty-six spheres or worlds of ever-increasing bliss, through the countless ages of all of which the good man might pass long-drawn-out lives of intense mental and sensuous—not sensual—enjoyment, should then crown the whole with the offer of utter extinction at once to those who best follow his precepts and attain the highest meed of virtue? Besides, Buddha himself is spoken of in the legends of all Buddhist lands as having attained nirwana before his physical death; and again, as having felt and acted after he had passed away into nirwana. But none are so blind as those who will not see!

A conscious existence after an extinction of the self must be a state of being of which we can form no conception with our present powers and experiences. It cannot be a state of sensuous enjoyment. It is probably utterly indescribable in human language. It does not by any means follow that it cannot be, that it does not exist, or that it is not the most blissful of all possible conditions. But surely, of all possible rewards offered for virtue, it is the one least open to any objection, since its desirableness is so inconceivable to any but the highest and most virtuous minds, that to the vicious it seems no reward at all.

To return to my subject: A late writer in COMMON SENSE, relating his conversation with "a very exalted spirit" on the subject of Re-incarnation, represents it as saying that "beings do not remember, save in rare glimpses, any of the events of their past existences till they have attained a certain eminence, an exalted sphere; then the memory of all their experiences comes back to them for their instruction and guidance. So Buddha teaches, that only on the attainment of an eminent degree of sanctity, by the practice of virtue and the observance of good precepts, can this memory of past existences be obtained. He frequently relates his own experiences and those of others present, in former births, for the instruction of his disciples, showing the influence of past crimes on their karma, or destiny.

NORM.—I have spoken above of Protestant Christian missionaries as being, with a few bright exceptions, the most ignorant and idle priesthood in Christendom. This seems a hard thing to say. It does not in the least apply to Roman Catholic missionaries, who are, for the most part, simple-hearted, earnest, self-denying and well-informed men. To show that I am not talking wildly, let me relate one instance out of many which have given me the above impression: On first settling in Kandy, the mountain capital of Ceylon, the site of the Molagawa Delada or Temple of the Sacred Tooth, and the head-quarters of the Buddhist priesthood, wishing to engage one of the most learned of the Kandian priests to teach me Pali, the language of the sacred books, I called, first of all, upon the Episcopal missionary there—a good old man, who, for more than twenty years, had been engaged in the attempt to convert the Kandians, and who preached weekly in Olingalee to a few native Christians. After introducing myself I told him my object, and as he was well acquainted with all the priests, I begged him to inform me whom I should best apply to, and which of the sacred books it were best to read. Looking at me hard, and speaking in an abrupt and disgusted tone, he inquired: "What do you want to learn Pali for?" I answered that I desired to examine the Buddhist sacred books for myself. "Oh," he replied, "that is not worth your while at all; I assure you they contain nothing worthy of anyone's attention; a mere collection of obscene and foolish tales." I returned, "You of course know Pali yourself?" "No," he replied; "I never thought it worth while to learn it." "You have then had these books translated to you?" "No; but I have a good general knowledge of their nature and contents." I took up my hat and bowed myself out, intimating that I would prefer to judge the matter for myself.

DON FULANO.

The wife of Thomas Grennan, of Vallejo, last week dreamed that she was about to die, and that two physicians of her acquaintance attended her. She told her husband, who laughed the matter off, but in two days after she was taken suddenly ill, was attended by the two physicians, and died, as she had dreamed she would.

A neatly printed pamphlet of twenty-four pages has been published by Walter Hyde, consisting of prose and verse, which purports to tell "How to keep sharp in dull times." It treats on the connection of the soul and body, temperance, morality, etc. The author announces that he has in preparation a volume on the "Philosophy of Healing by the Laying on of Hands." *

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Dr. Pilkington writes for COMMON SENSE a lengthy letter, from which the following extracts are made:

The greatest opposition to the Chinese arises from the Irish Catholics, with whom it seems useless to reason. By the ring system the Irish already monopolize more than a fair portion of the labor to be performed; but could they prevent the labor of Chinese they could not themselves perform it all, and it would be an impossibility to bear their insolence, the females no less than the males. Prejudice against the Chinese is not confined to the Irish alone, but seems to prevail in proportion to the ignorance of the masses, and to some extent, amongst a more intelligent portion, some of whom take the ground that this country belongs to the white man alone, supposing that because they are whiter than some of their neighbors, this entitles them to a preference, merit or no merit. They say their families must starve if they cannot drive out the Coolies; and hence an Anti-Coolie Association is to be gotten up for self protection, as they suppose. This class do not seem to be aware that the Catholic element, if there were no Chinese, would be more detrimental by far than the Chinese themselves. The Chinese are peaceable, plotting no evil to other parties so long as let alone. Witness, on the contrary, the determined effort in New York City to prevent a peaceable procession of Orangemen. This same spirit prevails everywhere among this class. The Anti-Coolie men would not do much of the labor that the Chinese do if there were not a Chinaman in the country. The Chinese go into the mountains, buy up mining claims worked through by the white man, and re-work them. This, in all probability, would otherwise remain undone. They go about the streets and pick up what no white man will condescend to do, and so much is saved which otherwise might rot and become a source of disease. Our paper manufacturers might have to hunt up other means to obtain their material, while many families, now regularly supplied with fresh vegetables at their doors, would use far less of this wholesome food, if obliged to go to the market for it. Their presence in California has made possible the establishment of manufactories, which could not have come into existence had not a cheap labor, to mingle with the more expensive mechanical and artistic labor, been introduced. These home manufactories save much money that would otherwise be taken away from the country for imported goods. It also gives a great deal of labor to white men which could not be maintained here but for the Chinese intermingling labor. Our woolen goods, bagging, shoes, slippers, clothing, cigars and many other things they have a hand in, were formerly imported; and the material of which many of these are manufactured is produced here. Were the Chinese sent from the country it would be a calamity, and many of the ignorant dissatisfied might have to follow suit for want of employment, being now employed in consequence of having a mixture of cheap labor, which enables the manufacturer to compete with other countries.

It is said the Chinese send a great deal of money away from the country. Well, as to this, how is it with the Irish, the French, the German, the English? How much is annually sent to these countries? What has become of the millions of California gold? It has not all gone to China? It is true the Chinaman don't drink at saloons; hence don't spend much of his earnings in this way, though he does his portion in the role of intemperance by the use of tobacco and opium.

If your white men would use the money they spend at saloons, in supporting lyceums, debating associations, a good library, and the like, for the sake of informing themselves, they might soon have the intelligence necessary to make wise laws, and could send men of their own class to legislative halls, instead of scheming lawyers and dishonest politicians.

The Chinaman is peaceable; he minds his own business and does not attempt to force his religion or politics on any one, as does his persecutor, the Irish Catholic. Chinamen, far more than white men, are a communistic and co-operative class of men, as demonstrated in California. They eat generally on the co-operative plan, which is more economical than the ordinary method. Co-operation is a coming question of the future, and will prove a great furtherance to independence. To some extent the Chinese do business on the same principle. A Chinese fishing company near Belmont, the other day, caught 8,000 lbs., including salmon and young shark, which they dry and export to China. Here is an example.

The course pursued by this class of Anti-Coolley men is not in accordance with the genius of American institutions; and more than all it is contrary to destiny. To oppose destiny is to stand before the car-wheels of progress of this age. The car of progress must advance, and those who will not turn and follow in the wake must fall beneath the wheels.

LIBERTY IN AMERICA.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE:—That person is rich whose wants are supplied and whose health is good. Little else is required. Superfluities and gew-gaws discarded, the labor to supply the wants of every person can be done by the devotion of from four to six hours per day to any productive occupation. The first consideration is health. This may be enjoyed in what are called very unhealthy and disagreeable climates if the laws of life are heeded. These laws, although founded upon a science the alphabet of which is hardly complete, are sufficiently understood by the few to soon distribute that knowledge to all, if social arrangements were favorable to such distribution. More effort is expended in the direction of suppression than distribution, and so long as the few who possess the knowledge and ability are affected by ethical strabismus, there will be difficulties in the way of the general acquirement of this knowledge by the masses.

Public journalists generally counsel the conservation of the public peace, simply because their interests are also conserved for the time being; and all the great public journals are supported, not by their nominal subscribers and advertising patronage only, but by subsidiary means, in part, furnished by those whose grists of opinion they grind out. Now, it is plain and fair to suppose that these so-called respectable journals have weight, and when they—bound together by certain interests in common—hurl their anathemas against an innovation, it simply means that they, as a big watch-dog chained to the master's kennel, are bound to howl when meddlesome freemen come about disturbing the domain.

True liberty is a luxury or rarity which few know the flavor of, and probably still less in number would fully appreciate, if within their grasp. Probably this is why so few possess it. Liberty, in its truest and best sense, is fit for Gods and Angels, and as those are not plentiful on earth, liberty finds few patrons. It has been a life-work to endeavor to induce those we could influence to live such lives as are necessary to nurture this rare gift. Thus far the only remuneration has been the anathemas of tyrants and their adherents, who form the governing classes throughout the so-called civilized nations. Unquestionably a modicum of liberty is the birth-right of every living being, but it is as unquestionably surrendered for less than a "mess of pottage" in the great majority of cases. Those who surrender and those who avail themselves of the advantage of such surrender, are reprehensible, but not in a like degree, for the former are generally the weaker vessels.

That the world moves is proven by the greater number who participate in the fruits of spoilation. Formerly the monarch alone enjoyed those fruits; now they are divided, and the larger the number that divide the spoil, the more liberal the government, nominally, but it is a serious question if the monarchical spoilation was not the more favorable for the masses, as then there was but one royal horde to sustain; now there are many. In this respect no government on earth excels that of the United States of America. Spoilation is organized, and the last drop that it is possible to extract is expressed from the toiling million in the way of plunder. The acme of spoilation has been reached by this government and people. The fairest field and no favors to any but spoilers; they have made common cause, and of course swept the board in this country. This "land of liberty,"—"the home of the free,"—has capped the climax in the science of spoilation. The figures prove it. There is no country on earth where it is possible to sustain the number of sinecures that find royal harvest here. What does this prove? Either that the people are wanting in native COMMON SENSE, or that they are most forbearing and good-hearted. Take either explanation you choose. As the former is the least flattering of the reasons given for the supine subservience of Americans, we naturally reject it. One thing, however, is notorious: We are poorer in bodily health than any other known people. Possibly this accounts in part for the readiness with which we submit to be fleeced—the temper being so effectually drawn from the human steel as to render it altogether pliable. This process is effected by excesses of all kinds. There are no people who drink deeper or more fiery liquids, chew more deleterious substances, or inhale fumes more devitalizing.

WORDS OF WARNING.

FROM A WORKINGMAN.

Workingmen should carefully study the political and social condition of the industrial classes of all countries—the machinery used to keep us in bondage. We should study every move made by capitalists through their agents in the Congress of this country. There never was a time in the history of this country when the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution were so jeopardized as they are now. I hope you read the bill emanating from a caucus of Republicans at Washington during the last session, to suspend the habeas corpus, and give the power to President Grant to arrest any person he pleased. I was at the time surprised that the people were so quiet, and that meetings were not held all over the country, denouncing the acts of that caucus in proposing such an atrocious measure. What a low estimate they must have of the voters of this country! It shows that there is a strong party which contemplates establishing despotism. They know they have the support of the capitalists, all over the civilized world, and the support of all Monarchies. To many it will hardly appear possible that such a scheme could find sanction in our Republic. What is the cause? They perceive the premonitions of a true organization of the working classes all over the civilized world. The strikes, workingmen's trade societies, workingmen's papers, co-operation of the trades of England and America, and especially the International movement, the example of the Granges, the Republican feeling in France, and the spread of Republicanism in all parts of the continent of Europe, warn the holders of capital, and they will forestall the movement by a premature revolution or a general war. What are the leaders of the Trade Societies about? The habeas corpus act is the only protection that under the present system secures individual liberty. Destroy that and our tongues will be closed; there will be no semblance of a free press; no assembling of the people to debate or discuss their grievances; a dreadful pall will hang over the nation; the down-trodden in Europe will give up all hope when they learn that in the great Republic of America liberty is destroyed.

This act of the Republicans is a demonstration of what the immediate future will be if the people do not arouse themselves from their lethargy.

The machinery used to deprive our class of the fruits of our industry and the means of existence is so complicated that we must not be surprised at the ignorance of the masses. Men in Congress see the condition of the country, and attribute the terrible condition of the masses to the imperfect financial system. They lament the drain of gold that goes to Europe to pay the interest on the national debt. They show that the members of Congress conspired with the Bullionists of Europe, when greenbacks were issued, not to make them payable for all debts, duties or revenues, thereby giving the possessors of gold the power over this country; and now the new financial scheme passed by Congress to redeem greenbacks and resume specie payments is inoperative. The revenue is diminishing; greenbacks do not flow into the treasury. The Bullionists desire to force another loan upon the Government, and so depress the producing power of the country that it will give other nations the mercantile and manufacturing prepondering power. See what a fight is going on between England, France and other continental countries for the possession of gold. The Bank of England has had to raise the rate of discount to prevent the drain of gold. France, or the financiers, have obtained the possession of the new gold coins issued by Prussia, and melted them into bars. What the French lost in war they have recovered by financial maneuvering.

Some men will say we ought not to trouble about the money question. It goes to prove that there is not only a conflict between capital and labor, but a terrible conflict between nations, and also a conflict between the manufacturer, merchant and usurer of different nations. The Rothschilds at one time held the supremacy over different nations; now it is divided. In the midst of this conflict, this battle between the various monetary, manufacturing, mercantile, stock-jobbing and profit-mongering brigands, the producing classes are starving.

The competition between the working classes is severe. Hitherto it was confined to the whites; now it is between blacks, whites, and the new element from Asia.

The following are a few of the changes that must ere long take place: The people must vote on all laws. Cost must be the limit of price. Productions must be exchanged value for value. Credit must be given to the unemployed to set them to work as colonists upon the land, and at occupations that they are adapted to. A union with our brethren in Europe must be established. Money must be a medium of exchange only. As all the people will be producers, or aids in exchanging produce upon equity, there will be no difficulty. As a general rule that is the manner of estimating values now excepting the interest demanded by the money-lender, and the profits the middlemen and the manufacturer and merchant put on. In the new social system there will be no middle-men; exchangers or clerks will be paid full value for their labor, or have a share in the business. Business is carried on at the Workingmen's Palace, at Guise, France, on the co-operative plan, and is a success.

The time has come when the working classes must reconstruct society. The old system is worn threadbare. Great intellects will soon come forward to instruct the masses. Nature always brings men to the surface when they are needed.

What is gained by philosophy? A capacity of conversing, without embarrassment, with all classes of men; the courage to exercise our right of speaking the truth to all the world.

So long as one man will pay more for the same article than another, at the same time, there can be no such thing as an absolute and exact value. If there is no absolute and exact value, there can be no measure of value.

COMMON SENSE is furnished to subscribers for Three Dollars per annum, in advance. To save trouble to subscribers in various localities, friends will receive and forward subscriptions, as follows: C. WILLIAM N. SLOCUM, EDITOR.

AMANDA M. SLOCUM, ASSISTANT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAY. 29, 1875.

Mrs. P. W. Stephens, trance speaker, of California, is located for a year in Virginia City, Nevada; can be addressed at that place.

There is behind even the most cheerless and unlovely life some truer and higher ideal to which the mind clings, and which constitutes the real, deliberately-chosen life of the individual.

It is the Spiritual Scientist, not the Graphic, that is to be furnished, by Col. Olcott, with accounts of the wonderful manifestations now going on at the house of a gentleman in New York. All the manifestations occur in the light, and without a cabinet.

J. L. YORK.—By a letter received from Brother York (too late for publication this week) we learn that he spoke in San Jose on the 22d, will be there again to-morrow, and on the 5th of June leaves for Oregon. He will probably be in San Francisco next Thursday or Friday.

THE OVERLAND for June is in the main a good number. It contains articles by John Muir, Charles Warren Stoddard, Frances Fuller Victor, Edward R. Sill, Ina D. Coolbrith, B. P. Avery, Joaquin Miller, Dr. Stillman, Lauren E. Crane and others.

SPIRITUALISTS' UNION.—The annual meeting of this Society is to be held in Charter Oak Hall this (Saturday) evening May 29, for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year. Let there be a full attendance. The Society have engaged Charter Oak Hall for its regular meetings, after June 1st. The Children's Lyceum will also be held in Charter Oak, instead of at 911 Market street, as heretofore.

At a Business Meeting of the Spiritualists' Union, held on Sunday last, Mrs. Matthews presiding, the Constitution of the Society was so amended as to change the time of the Annual meetings from the last Sunday in May to the last Saturday in May, so as to comply with the State law. The motion was made by Mr. Ryder, according to previous notice, and was adopted unanimously.

LAKE TAHOE.—Any of our readers, sick or well, wishing to join Mrs. Dr. Tabor's family party for six, eight or ten weeks, at Lake Tahoe, starting about the 15th of June, should report immediately. Fishing, boating, rest, good food, straw beds, lots of fun. Expense of the round trip from Stockton, including railroad fare, $100 for six weeks. Camping and kitchen and bath house will be near Dr. Bournes. Address, with stamp for circular, Mrs. Dr. P. C. Tabor, Stockton, Cal.

POLITICAL PARTIES.

There is no denying the fact that the Republican party in California is virtually dead. This fact is not published in exultation, for the writer, who was an Abolitionist before the war, has acted with the Republicans since the organization of the party, in 1854, working for Fremont in '56, when to do so, in California, was to work against hope. The Republican party has been killed in the house of its friends. Success brought to its ranks nearly all the selfish unscrupulous politicians of the country; the war, with its big jobs still further demoralized it; Congress disappointed the people, and the Administration has disregarded their wishes.

The best thing the Republicans in California can do is to quietly disband. This is the only way they can defeat the Democrats, because any open union with the Independents would drive thousands of the latter into the Democratic ranks. But the present leaders of the Republican party in this State do not wish to defeat the Democracy. They are secret allies of that party. Under the circumstances it is difficult to determine which of the two live parties will have a majority. The people of California generally go in crowds, acting upon impulse instead of deliberate and individual judgment. Whoever has watched a flock of sheep jumping out of an inclosure has seen an illustration of the way in which the people of this State surmount a political difficulty. They look for the lowest bar in their course, and go for it with a rush. In the present case there are two gaps in the political fence; one leading into the Democratic fold, the other into the Independent, but which may attract the greater number will hardly be apparent until just before the leap is made. Neither of these parties are satisfactory to COMMON SENSE. We want a People's Party, formed by and acting for the the industrial classes. We have some hopes that the Independents will finally occupy this ground.

A SPIRITUAL MISSION.—Mrs. M. E. Beman, a well known medium of Oakland, left on Wednesday last for the East, "by direction of the spirits," she being assured that by so doing she can obtain means to assist her in establishing a "Spiritual Home," on her block in Oakland. Mrs. Beman is an excellent healing medium, a good clairvoyant, and a most estimable woman, but is very far advanced in life to make such a journey, although attended, as she says, by guardian spirits. She has had a large practice in California, and has performed some remarkable cures. Mr. and Mrs. Pearson, late of 1145 Mission street, will occupy Mrs. Beman's house during her absence, and will carry on her business. They were engaged also "by direction of the spirits," whose judgment in this respect is endorsed by COMMON SENSE.

A. F. Patten, Newsdealer, has moved from 773 Market to 600 Market street, North side fronting New Montgomery street. He sells spiritual, liberal and second hand books, pictorials, magazines, &c. Papers delivered free of postage.

THE SPIRITUAL SCIENTIST.

This is an excellent Spiritual journal—one worthy of the cordial support of Spiritualists; but its editor, in the issue of May 13, seems temporarily oblivious of the fact that there are more than three Spiritual journals in the United States. He says:

The Spiritual Scientist, the younger of the three, addresses itself more especially to that class of investigators who want no miscellaneous or extraneous matter mixed up with the one subject of Spiritualism. It aims to give the pith of the Spiritual news of the day, to avoid long-winded discussions, works of fiction, lengthy reports, &c., and to present, as far as possible, the purely scientific aspect of the great movement pregnant with such important results for the future. We believe there is a place for such a journal, and we hope there are many subscribers to both the other Spiritual weeklies, who, without dropping them, will find it not too heavy a tax to add to their list the Spiritual Scientist.

We hope so too, for the Scientist is, in some respects, the best of "the three;" but there is at least one other paper which is "purely Spiritual,"—the Spiritualist at Work,—and it is doing a grand good work, too. COMMON SENSE is a Spiritual journal; but it is also something else—something more than is included in the phenomenal or even the scientific phase of Spiritualism; and if the time ever comes that it cannot deal with the live questions vitally affecting the daily life of man, it will be content to die. We do not feel that it is our mission to deal in sweet-sounding nothings, while the world is full of misery, life a bitter struggle, and ignorance, injustice, folly and crime vie with each other for the ascendancy. Neither do we desire to devote our entire space to "scientific investigations" concerning the cause of an admitted fact.

The Medium, of London gives an account of a spiritual manifestation witnessed by T. P. Barkas, and others, the medium being a boy of seventeen, who was first stripped naked, redressed in other clothing, and then put into a small room entirely destitute of furniture. Two figures soon after appeared, both dressed in white, although the boy had no white clothing whatever on him. Mr. Barkas says: "The conclusion is, either the medium, when perfectly naked, has the power of concealing a large supply of white wearing apparel, or he has the power of producing white garments, or some invisible agent has that power, or I am his confederate." Mr. Barkas is a man of unimpeachable character. Such phenomena are of daily occurrence in Europe and America, yet, says the Scientist, "the world, the church, the secular press and the men of science (with here and there an exception) shut their eyes and their ears to the occurrences and to all the testimony in their behalf."

Many church people give one-tenth of their income to sustain the church. Many Spiritualists attend no Sabbath meeting, and give nothing whatever for the support of the cause. The Spiritual Scientist asks: "Does it never occur to such persons that a trifle contributed to the support of our Spiritual journals would be no more than what they ought freely to give?"

MRS. ADDIE BALLOU, whose health has much improved since her arrival in California, and who speaks with more than her former vigor and power, gave another lecture at 911 Market street, on Sunday evening last, her subject being "Evolution, or the Progress of Man." She commenced speaking of the processes by which Nature changes the face of the earth, by heat and cold, by sun, wind and rain—by convulsions and long periods of comparative rest, which is not rest, for nature never sleeps. Creation was not a miracle; all changes in forms are in accordance with law inherent in matter. Man has advanced from the lower to the higher, through immense periods of time. He is the representative of all that has preceded him. Some men resemble this animal, some that, as each took on more or less of the elements belonging to the lower forms of life. As man progressed from the purely animal condition he began to develop in regular order the higher faculties and a corresponding growth of brain. In primitive man, the animal propensities were predominant, then began the growth of the intellectual, then the moral, and lastly the spiritual. Notwithstanding the valleys into which man has descended in the journey of the life of the race, there is a gradual rising on higher ground in the scale of existence, and the advance still goes on, giving hope of a glorious future for the race. Mrs. Ballou will speak in the same hall again to-morrow evening. Her subject is not announced.

Chas. H. Brown, who formerly commanded the clipper ship Whistler, relates that, in 1853, he obtained from a medium in Boston a communication purporting to be from a sailor who had fallen overboard from the ship Wild Rover, while at sea, a short time previous. The man was a stranger both to Mr. Brown and the medium, the ship was a thousand miles off on the Atlantic, and no mind reading, unconscious cerebration or odic force could account for the message, which proved true in every particular, and Capt. Sears, of the Wild Rover, when questioned, stated that at the time the message was given no vessel had been spoken at sea, and there was no known means by which the information could have been obtained.

The "corner grocery" is an established institution in San Francisco. There is at least one for every fifty families. If five hundred families would co-operate to purchase from one grocer, they would save the rent of nine stores, the labor of at least twice nine persons, to say nothing of nine errand boys or delivery wagons. By such a combination a very large percentage of the cost of groceries could be saved. If only ten per cent could be saved, the five hundred families, spending an average of $5 per week, or a total of $2,500, would save $1,300 per annum, but the truth is, a great deal more than this would be saved, as most small grocers manage to make from 50 to 100 per cent on all except staple articles.

The Religio Philosophical Journal has taken possession of its new publishing house, near the Postoffice, Chicago. It is a fine edifice, and the principal proprietor, S. S. Jones, appears to be prospering. Good. The Journal is not just what it should be, but it is doing a good work in its way.

WHAT IS SPIRITUALISM?

The Religio Philosophical Journal publishes a letter from R. B. Hall, of Oakland, which we divide into paragraphs for comment. Mr. Hall says:

Spiritualism is a knowledge of man's immortality. It teaches, first, that man lives beyond the grave, an intelligent, rational personality; second, that he has the power to, and does communicate under certain conditions, with persons of earth-life. This is my idea of what Spiritualism is, and all those who subscribe to these facts are Spiritualists, whether they like to be called so or not. Spiritualism can mean nothing more nor less.

This definition of spiritualism makes three fourths of the intelligent people of the world spiritualists, no matter how much they may deride the principles which are the distinguishing features of true Spiritualism. Three-fourths of the intelligent people of America know that much evil results from the usual hap-hazard and purely sensual conditions under which the race is propagated, yet nine tenths of this number scout at the very name of stirpiculture. Mr. Hall might with as much propriety call all these people stirpiculturists, as to call all believers in spirit communion spiritualists. Mr. Hall proceeds:

Under this definition Spiritualism is not, nor can it be held responsible for the vagaries and nonsense of shallow pated fanatics, nor for the whoredoms of lustful freelovers.

It is with some hesitation that language like this is admitted to the columns of COMMON SENSE. It is a temporary letting down of the paper to the level of the lewd stories which make up the staple of the Old Testament, and it is not indicative of a pure mind in any one who descends to the use of such terms. So long as friend Hall lives a pure and spiritual life, he not trouble himself about the evil deeds of others, nor fear that he may be held responsible for their sins. Mr. Hall continues:

I have never been able to understand how a knowledge of the fact of spirit-communion can make men worse than they naturally are; to be confident that your dear spirit-father, mother, brother, sister, daughter, son or friend can commune with you, and are about you, will have anything but a demoralizing tendency; and this is Spiritualism. The fact of their immortality, and power to communicate, is one thing, and what they do communicate is another. That they do communicate, we know, but their utterances may be true or false, foolish or wise. If the spirit is educated, and a high moral, loving soul, and the medium fully inspired, their communications will be of a high moral order, full of love and wisdom; but if the spirit is ignorant and unprogressed, and the medium on the same plane, then the utterances are the reverse. I am a reformer, but I hold each individual spirit, in and out of the flesh, responsible for their utterances, and refuse to believe that Spiritualism is answerable in any manner for what they may say.

This is all very well; but no intelligent Spiritualist thinks otherwise, and we were beginning to wonder why Mr. Hall should deem it necessary to assert these facts, when we found his letter to close as follows:

I have been led to these remarks by the mixed convention recently held in San Francisco, called the Anniversary of Spiritualism, where Spiritualism was declared to teach everything in the catalogue of reform. When Spiritual conventions are held, let them be Spiritual conventions; when Free-love conventions are held let them be Free-love conventions. These mixed or mongrel conventions are neither the one nor the other; nor can Spiritualism mix with Free-love any more than oil can with water. When Spiritualists become independent enough to call and to hold Spiritual conventions, leaving out all side issues, then thousands will come forward and acknowledge themselves believers, and take an active part in them, that now hide their heads and ignore the whole thing; and who can blame them?

This is an intimation that the subject of Free-love was discussed at the "mongrel convention," which is not true. Neither is it true that the convention was mongrel. The first day was devoted exclusively to Spiritualism. It was Anniversary Day, and the programme, as planned, was entirely appropriate. The second day was given up to Freethinkers—a celebration of the advance which has been made in religious freedom in consequence of the advent of modern Spiritualism. After this a series of Freethought meetings were held, lasting two weeks, but they had no connection with Spiritualism. They were intended as an antidote to Hammond's revivals, then in progress here, and were participated in by all classes of freethinkers and reformers. But even here the subject of Free-love was only once mentioned, and then by an impudent clergyman whose gross insults to his audience were condemned by nine-tenths of his listeners. Brother Hall never showed his face at any of these meetings; but on the basis of newspaper reports of Rev. Rexford's slanders he writes to the Religio, and denounces the meeting as a mongrel convention of Spiritualists and Free-lovers. We trust that before again rushing into print to the injury of the cause he professes to love, Brother Hall will take the trouble to inform himself.

Now a few words as to the intimation that Spiritualism does not "teach everything in the catalogue of reform." Spiritualism teaches that as we leave this life so shall we begin the other. It therefore necessarily follows that every reform here is an aid to happiness and progress here and hereafter, and that the sooner reforms begin, the better for our eternal welfare. Every true Spiritualist is a Reformer; and every fearless Reformer is willing to investigate any and every matter that has a bearing on our mode of life—for as a man lives so is he; and it is our duty to build up the best character which can be attained with the faculties with which we are endowed and under the circumstances by which we are surrounded. This is Spiritualism made practical, and without this it is a dead faith, barren of good results.

We do not admit that there is any such thing as "side issues." All issues which concern humanity are pertinent, if we wish to live the life Spiritualism teaches. If we do not desire to live true lives now, but seek to deceive ourselves with the idea that we can live a sham life here and a true life hereafter; that there are no duties here on which will depend our status hereafter; that our inharmonies and miseries here are to be fully compensated by the "glories of the angel world," then we may condemn "side issues," and spend our time in the contemplation of ghost stories and "messages from the summer land," while we flatter ourselves that "all that is wrong here will be made right there," instead of opening our eyes to the fact that all that is wrong here will have its counterpart there. This namby-pamby, wishy-washy Spiritualism, which has to be eternally fed on such watery pabulum as we generally get in highfalutin messages from the "spirit-land," is a sham, and there is as little sense in giving this counterfeit the title of Spiritualism as there would be in assuming that the dreams of childhood constitute the true philosophy of life, and that all beyond these childish dreams are "side-issues." Bah! No words can express our contempt for such Spiritualism.

LETTER FROM AN ENGLISH LECTURER.

EDITOR COMMON SENSE.—Dear Sir:—May I claim the courtesy of your insertion of a few words to my brethren on your side of this mighty continent in the columns of your wide-awake little journal? This to them, then, with a greeting earnest and sincere, and a lively hope that our scientific-philosophic religion is progressing satisfactorily in their midst:

Under the advice of my spirit-guides I left England last fall for a trip to this country. My career has borne out their prophecies. In all places where I have had the honor of appearing success has invariably attended me, and good service has been rendered for our cause. Intending originally to return in June, I have been obliged to defer my departure, owing to my success, until October. My intention is to return to this country though, in July of next year, 1876, spending the fall months in the East and then, if practicable, to run across the continent and visit the Golden State. This would be in January, 1877. If the Spiritualists of your section should desire my presence I shall be glad to hear from them concerning the matter, so that I can make the necessary arrangements, and avoid accepting too many Eastern calls. I am desirous of spending at least three months, and longer if possible, on your side. Naturally inquisitive, I am of course anxious to see a portion of this Republic that has become a household word at home, and without seeing which, a visit to America cannot be called complete.

Trusting that the banner of our cause may ever float freely in the Golden West, I am, dear sir, yours for Freedom and Progress.

J. J. MOSES.

Address, care of A. J. Davis & Co., 24 East Fourth St., New York.

Do we not read that God only hath immortality; that the soul or spirit shall return to God who gave it? If then God puts a part of himself into us, and then, after a time, he again receives it, does not this destroy our claim to individuality of soul? If the flesh abuses this part of God ten, twenty, forty, or more years, does God get so angry with this part of himself as to damn it in hell eternally? If so, let christianity tell how much of God is now in hell.

LETTER FROM MRS. HENDEE.

A friendly letter from Mrs. Hendee, dated at Pine Grove, Amador county, May 17th, contains items of interest to Spiritualists, as follows:

I have been here three weeks and visited nearly all the towns in the county. I find few Spiritualists here, and no interest whatever in the cause. At first I did not think I could do anything, but have spoken and held circles in several places with good success, and find it only requires energy and perseverance, with tests, and explanation of our philosophy, to awaken an interest in the minds of the people. No lecturer or public medium has ever been in this county.

I gave one lecture here at the Baptist Hall, having the society for my audience. The choir sang, and their minister introduced me. I gave the permission to choose their subject. They chose "Spiritualism," and were well pleased, and came forward to become acquainted. After the lecture, all adjourned to the hotel for a circle, and many tests were given and recognized.

I have given one lecture at Volcano, and have been sent for to lecture to-night. Shall go over and remain a few days, to hold circles, examine minerals, etc. I shall, on my return, visit Jackson and Amador City.

As I am opening up a new field I will secure the address of our friends in different places. I do not see where all the lecturers and public mediums who are travelling around have been that none have ever visited this county. I have not been considered a public lecturer, and being located, and occupied with other business, I had no time to test my powers as a speaker, but I hope the angel-world will aid and direct me aright.

Hoping you are prospering in health and business, I remain, yours for truth,

M. J. UPHAM HENDEE.

PROF. J. EDWIN CHURCHILL.

This gentleman, who has been engaged in giving lectures on the Science of Life, in the Southern States, writes from Americus, Ga., to say that he intends ere long to visit the Pacific coast. We know little personally of Prof. Churchill, but judging from the commendations he receives in Southern journals we believe he will be a valuable aid to the Liberal cause in this State. The following is an extract from a letter published in the Georgia Republican.

We, the undersigned citizens of Oglethorpe and vicinity, having had the great pleasure of listening to Prof. J. Edwin Churchill's course of lectures during the last week on "Man and his Relations," embracing the science of Phrenology, Psychology, Morality, Mesmerism and Spiritualism, and appreciating his deep researches in this Age of Progress, do hereby recommend him as a man deserving the highest consideration in any community. As a poet, painter and musician, he is so well known to require any recommendation on our part. (signed,) M. D. C. Summerlin, M. D., W. B. Hill, L. J. Giffin, J. H. Stiles, B. J. Stiles, George Bledsoe, John T. Kelsoe, W. A. Robinson, A. Glaser, G. S. Fish, J. Lichtenstein, Thos. P. Lloyd, S. R. Goode, B. F. Holsonbrook, M. D.

The lady teacher of the senior class of girls in the High School, Providence, R. I., receives a salary of $1,300 a year—$900 less than that given to the male teacher of the same grade. The question of a small addition to her salary has been discussed by the School Committee and the addition refused.

SOCIETY FOR SELF-CULTURE.

There was a very large attendance at the meeting on Sunday last, attracted by the announcement that the marriage question, which all are interested in, would be discussed. Mrs. Ballou opened the debate. She said she is not opposed to marriage. The design of marriage is to secure the rights and the happiness of parents and children; that the marriage relation has been warped from its true purpose, and in many cases is productive of crime, does not in her opinion condemn the system, but merely proves that the system has been abused. There must necessarily be some established system of marriage, and what that may be she was willing to leave to the highest, purest and most advanced public sentiment. Crime results from our present method, but she did not know that it would be greatly lessened under any other that can at present be adopted. She spoke against promiscuity, and against the idea that God unites people indissolubly. The evils of marriage mainly grow out of the subjection of woman in the marriage state, and this grows out of the church; therefore the church, and not the marriage system, is responsible. When a woman, after years of abuse, comes to say, "I hate maternity," then there is danger that the child born of such parentage will come into the world with the brand of murder indelibly stamped upon its being. The mind of the mother contemplates crime, and the child in consequence has a tendency to crime. So when the mother is compelled to steal from the husband's pockets enough to provide clothing for her expected child, the effect on the child must be marked. It is with such that we fill our jails. Mrs. B. said love is the only true basis of marriage, and where love ceases marriage should cease.

Capt. C. B. Smith followed in the affirmative of the question, that "our present system of marriage is a fruitful source of crime." He denounced the system as infamous; gave a great many facts to sustain his position, and appeared to consider that the evils are inseparable from the system.

Prof. W. H. Chaney said our marriage system is monogamic; the only other marriage system of account is polygamic, while outside of these systems is promiscuity. There may be a plurality of wives, a plurality of husbands, promiscuous relations of the sexes, or our present system—one man for one woman. Who can doubt which is preferable? Who can hesitate as to which is most conducive to happiness? The abuse of a thing is not taken for the thing itself. We have a written language, yet it is sometimes used for the commission of the crime of forgery; we have a natural and just mode of marriage, yet it may be used to outrage nature and defy justice. It is the abuse of the system, and not the system itself, which needs to be condemned and abolished. This is the substance of the Professor's speech, though not his exact language. He said much more about free-love, promiscuity, etc., which we do not report.

A. C. Stowe said he condemned the system itself, as it now exists, but was not prepared to say that all people are fit for the adoption of a better or purer method. What he condemned in the marriage system is its indissolubility, and its subjection of woman. The only true foundation for marriage is affection; when that ceases all true marriage ceases, whether the outward form is retained or not, and people should be at liberty to separate, the rights of children as well as parents to be secured by law. Marriage as it exists is unequal, as it denies to woman privileges accorded to man. The church and the government in the establishment of marriage and its continuance against the will of either of the parties, usurp rights which belong solely to the individual. In reply to Mr. Chaney he said it does not follow that those who oppose the present system are in favor of polygamy or promiscuity; many who sustain monogamy by profession uphold promiscuity by practice. Free-love does not mean free lust, as asserted by Mr. Chaney, but the reverse of it; neither is it true that those who oppose the present system are unmarried, or married unhappily; they are those who judge not from personal experience, but by observation and the information they obtain as to the practical workings of the system generally.

Dr. Pilkington said our present system of "God-made marriages" came in with the church and will go out with it. He traced many of the evils of society to the inharmonies of the marriage relation.

Mr. D'Arcy said marriage should be a purely civil contract, terminating at the pleasure of the parties, under regulations provided by law, as other contracts are dissolved. If two persons contract to keep grocery, and one wishes to sell whisky, and the other opposes, they are allowed to separate without the interference of their neighbors, the church or the courts. Why should the law or public sentiment compel a man and woman to carry on their family grocery against their will?

J. L. Hatch said the question is not one between monogamy and polygamy or promiscuity, but whether marriage, considered as a religious sacrament, and perpetual against the will of the parties, is not a cause of crime. No one here, he said, advocates polygamy or promiscuity, and it has been proved by years of experience in the West Indies that placement, or marriage by civil contract, dissoluble at the will of the parties, is more productive of happiness and less often leads to separation than marriage under the ordinances of the church. He favored marriage but did not believe the system to be above improvement.

Mr. Lewis argued that marriage should be by civil contract, not by church ordinance, and was of the opinion that many of the evils attributed to marriage belong to the imperfect condition of parents, rather than to the system.

Mrs. Ballou closed with a ten-minutes speech, in which she said marriage, besides being a civil contract, should be a sacred one, else it is no marriage. She had performed the marriage ceremony, and had told the couple that if they were not already married by the law of attraction and adaptation she could not marry them, and she would not assume the authority to pronounce them husband and wife while life lasted, but only while love existed,—love, which is the only foundation for true marriage. What God joins no man can put asunder, and if God—that is, Nature—really has joined a couple they will not desire to be put asunder. When they do so it is proof that God had nothing to do with it.

The same subject is to be discussed to-morrow, Mr. Lundi having the opening. Of course he speaks in the negative of the proposition.

ANTIQUITY OF MAN IN EUROPE.—Dr. Carl Vogt, of Geneva, at a meeting of German naturalists and physicians at Innsbruck, summoned up the result of the congress of paleontologists. We condense a portion of his remarks:

There is no longer any doubt that man existed in Europe—probably the latest peopled part of the world—at a time when the great southern animals, the elephant, the mammoth, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, were found there, which are now extinct. It is equally certain that posterior to the advent of man the straits of Gibraltar, of Dover, and the Dardanelles, as well as Sicily and Africa, were still united by isthmuses; the whole Mediterranean area was separated from Africa by a sea in the basin of Sahara; the Baltic was a sea of ice covering the whole of the low levels of North Germany and Russia, and cutting off Finland, Sweden, and Norway into what would have been an island but for its junction with Denmark. The researches of Lartet in France, of Fraas in Germany, and of Dupont in Belgium, have proved that this period was succeeded by another, in which men hunted in the countries of Central Europe the reindeer and other arctic animals, in an arctic climate, and surrounded by an arctic flora. Our primeval Europeans were savages in the fullest sense. They were cannibals, as has been lately shown by researches in Copenhagen. The lake villages in Switzerland, on the other hand, show that agriculture, and the pastoral life flourished whilst the metals were still unknown. It can be shown, moreover, that our civilization came not from Asia, but from Africa; and Heer has proved that the cultivated plants in the Swiss lake villages are of African, and to a great extent, Egyptian origin.

A dispatch from Georgetown, Del., says: "John Andrews, the colored local preacher who murdered his wife on last Sunday night, was discovered through a remarkable dream of Henry James, one of our white citizens, last night, who had, with others, been in search of the assassin. No one knew of the colored church having an attic, but after James dreamed that he found Andrews there, he took some friends and a ladder, and discovered an aperture leading to the church loft, which he opened and called out 'John come down.' A full blooded echo came back, 'I will if you wont hurt me,' which caused Mr. James to take two steps—one down the ladder, the other one clear into the street. Notwithstanding the 'dream-reader's' fright, his friends ascended to the attic and captured the 'echo,' darky and all, and have him incarcerated in our jail at the present time."

One of the first things we learn is the fact of our limitations; we cannot be everything, nor do everything, and we can only accomplish anything at all for ourselves or others by working steadily, persistently and faithfully within the area of our capabilities.

Gold ever shines the brightest under the greatest friction. So the soul is made purer by the greatest tribulation.—Prof. J. Edwin Churchill.

The man who lives his highest thought, and works for his noblest desire; lives for others instead of self, will, in the good time coming, be recompensed for his labor.—J. Edwin Churchill.

ALL who are desirous of aiding in the promulgation of Liberal Ideas in matters pertaining to Religion are asked to subscribe for COMMON SENSE, the only advocate of Rationalism. Its reading matter is of sufficient variety to gratify all who are interested in Spiritualism and Reform questions, and it confidently looks to Liberals for its support.

SEEKING THE DEVIL.—It is said the devil materialized once in the presence of Martin Luther, when the latter was so impolite as to throw his inkstand at the devil's head. One of my Methodist "converts," in 1823, sent for me the next morning after he had been "born again," and assured me that the old boss-devil had appeared to him, and stood at his bedside the night before! I asked him how he knew it to be satan? Then he said, he was sure, because "his eyes were as big as saucers, he had a forked tail, a cloven foot, and his head was split open at the top" like a bishop's cap! That was, to me, a clincher, and I at once gave in. In those times of "revival," it was a common occurrence for my "converts" to have materializations of "Jesus on the cross," when he did not die. And, in Ex 33:23, we are told that God materialized his "back parts" to Moses.—La Roy Sunderland.

THE COAL STRIKE.—The following is an extract from an article in the paper published by the Coal Miners' Association: "On the capital-side of this contest, it is safe to say, is the most powerful moneyed combination that has ever had existence in this country. First, the presidents of the six great coal producing and carrying companies—whose aggregated capital and interest-bearing indebtedness is not much short of seven or eight hundred millions—met in New York and decided that the wages of the miners must be reduced, binding themselves to one another to carry out the decision by what we have a right to conjecture were very solemn obligations. Then in each region the individuals who have not yet been driven out of the business were gathered together, and in return for the pledge of the companies to see them safely through, they were obligated to stand by the agreement. Here then is what the miners of the anthracite region have never before had to measure strength with—the entire coal operating and carrying interest in one solid body."

The Rev. Dr. Bartol, of Boston, gave expression to these emphatic views on Sunday last when referring to the case of Jesse Pomeroy: "If we would have no monsters about us in the community, let not idiots or insane pairs, or scrofulous or consumptives, those soaked in alcohol or conceived in lust, entering the world diseased in body or mind, or overweighed with any propensity or passion, be allowed to marry any more than we would have a nursery for wolves and bears, or cultivate poisonous ivy, deadly night shade or apple fern in the enclosures of our houses, our yards and our fields. Society, by righteous custom, if not by statute law, has a right to prevent, to forbid the multiplication of monstrous specimens of humanity. That mewling, puking, drooling, wailing baby ought not to exist; it is no blessing, but a curse of nature and God on the misdoing of men and women."

What possible reference had the irredeemable paper of Venice to specie? Yet it was at par and above par for nearly five hundred years. What caused the first emission of paper by Catherine of Russia to be above par in gold? Why was the paper currency of England nearer par during the first years of suspension than immediately preceding resumption? Why did Horne Tooke and others of the best minds of Britain, decide that paper, and not gold, was the true exponent of value during the suspension?—Industrial Age.

It is asserted that there is in prison in Dublin a man who has been confined twenty-two years for contempt of court, he refusing or being unable to pay a fine of a few shillings!

I AM NO MAN.

BY WILLIAM BRUNTON.

I am no man to live like this,
As though the days of Men were fled,
As though the earth had lost its bliss,
And manhood brave and bold were dead.
I am a Knave, an arrant Knave,
And lack of life's essential good;
Prepare for me, O, earth the grave,
Or give me brave, heroic blood!

I am no man to spend my days
In barren city streets and walls,
In this dull round of city ways,
When braver life of Freedom calls;
I am a fool, a coward fool,
Possessed with fear and cursed with shame;
To men and things and easy tool,
When all my heart with good might flame!

I am no man—I feel in bonds,
I curse myself that seems to be,
For here I dream of far beyonds,
When present good my life might see!
I need the fresh impulsive glow
That Nature gives if we receive,
The noble life she will bestow,
If heart and soul in her believe!

Oh, manhood come, my better self,
Oh, come tarp out this stuffy slave,
Turn out this weak and foolish elf,
This rank and foul usurping Knave,
And make me great with deeds of worth,
With royal enterprise and skill,
And such large love as all the earth
With life, and love, and joy must fill!

WHEN THE SONG'S GONE OUT OF YOUR LIFE.

"When the song's gone out of your life, you can't start another while it's a-ringing in your ears, but it's best to have a bit of silence, and out o' that maybe a psalm'll come by and by."—EDWARD GARRETT.

When the song's gone out of your life,
That you thought would last to the end,
That first sweet song of the heart,
That no after days can lend;
The song of the bird to the trees,
The song of the wind to the flowers,
The song that the heart sings low to itself
When it wakes in life's morning hours;

"You can start no other song;"
Not even a tremulous note
Will falter forth on the empty air;
It dies in your aching throat.
It is all in vain that you try,
For the spirit of song has fled—
The nightingale sings no more to the rose
When the beautiful flower is dead.

No lute-strings softly fall
On the bruised heart's quivering strings;
Perhaps, from the loss of all, you may learn
The song that the seraph sings;
A grand and glorious psalm
That will tremble and rise and thrill,
And fill your breast with its grateful rest
And its lonely yearnings still.

THE GREATEST BLESSING.—There is no greater blessing for a man than to have acquired that happy and healthy instinct which leads him to take delight in his work for his work's sake; not slurring it over, not thinking how soon it will be done and got rid of, not troubling himself greatly what men say about it when it is done, but putting his whole heart and mind into it, feeling the thing he has turned out, be it a legal argument, or picture, or anything else, is conscientiously perfected to the best of his power.

For Common Sense.

THE "GROUNDS OF HOPE."—There are two grounds of hope of a future life, to man, suggested by Science. The persistence and indestructibility of Force, suggests a ground of hope of a continued existence beyond the grave. If we suppose man to be the highest form of matter in his physical body; and, mind, be the perfection of motion, the reason will appear why the latter continues to exist, while the former dies. The body dies from the imperfection of its composition; as all bodies follow this necessity. But, perfected motion, in the mind, must remain as the cognate of persistent Force, unless the mind may come in contact with still higher elements by which its constitution can be destroyed. Another ground is in the function of Hope itself, which is perfectly legitimate, even when it may be the very last act performed in the living body. And, if legitimate in death, there must be life beyond.—La Roy Sunderland.

There are priests in the pulpit and also on the platform on whom have been conferred Nature's priesthood, men and women, whose lips drop manna in the wilderness; to whom we listen and find ourselves resolving to lead better, higher and more consistent lives. This priesthood laughs at creeds, and bids defiance to every authority. It lies deeper than all formulæ of faith, and rises above all Church Authority. It exercises its functions as well in him who is fettered by the chains of Rome, as in him who boasts of mental and spiritual freedom; it carries consolation to the mourner and comfort and hope to the despondent, whether it speaks in the language of Romanism or Rationalism.—J. W. Mackie.

THE WONDERFUL HEALER AND CLAIRVOYANT
MRS. C. M. MORRISON.

This celebrated Medium is the instrument or organism used by the invisibles for the benefit of humanity. The placing of her name before the public is by request of her Controlling Band. They, through her organism, treat all diseases and cure in every instance where the vital organs necessary to continue life are not destroyed. Mrs. Morrison is an

UNCONSCIOUS TRANCE MEDIUM, CLAIRVOYANT AND CLAIRAUDIENT.

From the very beginning, hers is marked as a most remarkable career of success, such as has seldom if ever fallen to the lot of any person. No disease seems too insidious to remove, nor patient too far gone to be restored.

Mrs. Morrison, becoming entranced, the lock of hair is submitted to her control. The diagnosis is given through her lips by the Band, and taken down by her Secretary. The original manuscript is sent to the Correspondent.

When Medicines are ordered, the case is submitted to Mrs. Morrison's Medical Band, who give a prescription suited to the case. Her Medical Band use vegetable remedies, (which they magnetize) combined with a scientific application of the magnetic healing power.
